That's one reason Cruz's campaign insists it is not ceding any ground in the effort win over Latinos.

"Hispanic outreach is going to be very important to him," said Catherine Frazier, Cruz's spokeswoman.

Cruz, in fact, has released Spanish-language ads and has a Spanish-language website. He has said his message will be built around "faith, family, patriotism, and hard work."

His campaign told Reuters that it has hired one staffer dedicated to Hispanic outreach and will be using Cruz's Cuban father, Rafael, as a surrogate to speak to Hispanic faith groups.

CULTURAL CRITIQUE

Cruz isn't the first minority candidate to face questions from his community about his cultural bona fides. In 2007, at just this stage of the race, Barack Obama's campaign endured a bevy of stories centered on the question of whether the Hawaii-born son of a Kenyan father and white American mother was "black enough" to be the first African-American president.

Obama ultimately transcended those doubts and drove black voter turnout to record levels. Cruz may face a tougher road in garnering Hispanic support, not only because of the presence of Rubio and Bush in the field, but because of his arms-length approach to his cultural identity.

While Rubio stayed in Miami immersed in the Spanish-speaking Cuban exile community, Cruz, born in Canada, settled in Houston with his father and mother of Irish-Italian descent, Eleanor, and quickly was assimilated into American culture.

Rafael Cruz strongly believed his family should speak English. Cruz, whose first name is also Rafael, went by Ted, and attended evangelical schools. "I'm Cuban, Irish and Italian, and yet somehow I ended up Southern Baptist," Cruz has joked.

Unlike Rubio, who has made his Cuban-American heritage a centerpiece of his campaign, Cruz seems more comfortable presenting himself instead as a blunt-talking Texan — down to the cowboy boots he wears with his suits — than as a self-identified Hispanic.

"When people in Texas think of Ted Cruz, they don't immediately think Hispanic," said Hector de Leon, a lawyer in Austin, Texas active in Republican politics. "When people in Texas think of Hispanic, they think south of the border, not someone with a Cuban father, an Anglo mother, who was born in Canada."

Despite the Spanish-language ads by Cruz's campaign, Hispanic activists say his inability to directly speak to the estimated 35 million U.S. Hispanics who speak primarily Spanish is a major disadvantage in this race.

“Jeb Bush and Rubio — they can be on Univision one minute and CNN the next,” said Daniel Garza, executive director of the conservative LIBRE Initiative in Miami.

Cruz’s campaign rejects the idea he is limited by language in connecting to Latino voters. “Many first and second-generation Hispanics grew up in similar households,” Frazier said.

The sign, written by the U.S. Centers for Disease Control (CDC), reads 'Keep Calm and Wash Your Hands.'

IMMIGRATION WORRIES

Garza, like many Hispanic conservatives who spoke to Reuters, was quick to praise Cruz’s intellect, but it was clear that Rubio or Bush was their first choice. And, to be sure, the major reasons are political, not cultural. Cruz’s stance on immigration is viewed by many Hispanics across the political spectrum as unduly harsh and inflexible.

“You get the sense that there is very little room for persuading Ted Cruz on anything,” Garza said. “There is some room where Ted could soften up a little and you get the sense that he won’t.”

Cruz was an ardent opponent of the 2013 immigration bill co-sponsored by Rubio. And although Rubio, under pressure from conservatives, eventually turned against the bill as well, he appears to be getting credit from Latinos for trying to push toward a solution to the nation’s immigration crisis.

As part of his outreach effort, Cruz addressed the U.S. Hispanic Chamber in April, arguing that the Republican Party is the natural home for voters who value entrepreneurship, family, and self-reliance.

But that approach belies polls that show a majority of Hispanic voters favoring a path to legal status for illegal immigrants, support for Obama’s signature healthcare plan, and government social programs. That means that whoever the Republican nominee is, be it Cruz, Rubio, Bush, or someone else, they will face an uphill battle in convincing Hispanics to defect from the Democrats, who enjoy a large monopoly on their vote.

The chamber’s Palomarez gives Cruz credit for coming before his group. But he adds, “I think he’s got a long way to go to convince people that he understands the Hispanic experience and that he understands the Hispanic voter.”

Ted Cruz: Campaign and super PAC have raised more than $40 million // The Washington Times // David Sherfinski – June 5, 2015

Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas said this week there is now more than $40 million raised between his presidential campaign and a group of super PACs supporting his candidacy.

Mr. Cruz, who became the first major Republican candidate to jump into the 2016 presidential race back in March, said candidates will need both grassroots support and money to win the nomination.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I think for anyone to be a serious candidate, he or she is going to need to raise at least $50 million between now and South Carolina, and I think there are only a handful of candidates who have a prayer of doing so,” he said on Fox News’ “Your World with Neil Cavuto.” “Right now, between our campaign and the super PAC, we’ve raised over $40 million, we have shattered records.”

He said in the first week of the campaign, the campaign itself raised $4.3 million with more than 50,000 contributions from all 50 states and said that the collection of super PACs supporting him have already raised more than $37 million.

Mr. Cruz predicted former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, who has set a June 15 date for an announcement on his 2016 plans, is going to “shatter” fund-raising records and raise “way north” of $100 million.

“Among the donors, he is Mick Jagger and the Beatles roiled into one,” Mr. Cruz said. “But you got to get actual, real [live] primary votes, and in my experience, grassroots plus money will beat a whole lot more money just about every day of the week.”

“When you get beyond Jeb Bush, there are only a couple other candidates who I think have the potential to raise the funds it’s [going to] take to run a nationwide campaign — not a Hail Mary in one or two states — but a nationwide campaign,” Mr. Cruz said. “That’s what we’re doing, and that combination of grassroots plus donor support, small dollar, large dollar, the business community, all coming together fed up with the corruption in Washington and wanting to get back to basic free market principles and our constitutional liberties.”

CHRISTIE

Chris Christie: Hillary Clinton is clueless on voter fraud // CBS News // Jake Miller – June 5, 2015

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie doesn't think much of Hillary Clinton's recent proposals to expand access to the ballot box.

Clinton, the frontrunner for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2016, accused Republicans in a speech on Thursday of trying to depress turnout among voting blocs that typically side with Democrats by passing restrictive voter identification laws and other measures. She singled out Christie for vetoing a bill that would have expanded early voting hours in his state.

"She doesn't know what she's talking about," Christie told CBS News' "Face the Nation" in an interview that will air on Sunday. "In New Jersey, we have early voting that are available to people...I don't want to expand it and increase the opportunities for fraud. And maybe that's what Mrs. Clinton wants to do. I don't know. But the fact is that the folks in New Jersey have plenty of an opportunity to vote."

Christie then pivoted to take a dig at Clinton for limiting her interactions with the media. "Maybe, you know, if she took some questions some places and learned some things, maybe she wouldn't make such ridiculous statements," he said.

Clinton has argued that the "voter fraud" Republicans claim they're trying to prevent simply doesn't happen - that Republicans are proposing solutions in search of a problem.

"She's never been to New Jersey, I guess," Christie said in the interview, which will air in full on Sunday.

In her speech, Clinton said the recent push for voting restrictions is part of a "sweeping effort to disempower and disenfranchise people of color, poor people and young people from one end of our country to the other." She called for automatic voter registration and at least 20 days of in-person early voting time in states across the country.

Clinton declared her 2016 candidacy in April. Christie has said he'll make a final decision on a bid by the end of June.

Gov. Christie attacks Hillary Clinton on voter registration // The Record // Salvador Rizzo – June 5, 2015

Governor Christie went on the attack against Hillary Clinton on Friday, saying the Democratic presidential candidate is calling for an expansion of voter registration because “she just wants an opportunity to commit greater acts of voter fraud.”

Christie was responding to comments Clinton made Thursday in a speech in Houston. A Republican likely to announce a presidential run this month, Christie began the day greeting breakfast patrons at a New Hampshire diner and spoke briefly with reporters afterward, saying he “was not worried about her opinion.”

Former Secretary of State Clinton called for same-day voter registration across the country and said Republican governors including Christie were on “a crusade against voting rights,” blocking minorities from being able to vote. She mentioned that the New Jersey governor had vetoed a bill to allow early voting 15 days before an election at designated polling places, and also criticized GOP officials in Florida, Texas and Wisconsin.

“Secretary Clinton doesn't know the first thing about voting rights in New Jersey or in the other states that she attacked,” Christie said. “My sense is that she just wants an opportunity to commit greater acts of voter fraud around the country.”

Christie will be in Franklin, N.H., later on Friday for a roundtable discussion about drug rehabilitiation with local officials. It is his seventh trip to New Hampshire this year. Christie told reporters he plans to announce whether he's running for president this month.

Chris Christie rips Rand Paul, critics of Patriot Act // The Boston Herald // Chris Cassidy – June 5, 2015

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie ripped Sen. Rand Paul and other Patriot Act critics last night as self-serving, opportunistic grandstanders during a town hall here last night.

“What you’re being told about these programs is flat out wrong, and they’re being told to you because the folks that are telling you have an agenda to promote themselves politically,” said Christie, who’s considering entering the crowded GOP presidential field. “If they had any experience, like I do, they’d know, we’re not violating anyone’s civil liberties.”

Christie has frequently touted himself as the only potential candidate who has used the Patriot Act to prosecute and convict terrorists when he was U.S. attorney of New Jersey.

“They’d make you believe there are people every day listening to your conversation between you and your mother. Unless your mother is a terrorist, I don’t care,” Christie said. He argued that Congress made America “weaker and more vulnerable” by passing the USA Freedom Act and ending the government’s bulk collection of data.

After the town hall, Derry Republicans presented Christie with a commemorative plastic potato, in honor of the town’s claim to be the first place in North America the starchy crop was planted.

Christie attempted to sign it but dropped it instead.

“I can’t believe after all those questions, I fumbled the potato,” said Christie.

Here on a two-day trip, Christie also spoke at a fundraiser for Manchester Mayor Ted Gatsas. Today, he will greet patrons at the Corner View Restaurant in Concord followed by a roundtable at a recovery center in Franklin.

Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul, Ohio Gov. John Kasich and former Maryland Gov. Bob Ehrlich are all due in New Hampshire today. Paul will continue with events all weekend, while Democratic contender Bernie Sanders will hold a town meeting Saturday, and former Texas Gov. Rick Perry — who just launched his campaign yesterday — will attend a series of cookouts on Sunday.

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush announced yesterday he will make “an announcement” — likely a campaign launch — on June 15 in Miami. He will then set out on the “Jeb Bush Announcement Tour” with New Hampshire as his first stop the next day.

PERRY

Rick Perry promises to ‘do something’ about student debt. But what did he do in Texas? // WaPo // Danielle Douglas-Gabriel

In announcing his bid for president Thursday, former Texas Gov. Rick Perry made a play for the millions of Americans contending with the high cost of college.

"I know you face rising health care costs, rising child care costs, skyrocketing tuition costs, and mounting student loan debt. I hear you, and I am going to do something about it," Perry told a crowd of supporters Thursday.

Perry's record on this subject as governor was mixed. He called on colleges to set tuition caps, and broadened access to higher education for undocumented immigrants. But some education officials in Texas say Perry's policies did more to add to the burden of student debt than relieve it.

As governor of the Lone Star state for 14 years, Perry supported hundreds of millions of dollars in spending cuts for public universities. To offset lower funding from the state, colleges in Texas raised tuition, leading more students to borrow to cover expenses.

"His overall record on accessibility to higher education was poor," said Clay Robison, a spokesman for the Texas State Teachers Association, which fought Perry's cuts to education budgets. "And primarily poor because of the cuts in funding and financial aid."

When Perry became governor in 2000, Texas provided about $7,791 per college student, below the national average of $8,717 but largely in line with many other states, according to data from the State Higher Education Executive Officers Association.

Three years later, state appropriations started to slip in Texas, just as college enrollment crept up. Rather than set aside more money for the universities, Perry opted to deregulate college tuition, taking away the legislature's power to set prices and giving it to the schools. The average cost of tuition and fees at Texas public universities increased by 90 percent within a decade of that decision, according to the Texas Higher Education Coordinating Board.

While other states slashed higher education budgets during the 2008 economic recession, Texas, buoyed by a strong energy sector, made marginal increases in student spending. That ended around 2011 as years of tax cuts caught up with state and led to an $18 billion deficit.

Although the state had $6 billion in reserves to help plug that shortfall, Perry left the money untouched and imposed across the board cuts. He signed off on $1.2 billion in cuts to higher education in the 2012 budget.

Still, the governor did call on universities to lock in tuition at a flat rate for four years and cap the cost of degrees at $10,000. Perry spokesman Travis Considine pointed out that 13 schools adopted the pricing cap.

"Governor Perry led the charge in making higher education more accessible and affordable for more Texans," Considine said, in an e-mail. "During Gov. Perry's leadership, enrollment in Texas colleges and universities increased by 50 percent, with Hispanic enrollment increasing by 118 percent."

Perry took a lot of heat from his party when he backed a law allowing undocumented college students in Texas to pay in-state tuition. The law still stands and has been credited with an increase in enrollment.

While Robison of the teachers association applauds Perry for taking a stand on the issue, he said it does not negate the fact that under Perry, college in Texas has become less affordable.

"Many of those Hispanic students who have enrolled in school are first-generation college students, who are heavily dependent on student aid. The cuts have really hurt their prospects," he said.

Over the course of Perry's tenure, state higher education spending per student fell 11 percent, which is less than the national average drop of 24 percent during that time. Texas upped its spending by $350 per student before Perry left office, but critics say it was too late to reverse the pricing trends.

Nearly two-thirds of Texas students in 2013 were borrowing to pay for school and graduating with an average $25,244 in debt, a little below the national average but much higher than the prior generation, according to data from the Institute for College Access & Success.

It has become politically advantageous for presidential hopefuls to at least acknowledge the burden that $1.3 trillion in student debt has placed on millions of Americans.

Republican contenders, including New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, Sen. Marco Rubio (Fla.) and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, have framed the issue as a barrier to economic mobility. And Democratic candidates Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley are advocating for debt-free public college, a plan party front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton has yet to weigh in on.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There are 40 million people with education debt in this country. Almost two-thirds of student loans are held by people younger than 39, while Americans age 40 to 59 hold another 30 percent, according to the New York Federal Reserve. That's a pretty significant part of the electorate.

Rick Perry Borrows Elizabeth Warren's Message, but Does It Fit? // Bloomberg News // David Weigel – June 5, 2015

Toward the middle of former Texas Governor Rick Perry's presidential announcement speech, a listener could be forgiven for thinking the TelePrompTer had been switched out. All of a sudden, Perry was speaking the language of populist critics of Wall Street, people like Massachusetts Senator Elizabeth Warren and Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders.

"The American people see a rigged game, where insiders get rich, and the middle class pays the tab," said Perry. "There is something wrong when the Dow is near record highs, and businesses on Main Street can't even get a loan. Since when did capitalism involve the elimination of risk for the biggest banks while regulations strangle our community banks? Capitalism is not corporatism. It is not a guarantee of reward without risk. It is not about Wall Street at the expense of Main Street."

Just seconds later, Perry had moved on to the need for tax cuts–"we have the highest corporate tax rate in the western world"and the big guy/little guy paradigm was shunted aside. Yet it was not new. Perry had been grasping for a message like this since leaving the governor's office. In an April 6 speech at the Citadel, in South Carolina, Perry said cryptically that "we need to reduce taxes and regulations, and bring prosperity to Main Street and not just Wall Street."

"When corporate leaders make bad mistakes, they need to be held accountable."

How far was he going to go? On Morning Joe Friday, co-host Mika Brzezinski tried to figure out Perry's message by starting with its political risk. (The green rooms of cable news are overflowing with wealthy people who will predict doom for anyone criticizing finance.)

"You're not saying anything right now that is, you know, going to insult anybody that you need politically?" asked Brzezinski.

"You're talking about, like Wall Street?" Perry asked. "I think–I don't think–I hope I don't insult anybody. I hope what I say is, here's what needs to change. If Wall Street–I don't believe there's anybody too big to fail. I think we made a huge mistake when we passed too big to fail. I said that with GM publicly back in–whenever that was like in 2009, when they were trying to get their deal through and I said I'm not for that. And GM's got a manufacturing facility in Texas. But use the bankruptcy laws. When corporate leaders make bad mistakes, they need to be held accountable, whether they're on Wall Street or whether they're on Main Street."

Co-host Joe Scarborough gave that an approving "yeah." Yet Perry had criticized TARP -- what he appeared to be referring to as "too big to fail" -- before. And before, it had been pointed out that as co-chairman of the National Governors Association, Perry called on "Congress to leave partisanship at the door and pass an economic recovery package." Since then, he has insisted that this was not an endorsement of the bill before Congress, but a statement of support for doing something-or-other in a tough time.

Since 2009, jujitsu-ing the TARP vote to portray Democrats as the party that does Wall Street's bidding has been a reliable Republican tactic. In the Tea Party wave of 2010, it helped tremendously that voters often confused the 2009 stimulus package with the 2008 TARP bill, thinking of them as one monstrous giveaway that did not benefit them personally. In 2015, Warren and Sanders et al argue that the largest banks should be broken up. Perry won't or can't go that far, so he ends up stuck in 2009.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

With one difference. Elsewhere in the launch speech, Perry made a short reference to reports that community banks were reeling under the regulations of the 2010 financial reform bill. "For small businesses on Main Street struggling to just get by, smothered by regulations, targeted by Dodd-Frank: I hear you, you're not forgotten," said Perry. "Your time is coming." Not unlike Hillary Clinton, Perry was trying to speak the language of populism without saying anything that would convince a Wall Street donor that he was truly under threat.

Rick Perry hits back at Hillary Clinton over voter ID // The Washington Times // David Sherfinski – June 5, 2015

Former Texas Gov. Rick Perry on Friday hit back at former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton, who criticized Mr. Perry and several other of her potential 2016 GOP rivals on Thursday over the issue of voting rights.

"I think it makes sense to have a photo ID to be able to vote," Mr. Perry, who announced Thursday he is running for president in 2016, said on "Fox and Friends." "When I got on the airline to come up here yesterday I had to show my photo ID."

In a speech at Texas Southern University, Mrs. Clinton, the 2016 Democratic presidential front-runner, had called Mr. Perry out by name on the issue, as well as Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie.

"Here in Texas, former Governor Rick Perry signed a law that a federal court said was actually written with the purpose of discriminating against minority voters," she said. "He applauded when the Voting Rights Act was gutted and said the law's protections were outdated and unnecessary."

Mr. Perry contended that Mrs. Clinton was taking on the people of the state of Texas with her remarks.

Asked if he's discriminatory, Mr. Perry said: "No, not at all."

"And actually, the people of the state of Texas is who she's taking on, because that was a law that was passed by the people of the state of Texas," he said.

Mrs. Clinton went into his home state and "dissed every person who supports having identification to either get on an airplane or to vote," he said.

Mr. Perry also said any insinuation that he doesn't want minorities to vote is untrue.

"As a matter of fact, when you look across the state of Texas and you see what [we've] done in that state to really empower minorities — as a matter of fact, the highest high school graduation rate for African-Americans in America is in the state of Texas," he said. "The highest Hispanic graduation rate is in Texas. Those are empowerments ... and they want to be protected when they get on an airplane as well."

Perry Kickoff Generates Buzz, But Not in Key States // Real Clear Politics // Matthew Disler – June 5, 2015

During this period, 422,000 people generated 763,000 interactions, a term Facebook defines as likes, posts, comments, or shares. These numbers represent a substantial rise in interest for Perry; over the previous 90 days, an average of only 32,000 unique Facebook users have discussed the Texas governor each day.

However, compared to other candidates, traffic for the former Texas governor is only in the middle of the pack (based on post-kickoff numbers). On the low end, in the day after their respective announcements, George Pataki drew 81,000 interactions from 59,000 unique users; Rick Santorum received 266,000 interactions from 169,000 unique users; and Carly Fiorina recorded 515,000 interactions from 304,000 unique users. Similarly to Perry, 458,000 people generated 814,000 interactions for Mike Huckabee.

However, Perry created less social media buzz than Ben Carson, Marco Rubio, Rand Paul, and even Democratic candidate Bernie Sanders, who each enjoyed more than 1 million interactions in the 24 hours after they formally declared their candidacy. Ted Cruz had 5.5 million interactions, and Hillary Clinton had 10.1 million.

The Facebook data also indicate that Perry may encounter some difficulty in early primary states, none of which were in the top five regarding interactions about the governor. Rather, the states with the most discussion of his candidacy were his home state, three bordering states (Oklahoma, New Mexico, and Arkansas), and Washington, D.C. (which Facebook includes as a state in its measurements). Perry, like most other candidates, will likely need to perform well in the early-voting states of Iowa, New Hampshire, and South Carolina if he hopes to stay in the race and ultimately secure the nomination.

In his announcement speech, the Texan sought to highlight his economic and foreign policy goals, and social media users appear to have picked up on those priorities. Perry stated that he would freeze Obama-era regulations and lower corporate taxes to increase job creation, adding that in Texas, “we were the engine of growth because we had a simple formula: control taxes and spending, implement smart regulations, invest in an educated workforce, and stop frivolous lawsuits.” He also said he would pursue a more aggressive strategy against Iran and ISIS and declared that the president’s decision to withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq was a mistake. In accordance with these emphases, the top two themes regarding Rick Perry mentioned by Facebook users in the past week were foreign policy and the state of the economy.

The social media trends underscore the uphill battle Perry faces, as already evidenced by his poor showing in national polls: Not only did several of his opponents generate more interest when they announced, his national image still smarts from the gaffes that ended his 2012 campaign. His support among Republican primary voters currently stands at 2.7 percent in the RealClearPolitics average, placing him below most of his opponents but narrowly qualifying him – at this time – for the first GOP presidential debate on Aug. 6, which is only open to the top 10 candidates.

Welcome Back, Rick Perry: Will 2016 Be Different Than 2012? // Forbes // Neil Assur – June 5, 2015

About four years ago, when Rick Perry initially declared himself a nominee for the United States presidency, he immediately vaulted onto the scene as a Republican front runner. Polls reflected Mr. Perry’s popularity: his favorability numbers surpassed that of his chief competitor, Mitt Romney, and by late August, Mr. Perry had taken a decisive lead in “vote share” (the share of the vote each candidate can expect to gain). This rapid success was to prove equally ephemeral, however. Within months, Mr. Perry’s vote share numbers had declined precipitously, and, by the time of the Iowa caucus, Mr. Perry was all but dead. He finished fifth in Iowa and last in New Hampshire before dropping out of the race entirely.

Although that chapter may have closed, apparently the story is not yet over.

Yesterday, Rick Perry officially declared himself, once again, a candidate for president. Although the move is not shocking, it nonetheless begets the question: can Mr. Perry actually win this time around?

The consensus across the media seems to be one of skepticism. After all, the Perry campaign’s complete obliteration in 2012 was nothing short of historic: no other candidate has ever lost a lead the size of Mr. Perry’s in so short a period of time. Many, understandably so, have focused on Mr. Perry's poor debate performance and gaffe-riddled campaign as the basis of this collapse. Indeed, a highlight reel of Mr. Perry's campaign would be littered with cringe-worthy material, starting with a nonsensical, rambling criticism of Mitt Romney in a debate(Mr. Romney's response: "Nice Try") and ending with perhaps the most disliked YouTube video of all time in which Mr. Perry compared homosexuals serving in the military with children celebrating Christmas. Of course, in between would be the most famous, and perhaps most representative moment of Rick Perry's campaign summed up in one word: Oops.

Clearly, if Mr. Perry hopes to achieve any form of success in this campaign, he will have to be more savvy with the way he handles debates and public appearances. However, obscured by Mr. Perry's solecisms is a more deep-seated, pressing issue: are Mr. Perry's views compatible with America? Little attention has been paid to the fact that, last time around, Mr. Perry alienated voters with his beliefs as well as his blunders. By the end of his campaign, only 7% of voters identified Mr. Perry's views as most similar to their own. When Mr. Perry proclaimed Social Security a "Ponzi Scheme," almost three times as many people believed that view would hurt his chances of being elected president rather than help it. Among social issues, such as religion and abortion, Mr. Perry scored even worse: a woefully low 6% of voters thought Mr. Perry would do a good job reflecting their social views. By comparison, Mitt Romney, who many claimed lost the presidential election because of his stance on social issues, scored more than three times better.

What does this mean for the Rick Perry of 2016?

The good news is, voters can be fickle. As it stands right now, Mr. Perry trails only Chris Christie, Mike Huckabee, and Jeb Bush in awareness among Republicans, and has cause for optimism with a relatively solid 0.73 Favorability-Awareness ratio. Mr. Perry, unlike his 2012 campaign, has also had a lot of time to prepare himself for this race. Finally, Mr, Perry has assembled an impressive staff, including Forbes opinion editor Avik Roy, that should prepare him for a deep run.

That said, Mr. Perry does face a significant challenge in re-inventing himself. If he is to appeal to mainstream American voters, he must do more than avoid the gaffes: he must tone down his religious zeal and focus more on issues, such as health care, jobs, and entitlements, which moderate-conservative voters seem to care about. Although this will not be easy–especially given his very conservative, religious background–it is likely the only way Mr. Perry can reverse his fortunes from 2012.

GRAHAM

Ronald Perelman Puts Financial Clout Behind Lindsey Graham // NYT // Maggie Haberman – June 5, 2015

When Hillary Rodham Clinton left the State Department in 2013, one of the earliest meetings she held was with an old friend, Ronald O. Perelman, the cosmetics billionaire and a major political donor.

Yet Mr. Perelman has emerged on the national finance committee list rolled out by Lindsey Graham, the South Carolina senator seeking the Republican nomination for president.

Mr. Perelman, a frequent boldface name in gossip columns and philanthropy, was also a major supporter of Senator John McCain, the Republican presidential nominee in 2008. Mr. McCain and Mr. Graham are close allies.

"Lindsey Graham understands America's leadership role in promoting an enduring peace on the global landscape," Mr. Perelman said in a statement released by the senator's campaign. "With conflicts raging in the Middle East and around the world that threaten the security of America and our allies, we need leaders with strategic purpose and moral clarity to confront these crises."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Perelman's backing gives some noteworthy validity to the long-shot campaign of Mr. Graham, a party establishment figure who is also a foreign policy hawk.

Jeffrey R. Immelt, the chairman and chief executive of General Electric, is also listed as a co-chairman of the Graham finance committee.

Mr. Perelman has given to Mr. Graham in the past. But other potential candidates have been courting him over the last year. In August 2014, Mr. Perelman hosted Mr. McCain and Chris Christie, the governor of New Jersey and a likely presidential candidate himself, at his home in Wainscott, N.Y., in the Hamptons.

A person briefed on Mr. Perelman's decision, who requested anonymity to speak about private discussions, said that Mr. Perelman wasn't simply donating to Mr. Graham out of friendship.

He wants to "ensure a robust discussion on critical foreign policy issues," the person said, referring to negotiations with Iran on its nuclear energy program and to the United States' relationship with Israel.

Lindsey Graham Offers Straight Talk With a Southern Twang // TIME // Phillip Elliott – June 5, 2015

Sen. Lindsey Graham was a frequent travel buddy on John McCain's Straight Talk Express. The South Carolina Republican hopped on and off buses, jumped into motorcades and was among the 2008 GOP nominee's most trusted advisers on his plane. He was such a frequent voice inside the McCain inner-circle, he was endearingly lumped in with Sen. Joe Lieberman as one of the Three Amigos.

As his own his White House hopeful now, it should come as no surprise that Graham sounds a bit like his pal McCain. The hawkish retired Air Force officer is cracking jokes, taking all unscripted questions from anyone who shows up and is challenging even his own party's orthodoxy. The 59-year-old Republican is polling in single digits and is running as though he's perfectly fine there, as long as he can run a campaign as his own man. He is trying to build support in the early-nominating states even though the first debate's cast will be chosen by national polls. As one Republican who is not working for a White House bid brands it: "Straight Talk. With a Southern Twang."

Graham launched his campaign this week with a pitch to Republican voters that promises a strong military, defense of social safety nets and unflinching honesty. He is sharing the story about raising his teenaged sister after both parents died. He is running his campaign as a referendum on President Barack Obama's tenure as the leader of the U.S. military. "They deserve a Commander in Chief better than they have today," Graham said Friday as he met with GOP activists in West Des Moines, Iowa.

But he has challenges far steeper than McCain. For one, no one knows Graham outside the cable networks' booking departments. He is competing for the nomination against candidates who have run before, such as Rick Santorum and Mike Huckabee, or have dynastic help, such as Jeb Bush and Rand Paul. He struggled to attract national attention and he lacks a national fundraising machine. "Help me pay for it," Graham joked after an audience watched a promotional video. And, like McCain, he backed overhauls to the nation's immigration system that drew a backlash from conservatives in his party, earning him the name "Lindsey Grahamnesty," as he relates, chuckling.

On a personal level, there are also similarities. The same flashes of impatience break through, such as Friday when Iowa Gun Owners challenged him on his procedural vote on background checks and pressed him on a donation to his political machine from gun control advocate Mike Bloomberg. His acerbic one-liners mirror McCain, who repeatedly said in 2008 that he looked into Russian President Vladimir Putin's eyes and saw his former spy agency's acronym: KGB. Graham tweaks that line: "I've been telling Putin 'you're a thug' and he's never let me down." And he has unflinching faith in the military's ability to crush the United States' enemies: "I am going to unleash the American military and I am going to kick their ass."

Graham is betting his campaign can tap into the same constituencies that powered McCain to the nomination in 2008. He is campaigning with veterans groups this weekend and announced military advisers to a packed room in Iowa on Friday. He is hoping seniors turn out for him, based on promises to defend Social Security for older Americans. And he is casting himself as an everyman, the first in his family to graduate from college and the son of small business owners. "Please understand who you are voting for," Graham says.

Graham is even looking at McCain's pals, turning to McCain's new configuration of the Three Amigos. When Lieberman retired, McCain and Graham swapped him for Kelly Ayotte, a first-term Senator from New Hampshire. She, Graham is telling audiences, would be his Attorney General.

Why Lindsey Graham matters // The Economist – June 6, 2015

THE really inspiring thing about Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, who on June 1st announced a bid for the Republican presidential nomination, is "his message that the whole world is going down the tubes". That was the slightly bleak endorsement offered by Stephen Young, a retired business-owner looking on when the senator launched his campaign in Central, the blink-and-you-miss-it country town where he grew up.

Mr Graham's ability to project gloom about American weakness in a nasty world resonates with a lot of folks, Mr Young and his wife Linda explained. More important, the couple hopes that the senator's hawkish foreign-policy views rub off on Republican rivals, because they do not actually believe that their hero can win his party's nomination. "We're with him all the way," Mr Young beamed, before adding: "It may be a very short run."

There was a lot of that sort of double-edged praise in Central. Mr Graham offered rhetorical red meat to fans gathered in front of the tiny former pool hall and bar where his parents brought him up. He thundered that "radical Islam is running wild". He charged both President Barack Obama and some Republicans with wanting to disengage from the world, rather than heeding Ronald Reagan's doctrine of "peace through strength". His audience, full of snowy-haired pensioners and flag-clutching military veterans, cheered. Yet an unscientific straw poll found just one person who believed that the senator could win the Republican primary in South Carolina, let alone his party's nomination. A broad consensus was that Mr Graham was a fine man doomed by his habit of working with Democrats on issues such as immigration.

Many in Central placed themselves to the right of the senator on the subject of the 11m people thought to be in the country without legal papers. Since being elected to the Senate in 2002, Mr Graham has backed several immigration bills that would bring such migrants from the shadows and offer a path to citizenship. He was accused of proposing a "Grahamnesty" for illegal immigrants, and more than once hardliners mounted primary challenges for his seat. Each time Mr Graham survived, beating back Tea Party types who call him an establishment sell-out and libertarians who think him a war hawk (his best friend in the Senate is another interventionist, John McCain).

On a national level Mr Graham barely registers in early presidential polling. Yet fans at the Graham launch were only half-right when they call him a long shot for the White House, whose distinctive role will involve speaking out on foreign policy. He is a long shot. But the Republican field is full of security hawks quoting Reagan. Though it might seem paradoxical, Mr Graham's really distinctive contribution could involve teaching more timid rivals how to advance sensible views on immigration, without being driven from office by the far right.

Mr Graham's survival in South Carolina offers several lessons. The first is that even deeply conservative places are not monolithic. South Carolina peach-farmers, for instance, are both powerful and desperate for migrant labour, because their delicate fruit cannot be picked by machine (and locals dislike the work). In recent years some evangelical Christian pastors have joined business leaders in publicly backing immigration reform, citing biblical injunctions to welcome strangers and preserve families. Most voters in South Carolina hate the idea of rewarding law-breakers. But most also know that 11m people cannot be rounded up and deported without turning the country into a “concentration camp”, says Dale Sutton, a Southern Baptist pastor who has spoken out for reform. Thus they know that some sort of compromise is unavoidable.

A second lesson is that Mr Graham has never run from his beliefs, being certain that voters hate hypocrisy more than a difference of opinion. That makes him both braver and cannier than such rivals as Jeb Bush, a former governor of Florida who is also expected to run for the presidency. In 2012 Mr Bush supported a pathway to citizenship for undocumented migrants, then in 2013 called the granting of citizenship an undeserved “reward” for bad conduct. More recently Mr Bush has started saying that migrants need a path to some kind of legal status, “not necessarily” involving the status of citizen. Mr Graham shuns such flip-flopping. Without any chance of citizenship, millions would be left living out their lives as “the hired help”, he told USA Today in May. “That’s not who we are.”

Bolder and blunter

Mr Graham is more outspoken than another rival for the presidential nomination, Senator Marco Rubio of Florida, who was a Senate ally on immigration until he faced a conservative backlash. Now Mr Rubio says that voters cannot tolerate even a “conversation” about legalisation until they believe the border is impregnable. Mr Graham calls Mr Rubio’s “enforcement-first” stance impractical. Comprehensive immigration reform cannot be done by one party alone, he has told interviewers: and Republicans will struggle to win the White House if they continue to sound hostile to Hispanic voters. Yet in Mr Graham’s (persuasive) analysis, congressional Democrats will never give Republicans what they want on border security without knowing what is on offer for those 11m migrants in limbo.

Mr Graham’s bluntness points to a final lesson. For a vocal minority of Republicans, his candour about immigration disqualifies him. But most voters weigh politicians in the round. Because they know the senator has very conservative views on foreign policy, gun rights, abortion and more, most Republicans in South Carolina forgive him when they disagree. That is probably not enough to sustain Mr Graham outside his home state, where he is more vulnerable to attacks based on sound-bites. But if he emboldens Mr Bush or Mr Rubio to face down the anti-immigrant hard right, he may yet do his party historic service.

Iowans question Graham's gun rights history // The Des Moines Register // Linh Ta – June 5, 2015

At U.S. Sen. Lindsey Graham's first town hall meeting since announcing his run for president, Graham assured the audience he was in favor of gun rights, after Aaron Dorr, director of Iowa Gun Owners questioned his past votes.

"Check me out. Check my rating with the NRA. Come to my house. I will show you my AR-15," Graham said.

At the Sheraton Hotel in West Des Moines Friday, Graham was questioned about his vote approving Attorney General nominee Loretta Lynch in April 2015 and confirming Supreme Court Justice Elena Kagan in August 2010. He was also questioned about confirming Supreme Court Justice Sonia Sotomayor in 2009, as well as a $250,000 contribution from Michael Bloomberg in 2014, who has long been an advocate for gun control.

"We have grave concern about his history of supporting and sponsoring gun control legislation," Dorr said. "He knows how to take a question and spin it. None of what he says changes what he did."

Graham said he has a history of supporting gun rights, including a vote to continue allowing assault rifles and no magazine limits following the Sandy Hook Elementary School shooting in Newtown in 2012.

"If you think we can get all the people we want and we can't get any of their's, you're making a mistake," Graham said. "If you want a conservative judge, you better elect a conservative president."

Graham also touched on his military background. Graham served active duty in the United States Air Force between 1982 and '88, and he said his experience makes him the best-suited Republican in the field to serve as commander-in-chief. He said the United States needs to invest more into its military and into combat groups like the Islamic State.

"You may be tired of fighting radical Islam," Graham said. "They are not tired of fighting you."

Graham also introduced the members of his veterans coalition for his campaign, including Lt. General Ron Dardis, Aviation Command Sgt. Major Chris Fox, Brigadier General J. Daniel McGowan, Brigadier General Steve Bogle, Col. Ron Randazzo and Lt. Col. Mike Olson. Bob Holliday, chairman of the board for the Iowa Gold Star Military Museum in Johnston, is also on the committee.

Presidential candidate compares Hillary to Kim Jong Un // NY Post // Marisa Schultz – June 4, 2015

Hillary Clinton found herself compared Thursday to North Korean dictator Kim Jong Un, a despot who has never had to worry about an election result.

Republican South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham made the comparison during a Fox News Channel appearance, where he criticized Clinton for running a campaign where she routinely shuns questions from the press.

“Well, it’s easier to talk to the North Korean guy than it is to her,” Graham said.

“At the end of the day, when 57 percent of people don’t trust you, you’ve got a problem.”

Clinton faces 10 official Republican challengers — and counting — who have wasted no time going after the Democratic front-runner.

She hit back in Houston Thursday afternoon in a fiery speech calling for automatic universal voter registration at age 18, a 20-day window for early voting and restoration of Voting Rights Act protections to make it easier to vote.

The former secretary of state also criticized Republican competitors for their “crusade against voting rights,” citing several by name, but not Graham.

HUCKABEE

Huckabee: Hack exposes Obama’s weakness on China // The Hill // Cory Bennett – June 5, 2015

The pilfering of 4 million federal workers' personal data highlights President Obama’s inability to defend America from overseas powers, Republican presidential hopeful Mike Huckabee said Friday.

"What will it take for the White House to do its job?” asked the former governor of Arkansas. “What will it take for the Obama administration to wake up and defend America?”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Huckabee made his remarks the day after the Office of Personnel Management (OPM) revealed it had suffered a massive data breach, at least the second at the agency over the last year.

U.S. officials have said they suspect China is involved, seeking information for a broad cyber espionage campaign targeting high-ranking officials.

Huckabee thinks Obama's inability to stand up to China has allowed the Asian power to assault the U.S. at will online. China is also widely believed to steal commercial secrets from U.S. businesses.

"Enough is enough," Huckabee said. "China cheats, rips off American products, abuses its people, taunts our allies, and now they're crawling through our federal government stealing sensitive personal information from millions of people."

Huckabee has also criticized Obama for seeking trade agreements with China, arguing that "we have surrendered to the Chinese market."

"The lack of common sense in this White House is beyond breathtaking," he said Friday. "As president, I will stop Chinese cheating, hold China accountable, and never, ever apologize for protecting Americans."

Duggars' Endorsements Go Missing From Mike Huckabee's Website // ABC News // Ben Gittleson – June 5, 2015

Endorsements of Republican presidential candidate Mike Huckabee by members of the Duggar family disappeared from the former Arkansas governor's campaign website this week just prior to Josh Duggar's parents' revealing details of his sexual misconduct. But the Huckabee campaign said they were always meant to come down.

Jim Bob and Michelle Duggar's photographs and words of endorsement had appeared prominently on the homepage of Mike Huckabee's campaign website since the beginning of his run for president last month. The couple, who along with their 19 children starred in TLC's reality show "19 Kids and Counting," have defended themselves amid harsh criticism over allegations their eldest son, Josh Duggar, 27, molested five underage girls when he was a teenager.

Their photos had been at the top of seven that appeared on the right side of Huckabee's homepage under the label, "I Like MIKE."

"America needs Governor Huckabee for president!" Jim Bob Duggar was quoted as saying.

"Governor Huckabee is a man of faith who is very wise, and will help get our nation back on track," read Michelle Duggar's endorsement.

A campaign spokesperson told ABC News that the website's developers "always intended for the graphics to rotate out at the first of each month." The photos appeared on the site as recently as Monday, June 1, according to an archived version of the page on the Internet Archive.

"The old ones were routed out on June 1," the spokesperson said. "That has always been the plan."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The endorsement's disappearance was first reported by Talking Points Memo.

When allegations of Josh Duggar's behavior first surfaced last month, Huckabee issued a statement expressing his full-throated support of the family, saying, "Good people make mistakes and do regrettable and even disgusting things."

The Duggars endorsed Huckabee's first presidential run in 2008, and Rick Santorum's in 2012.

But as more details have emerged, TLC pulled the Duggars' popular show, and Santorum, one of Huckabee's opponents for the 2016 Republican presidential nomination, said he was "sickened" by the allegations.

During an interview with Fox News this week, Jim Bob Duggar said Josh Duggar had fondled four of his sisters and a babysitter.

Huckabee's campaign did not respond to questions today from ABC News about whether his view of the Duggar family had changed following this week's revelations, if he still accepted their endorsement, and if they would appear at his future campaign events.

When asked on Wednesday by ABC affiliate KATV whether the Duggars would join him on the trail, Huckabee said, "I don't know. It will be up to them. Ask them, I don't know."

KASICH

John Kasich blasts Clinton on voting 'demagoguery': 'Come on, Hillary, you know better than that' // The Washington Times // David Sherfinski – June 5, 2015

Ohio Gov. John Kasich on Friday took former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton to task for comments she made Thursday on voting rights, and also blasted legal action against his state's voting laws her campaign lawyer has joined.

"Today, Republicans are systematically and deliberately trying to stop millions of American citizens from voting," Mrs. Clinton, the frontrunner for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination, said Thursday at Texas Southern University.

"First of all, I think it's demagoguery, and secondly, if she wants to sue somebody, let her sue New York," Mr. Kasich, who is weighing a run for president in 2016, said on Fox News. "In Ohio, we got like 27 days of early voting, OK? Twenty-seven days, a couple hundred hours, and in New York, the only early voting — there is none. The only voting that occurs is on election day — what is she talking about?"

Mrs. Clinton's campaign lawyer, Marc Elias, is part of lawsuits against voting laws in Ohio and Wisconsin. The Clinton camp itself is not a party two them, though aides have said her team supports them, according to The New York Times.

"I like Hillary, but I got to tell you, the idea that we're going to divide Americans and we're going to use demagoguery, I don't like it," Mr. Kasich said. "Now I haven't said a word about Hillary, but to come into the state of Ohio and say we're repressing the vote when New York has only election day and we have 27 days ... come on, that's just silliness, you know? I'm disappointed in her, frankly."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Kasich said he likes Mrs. Clinton personally but obviously is not supporting her for president — and went on to addressed her directly.

"Don't be comin' in and saying we are deliberately trying to keep people from voting when her own state has less opportunity for voting than my state, and she's [going to] sue my state?" he said. "I mean, come on — that's just silly … come on, Hillary, you know better than that."

In her speech on Thursday, Mrs. Clinton called out by name former Texas Gov. Rick Perry, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush on the issue.

Mr. Perry hit back on Friday, and Mr. Walker's team released a statement from the governor late Thursday: "Hillary Clinton's rejection of efforts to make it easier to vote and harder to cheat not only defies logic, but the will of the majority of Americans. Once again, Hillary Clinton's extreme views are far outside the mainstream."

Kasich Sees Presidential Pathway After Jeb Bush Doesn't Dominate // Bloomberg News // Mark Niquette – June 5, 2015

Jeb Bush has failed to lock in front-runner status for the Republican presidential nomination, opening a door for other candidates, Ohio Governor John Kasich said.

That includes him.

"I really thought that Jeb would blow it out, and he hasn't," Kasich said Friday during a luncheon at a Concord, New Hampshire, law office. "I look around and I say, 'OK, I've got more experience than anybody, I've got a record, so why shouldn't I get out there?'"

Kasich, 63, a two-term governor and former congressman who also was a managing director for Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc. and a Fox television host, said he is getting "closer and closer" to making a decision about running. While he's optimistic about his efforts to raise money and to build an organization for 2016, he hasn't made a final decision, he said.

"Is there anything jumping out right now that says, 'No'? No, nothing yet," Kasich said in an interview.

During stops in New Hampshire on Thursday and Friday, Kasich, who also briefly ran for president in 1999, said he never imagined he would consider another run. He thought Bush, a former Florida governor expected to announce his presidential plans June 15, would 'just suck all of the air out of the room," and that hasn't happened.

"This isn't a criticism of Jeb; it's just, I look at the facts," Kasich said in the interview. "I may be the only one who says this, but look at everybody else's actions -- they think it's wide open."

Breakout Performance

That's true in New Hampshire, which holds the nation's first primary and where Kasich would need a strong performance if he ran.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Typically, a candidate must finish in the top three in New Hampshire to have momentum heading into other contests, said Steve Duprey, a national Republican committeeman from the state and who was a senior adviser to Senator John McCain's 2008 presidential bid.

With no clear front-runner, there could be five or six candidates bunched at the top, he said.

Compared with other governors expected to run, Kasich has a record that would appeal to the state's fiscally conservative voters and independents if he puts in the time to court them, Duprey said.

"This is going to be one of those primaries where it's one of those battles fought living room to living room and coffee shop to coffee shop," Duprey said. "This will be the most hard-fought, grassroots primary that I've ever seen."

Kasich has created a so-called 527 organization, New Day For America, and a website to raise money for travel and other costs as he explores a bid. The officers include former U.S. Senator John Sununu of New Hampshire.

Sour Grapes

The Ohio governor has so far spent most of his time in New Hampshire and South Carolina, though he has scheduled his first Iowa trip June 24 after being frustrated by the caucus system there in the past.

"The system was odd to me, and maybe a little of that was sour grapes, but they've changed the system," he said.

Kasich said no front-runner has emerged because voters are trying to determine who can win and has "real experience."

"It's really interesting for a Republican Party and exciting for the Republican Party to kind of take its time," Kasich said. "Normally, we play 'Whose turn is it next,' and I don't think that's what's happening."

CARSON

Ben Carson's Speaking Career Turned Lucrative Fast, Filing Shows // NYT // Trip Gabriel – June 5, 2015

A speech at the National Prayer Breakfast in 2013 that started rumblings about a Ben Carson presidential campaign also began a lucrative speaking career.

Mr. Carson, a retired neurosurgeon, earned $4.1 million from 141 speeches from early 2014 to last month, according to a personal financial disclosure he filed on Thursday afternoon with the Federal Election Commission.

Mr. Carson planned to continue accepting speaking fees after he announced he was running on May 4, which risked putting him afoul of campaign finance laws.

He said on Sunday he would give four more speeches, booked before he entered the Republican primary race.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"When people have gone through a lot of trouble getting sponsors and selling tables, you don't just walk," Mr. Carson said on ABC's "This Week."

Mr. Carson's total reported income, along with his wife, Candy, was from $8.9 million to $27 million in the 16 months preceding his announcement, according to the disclosure.

Beside speeches, he reported income from $1.1 million to $6 million from book royalties, and from $2 million to $10 million from serving on the boards of two corporations, Kellogg and Costco. He has since resigned those seats. He was also paid from $100,000 to $1 million by the Fox News Network.

Mr. Carson, who in a Quinnipiac poll last week was in a five-way tie for first place for the Republican nomination, has captured voters' attention with conservative views and a personal story of climbing from poverty to the heights of the medical field.

After criticizing President Obama at the 2013 Prayer Breakfast, while the president sat nearby, Mr. Carson retired from Johns Hopkins and took advantage of the flood of speaking offers.

He joined the Washington Speakers Bureau, where his fees ranged from $16,500 to address Dayspring Christian Academy in Lancaster County, Pa., to $44,500 for a speech at the University of the Southwest in Hobbs, N.M.

Another prolific speaker, Hillary Rodham Clinton, who typically earned about $200,000 a speech, far more than Mr. Carson, delivered her last paid address on March 19, a month before announcing her candidacy.

Ben Carson's campaign faces turmoil after staff exits and super PAC chaos // WaPo // Robert Costa & Philip Rucker – June 5, 2015

The presidential bid of Ben Carson, a tea party star who has catapulted into the top tier of Republican contenders, has been rocked by turmoil with the departures of four senior campaign officials and widespread disarray among his allied super PACs.

Carson's associates described a political network in tumult in interviews Friday, saying the retired neurosurgeon's campaign chairman, national finance chairman, deputy campaign manager and general counsel have all resigned since Carson formally launched his bid last month in Detroit. They have not been replaced, campaign officials said.

The moves gutted the core of Carson's apparatus and left the 63-year-old first-time candidate with only a handful of experienced aides at his side as he navigates the fluid, crowded and high-stakes contest for the Republican nomination.

Carson is a hot commodity on the right-wing speaking circuit and has fast become a leading candidate, winning straw votes at conservative gatherings and rising in public polls.

But his campaign has been marked by signs of dysfunction and amateurism, alarming friends and supporters who privately worry that Carson's sprawling circle of associates and boosters is fumbling his opportunity. And, they argue, the candidate has been nonchalant about the unrest.

"Every campaign goes through growing pains as it puts together a leadership team that has to work together and live together through the trying times of a presidential election," said Larry Levy, an attorney who has worked with Carson.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Two independent super PACs designed to help Carson are instead competing directly with Carson's campaign for donations and volunteers, while campaign chairman Terry Giles resigned last month with the intention of forming a third super PAC.

Giles said he intends to try to convince the other two super PACs, called Run Ben Run and One Nation, to cease operations so that all outside efforts would be coordinated through the new group. But with Carson's brand a galvanizing force on the right, there are potentially millions of dollars to be raised off his name and the other super PACs are said to be reluctant to shutter.

"They are going after the same small donors and we've simply got to figure this out or else we are going up against each other the whole time," Giles said. "I'm planning to sit down with them and explain that."

Before the exodus, Carson's operation was mostly controlled by Giles and conservative commentator Armstrong Williams, who for decades has been Carson's business manager, gatekeeper and friend. Giles' exit to the super PAC side, where he will be prohibited from directly coordinating with Carson or his campaign, leaves Williams as the candidate's chief confidant

"Things happen, man," Williams said of the changes. "That's the way life works. You start out with one idea, hoping it all works out, and then you get a better understanding of what needs to happen. Remember, we're not a necessarily a group of political people."

The overlapping super PACs have confused Carson supporters about where to give money. Doug Watts, a Carson campaign spokesman, described Run Ben Run as a rogue operation: "We spend a great deal of time explaining to our supporters, 'They're them, we're us.'"

Watts insisted that "there's no dissatisfaction" with the group's activities and he credited it with helping Carson win a Republican straw poll last month in Oklahoma City after Carson spoke to the Southern Republican Leadership Conference.

"We had Dr. Carson and two staff people," Watts said. "We did not spend a dime on the straw poll. But Run Ben Run, unbeknownst to us, made organizational activity there."

Still, Watts said the "unofficially sanctioned" super PAC is One Nation and that Carson invites supporters to "make their excess contributions there."

Initially, Giles planned on joining One Nation, but Watts said he "abandoned that plan prior to his resignation and talked about the anticipation of a new organization."

Watts said that Carson gave Giles his blessing to leave the campaign, noting that Giles sat in the front row at Carson's May 3 announcement event in Detroit and that the candidate publicly acknowledged his service as chairman.

Federal election laws require a 120-day cooling off period between someone's departure from an official campaign and involvement in any super PAC activities.

Leaving with Giles last month were deputy campaign manager Stephen Rubino, a longtime Giles associate, as well as national finance chairman Jeff Reeter and general counsel Kathy Freberg.

Rubino, a part-time lawyer and farmer, longed to return to his farm, Watts said. “He said to me many times personally, ‘I’m not sure I’m cut out for this in Washington, D.C.,’” he said. As for Freberg, he said she grew tired of the political game. “She’s now in Africa on a safari,” Watts said.

Giles said that Carson believes a lightly-staffed campaign would suffice through this summer and fall. “The Carson campaign, that’s now mostly about ballot access, communications, social media, and getting Dr. Carson around the country,” he said. “That’s about it. It’s all part of the plan.”

But Kellyanne Conway, a GOP pollster who is friendly with Carson’s inner circle, said Carson would need “a strong, in-house campaign team. You can’t off-load everything to a super PAC or onto the shoulders of grassroots supporters and live off the land. Those are the fundamentals.”

Giles and Rubino have not been replaced, Watts said, because “it seemed superfluous.” Asked whether there were other lawyers still advising the Carson operation in her absence, he said, “Give me a break. Yeah, there are campaign attorneys coming out of my ears.”

Barry Bennett, a former strategist for Sen. Rob Portman (R-Ohio), will continue to serve as Carson’s campaign manager, largely taking up the duties once delegated to Giles and Rubino. Ed Brookover, a longtime GOP hand, runs the policy shop.

Williams portrayed Carson as a candidate who is still learning the nuances of politics. He said Carson is studying up on policy issues and is uninterested in campaign mechanics.

On the road, Carson receives hearty receptions, but his associates said he is most content after public events to retreat to a pool table, where he touts the hand-eye coordination that made him a renowned surgeon. He also likes to do brain teasers or play golf.

Carson occasionally drops by his Alexandria campaign headquarters, but his main interaction with staff comes just once a week, at 10 a.m. on Sundays, when he participates in a conference call to go over his schedule for the coming week.

“Dr. Carson doesn’t get involved in the minutia of things,” Williams said. “You have to understand his personality. He’s informed, but this whole process is new to him, and he’s relying on the judgment of others.”

Jindal Slams GOP-Led Congress For Waving ‘White Flag Of Surrender’ On Amnesty, Broken Promises // The Daily Caller // Al Weaver – June 5, 2015

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal took the GOP-controlled Congress to task Friday for their first five months in power, blasting them for their actions on President Barack Obama’s executive action on immigration and Obamacare.

In an interview with conservative radio host Laura Ingraham, Jindal slammed GOP leadership in both chambers for waving the “white flag of surrender” on amnesty, adding that the Congressional GOP is “setting ourselves up for defeat again” by not offering up an alternative to Obamacare.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jindal made the comments on the heels of news that he will be announcing his 2016 intentions on June 24.

“Here’s my concern and skepticism about just getting any Republican in there,” Jindal said when asked if Jeb Bush could make big changes if elected in 2016. “Look at what happened when we took the Senate back. I remember these great, soaring campaign promises last year, it wasn’t that long ago.”

“‘Give us the Senate and we’ll repeal Obamacare. Give us the Senate we’ll stop illegal amnesty. Give us the Senate, we’ll reduce government spending and balance the budget,'” Jindal said imitating those promises. “You know, look what’s happened: White flag of surrender on amnesty. They passed a toothless bill on this Iran bill — actually makes it worse not better in terms of Congressional oversight.

“When you look at Obamacare, they’ve not even passed, they’ve not even shown the American people how they would repeal and replace it, and I’m worried,” Jindal said. “I think the Supreme Court’s going to rule the way that it should. That these states — there there should not be mandates on these states that have a federal exchange, but what I worry about is Republicans in Congress are setting ourselves up for defeat again going out there again with a plan to repeal Obamacare and replace it, and they’re going to put themselves in a corner. That’s why you already hear Republicans saying ‘well, maybe we need to put a band-aid or a patch on it.”

Jindal went on to liken the outset of the 114th Congress to when the GOP controlled the legislative branch during President George W. Bush’s tenure in office.

“At the same time period, when we had a Republican president, a Republican Congress. Thats when we got No Child Left Behind. That’s when we got Part D in Medicare without Medicare reform, without premium support,” Jindal said. “It is absolutely right to criticize President Obama for $18 trillion of debt, but it didn’t just start under President Obama. I think, in part, we have Republicans in D.C. who have just become part of the problem. They want to go along to get along. Boy, I think that’s why we need conservatives.”

Bobby Jindal Keeps Heat on '16 Hopefuls - Lincoln Chafee This Time // Newsweek // Melissa Clyne - June 5, 2015

Though admonished last month by the Louisiana Inspector General’s Office about using his office to launch attacks on presidential candidates, Gov. Bobby Jindal chided former Rhode Island Sen. Lincoln Chafee on Thursday for advocating that America convert to the metric system, The Times-Picayune reports.

"Typical Democrat — wants to make America more European," Jindal spokesman Mike Reed told a reporter who asked about Jindal’s thoughts on Chafee’s support for the metric system. "Gov. Jindal would rather make the world more American."

Chafee, whose political affiliation has evolved from Republican to independent to Democrat, announced this week that he was running for president.

His announcement included the championing of the metric system as a "bold embrace of internationalism" that would "help our economy," according to Politico.

Jindal, who will announce June 24 whether he plans to seek the Republican nomination for the White House, has been an outspoken critic of the field of candidates.

Last month, he fired off a series of attacks on Twitter against Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul, a declared GOP presidential candidate who had pointed his finger at Republican hawks for being behind the rise of the Islamic State (ISIS) jihad group.

"ISIS exists and grew stronger because of the hawks in our party who gave arms indiscriminately," Paul said on MSNBC's "Morning Joe."

"They created these people. ISIS is all over Libya because these same hawks in my party loved — they loved Hillary Clinton's war in Libya. They just wanted more of it."

Jindal took Paul to task, posting on Twitter:

In another, Jindal tweeted:

According to a May 29 article in the Times-Picayune, the state Inspector General's office issued its report after receiving complaints alleging that Jindal's criticisms of Paul had violated the state constitution.

"The Governor's office could have easily avoided such questions by issuing the statement through means that did not involve the use of public funds or employees," the Inspector General's office wrote.

Jindal told the newspaper that he spoke out against Paul's comments because "national security matters are important to people of Louisiana, and I thought it was important for me to share my views on keeping our country safe from the threat of radical terrorists — Islamic terrorists."

Republican Candidates Assail Hillary Clinton on Voting Rights // NYT // Maggie Haberman – June 5, 2015

In a speech Thursday, Mrs. Clinton said that some in the Republican field were "deliberately trying to stop" young people and minorities from exercising their right to vote.

On Friday, Gov. Chris Christie of New Jersey seemed to relish the fight.

"Secretary Clinton doesn't know the first thing about voting rights in New Jersey or in the other states that she attacked," Mr. Christie said, according toThe Record newspaper of New Jersey. "My sense is that she just wants an opportunity to commit greater acts of voter fraud around the country."

Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin said in a statement: "Hillary Clinton's rejection of efforts to make it easier to vote and harder to cheat not only defies logic, but the will of the majority of Americans. Once again, Hillary Clinton's extreme views are far outside the mainstream."

His response represented one of the few times that any of the many Republican candidates in the 2016 field have described Mrs. Clinton's views as so far left as to be outside mainstream politics. For Mrs. Clinton it is familiar territory: "Liberal" was a tag that was often affixed to her as a criticism in the 1990s and when she ran for the United States Senate from New York in 2000.

Rick Perry, the former Texas governor who was also named by Mrs. Clinton, went on Fox News and suggested that being able to vote was no different than needing travel documents.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“She just went into my home state and dissed every person who supports having an identification to either get on an airplane or vote,” Mr. Perry said on Friday.

A spokesman for Jeb Bush, the former Florida governor, did not respond to an email request for comment.

Mrs. Clinton’s no-holds-barred speech on voting rights, calling for automatic registration and sweeping changes to early voting nationally, was a rare time she has invoked her potential rivals, especially by name.

But, just as when she said she would go even further than President Obama has on executive changes to the immigration system, Mrs. Clinton could be putting Republicans in a politically delicate position, since their responses on both issues are unlikely to please Hispanic, African-American and younger voters.

GOP says Clinton dividing Americans over voting rights // AP // Ken Thomas – June 5, 2015

Republicans struck back Friday against Hillary Rodham Clinton's suggestions that they have attempted to disenfranchise voters systematically. They accused the Democratic presidential front-runner of running a divisive campaign and favoring lax controls on voting.

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, a potential GOP presidential candidate, said in Concord, New Hampshire, that Clinton didn't know "the first thing about voting rights in New Jersey," and simply wanted to have an opportunity to "commit greater acts of voter fraud" around the nation.

Another potential Republican rival, Ohio Gov. John Kasich, told Fox News that Clinton was "dividing America" and overlooking the fact that Ohio has 28 days of early voting while her home state of New York doesn't have any. Ohio had 35 days of early voting until he signed a law last year lopping off a week.

"What is she talking about?" Kasich asked. "Don't be running around the country dividing America."

Clinton said Thursday in Houston that a group of current and former Republican governors pursuing the White House has "systematically and deliberately" tried to prevent millions of Americans from voting. Clinton said the changes were aimed at making it more difficult for minority and low-income voters to cast a ballot and outlined steps to expand access to early voting and allow universal, automatic voter registration for young people.

It was the first time as a presidential candidate that Clinton singled out her potential Republican rivals by name, criticizing voting policies of Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, former Texas Gov. Rick Perry and Christie.

Clinton cited Christie for vetoing a bill in New Jersey to extend early voting. She said Bush had conducted a "deeply flawed" purge of eligible voters in Florida by having the names of people who were mistakenly thought to be felons removed from voting rolls.

And she accused Walker of cutting early voting, making it harder for college students to vote, while she said Perry approved laws in Texas that discriminated against minority voters.

Democratic attorneys recently filed legal challenges to voting changes in the presidential battleground states of Ohio and Wisconsin. One of the attorneys involved in the lawsuits is Marc Elias, who is also serving as the Clinton campaign's general counsel. Clinton's campaign is not officially involved in the lawsuits.

Walker, whose state has passed voter ID laws, said in a statement late Thursday that Clinton's "rejection of efforts to make it easier to vote and harder to cheat not only defies logic, but the will of the majority of Americans."

Christie vetoed legislation in 2013 that would have allowed in-person early voting at polling places and he's criticized same-day registration. New Jersey does have a mail-in early-voting system.

Democrats contend that Republicans overstate the incidence of fraudulent voting to justify steps that depress turnout from minority and other hard-to-reach voters, many of whom would support Democratic candidates.

Republicans say Democrats overlook fraud because they want those votes.

Clinton will deliver what her team considers her first major speech next week, in New York, opening a new stage of her campaign. Clinton intends to paint the large Republican field as monolithic on policy in coming months.

Her team bills the New York speech as a campaign kickoff, although she launched her candidacy in April.

Going Negative // US News // Kenneth Walsh – June 5, 2015

The negative phase of the 2016 presidential race has begun. And with the first debates approaching, the contest is likely to turn even more harsh and sharp-edged as the candidates of each major party try to undermine each other and stand out on their own.

On the Republican side, Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida is drawing increasing contrasts between himself and both of his dynastic rivals, Republican Jeb Bush and Democrat Hillary Clinton. "No one is entitled to the presidency, and no candidate has the right to skip the process of laying out a vision simply because he or she has the deepest connections in Washington or the most money in big-dollar donations," Rubio, an announced candidate, wrote recently on his campaign web site. "In this country, what your last name is, what life you were born into, and how much money you have does not determine who you can be, where you can go or what opportunities you can enjoy."

In response, Bush says he is a pragmatic conservative with a strong record of accomplishment as former governor of Florida. Clinton also points to her record of achievement as former first lady, ex-U.S. senator from New York and former secretary of state.

And Sen. Rand Paul, R-Ky., is becoming a political piñata, regularly battered by his opponents, because he has criticized a central tenet of GOP orthodoxy – that the United States must be more interventionist abroad and willing to intervene militarily in other countries. Among Paul's critics is Gov. Bobby Jindal of Louisiana, who is considering a Republican presidential run and says Paul is weak on national defense. In fact, Jindal has hurled against Paul one of the worst epithets available within the GOP – that Paul is like Democratic President Barack Obama as an ambitious first-term senator seeking the White House but lacking the requisite toughness and understanding of America's adversaries to be an effective commander in chief.

This criticism of Paul is echoed by newly announced GOP candidate Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, one of the Senate's leading hawks. In fact, Graham and Paul are immersed in a feud over U.S. foreign policy. "Those who believe we can disengage from the world at large and stay safe by leading from behind, vote for someone else – I am not your man," Graham said during his announcement speech this week in a pointed reference to Paul. "Those who believe the best way to defend ourselves is to lead the world, to make history rather than be overwhelmed by it, I ask for your support."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And former Gov. George Pataki of New York, another announced candidate, blasted Paul for forcing the temporary expiration of some government surveillance programs under the Patriot Act. Pataki said Paul engineered the expiration to impress libertarians and was "simply putting Americans at risk for political reasons."

Paul's response is that his critics are on the wrong side of history and are advocating discredited policies of the past.

On the Democratic side, former Gov. Martin O'Malley of Maryland is needling Clinton and Bush, sounding a theme similar to Rubio's. At the official announcement of his candidacy this week, O'Malley tried to stake out the left wing of his party, arguing that he is more progressive than Clinton, the front runner. O'Malley said he would be more confrontational with Wall Street. "Recently the CEO of Goldman Sachs let his employees know that he'd be just fine with either Bush or Clinton," O'Malley said. "I bet he would!" He told a rally: "Well, I've got news for the bullies of Wall Street. The presidency is not a crown to be passed back and forth, by you, between two royal families. It is a sacred trust to be earned from the American people and exercised on behalf of the people of these United States."

O'Malley is adopting some of the rhetoric used by his mentor, former Sen. Gary Hart, D-Colo., in Hart's future-vs.-past bid for the Democratic nomination in 1984. The Colorado senator nearly upset front runner and former Vice President Walter Mondale, and O'Malley says voters are eager for another insurgency today. O'Malley told the Washington Post, "I think in our own party there is a desire for a new generation of leadership that's more connected to the values of our country and where we're headed."

O'Malley advisers also say he is more of a purist on liberal issues than Clinton is. The former governor supported same-sex marriage and comprehensive immigration reform earlier and more aggressively than Clinton did, and he demonstrated an ability to get things done as governor by signing into law bills allowing same-sex marriage and increasing the minimum wage.

Also criticizing Clinton has been Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, a socialist who is seeking the Democratic nomination. Sanders says the wealth accumulated by Hillary Clinton and her husband Bill Clinton makes it more difficult for her to understand the problems of everyday Americans. "That type of wealth has the potential to isolate you from the reality of the world," Sanders told CNBC.

Both O'Malley and Sanders complain that Clinton has stayed mum on controversial legislation to give Obama fast-track authority to facilitate passage of a huge trade agreement with nations in the Asia-Pacific region. And O'Malley and Sanders say Clinton also should take a position on the trade deal itself, which both of them oppose.

The first Republican presidential debate is scheduled for early August and is sponsored by Fox News. This encounter will give the candidates a high-visibility forum to hammer each other even more. The Democrats will probably hold their first debate in August or September, with the same likelihood of internecine warfare.

U.S. Economy Added 280,000 Jobs in May; Unemployment Rate 5.5% // NYT // Patricia Cohen –June 5, 2015

Employers added 280,000 jobs in May, the Labor Department reported on Friday, blunting worries about the American economy’s momentum after a stretch of lackluster growth earlier this year.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The official unemployment rate ticked up to 5.5 percent, while hourly wages rose 0.3 percent for private sector workers last month.

Although the report provides just a snapshot of the economy and is subject to revision, analysts are looking at this freshest set of figures to help pierce the confusion over whether the economy's contraction of 0.7 percent during the first quarter of 2015 was a blip, partly a casualty of the harsh winter, or evidence of a more fundamental slowdown.

Part of the reason for the mixed assessments is that the recovery from the recession, now reaching its sixth anniversary, has been uneven, lifting the fortunes of some Americans while others languish. As a survey in October on families' financial well-being by the Federal Reserve showed when it was released recently, nearly two-thirds of respondents said they were either "doing O.K." or "living comfortably," with the rest reporting they were "just getting by" or struggling.

"It's a tale of two economies, the economy of the unskilled, and the economy of the semiskilled and the skilled," said Robert A. Funk, chairman and chief executive of Express Employment Professionals, a staffing agency based in Oklahoma City that operates in 49 states.

There is pent-up demand for those with skills, like machinists, engineers and information and technology workers, he said, but those without that edge are continuing to have a tough time.

"We're out here on Main Street, not Wall Street," said Mr. Funk, former chairman of the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City. "We get a feel of medium and small companies and their attitudes. They are reticent to hire because they are not sure which way the economy is going to go."

For those looking for progress, this week brought evidence of modest, if plodding improvements.

A roundup of reports compiled from each of the Federal Reserve's 12 district banks suggested that the overall economy expanded over the previous two months. The survey, known as the Beige Book, found: "Employment levels were up slightly over the reporting period, with some reports of layoffs. Wages rose slightly."

The trade balance also improved in April. The deficit, though still sizable at $40.9 billion, shrank from $50.6 billion in the previous month.

The number of people applying for unemployment insurance also dropped last week, the 13th week in a row that new claims have been below 300,000. Although the four-week moving average edged up slightly to 275,000, it is still near a 15-year low.

Despite low gasoline prices, which leave more money in people's wallets, consumers have remained guarded, choosing to bank their savings rather than spend them. The one exception seems to have been car sales. American automakers sold more than 1.6 million vehicles in May, or 17.8 million on a seasonally adjusted annualized basis. That is the largest single-month total in nearly 10 years.

Wall Street was paying particular attention to the report on Friday because of its potential impact on the Fed's decision about when to raise interest rates above their near-zero levels. This week, James B. Bullard, president of the St. Louis Fed, said that while he expected the economy to improve enough to justify a rate increase this year, the frail first quarter has made everyone doubly cautious.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We should be and are appropriately talking about how to normalize monetary policy," Mr. Bullard said. "On the other hand, you've got near-term concerns — the first-quarter negative G.D.P. number and maybe some consumption numbers, including retail sales — that look weaker than we had anticipated. I think that will all be transient, and it will turn out that we'll have stronger data later in the year, and that will enable us to get going on the normalization process."

On Thursday, the International Monetary Fund asked the Fed to hold off raising rates until the first half of 2016 because of disappointing growth and a lack of inflation.

Most Americans are increasingly optimistic about their economic future, according to the Fed's survey on economic well-being. Still, daily financial challenges manifest themselves in small ways and large. Nearly half of those surveyed, for example, said they lacked the resources to cover an unexpected emergency that cost $400. Nearly one-third said they had skipped some form of medical care because they could not afford it.

And many would increase their incomes if they could: More than one-third of all workers and 49 percent of part-timers said they would prefer to work more hours at their current wage.

Wage stagnation also remains a blot on the recovery's record. "Even a slight increase in year-over-year wage growth would be new and something different," helping to lure back people who had abandoned the work force, said Tara M. Sinclair, an associate professor of economics at George Washington University and an economist at Indeed.com.

Pressure Rises for Higher Taxes // NYT // John Harwood – June 5, 2015

The Democratic presidential candidate Martin O'Malley wants to raise capital gains taxes. His rival Bernie Sanders seeks to tax stock trades and increase personal income tax rates.

Indeed, Mr. Sanders's plan harks back to the Eisenhower-era top rate of over 90 percent — more than twice today's level. Asked whether that rate is obviously too high, Mr. Sanders responded simply, "No."

Their stances partly reflect attempts to outflank Hillary Rodham Clinton in the Democratic race for the presidential nomination. Mrs. Clinton herself is considering a friendly think tank's advice to raise taxes on inherited wealth and close loopholes to collect more from affluent Americans.

But they also reflect a broader shift in tax politics that is rippling through the Republican world, too. Pressure to raise taxes, at least on the wealthy, is rising.

Several developments are fueling that pressure. The Tea Party push to slash spending has lost steam and generated a backlash. Defense hawks want more money for the Pentagon, while other Republicans seek additional cash for highway projects. The largest potential targets for further cuts, Social Security and Medicare for the elderly, are hardly politically inviting.

At the same time, Republicans' growing emphasis on reducing debt and deficits has curbed the appeal of supply-side tax cuts. So has the decline in the top income tax rate to 39.6 percent, from the 70 percent level when Ronald Reagan won the presidency on a tax-cutting platform.

Moreover, both parties, at least rhetorically, have embraced the need for Washington to address stagnant middle-class wages and rising income inequality. Enacting significant remedies — whether through new middle-class tax benefits or spending programs — requires cash Washington doesn't have.

"All those things point in the direction of revenues," said Senator Sheldon Whitehouse, Democrat of Rhode Island.

Mr. Whitehouse is a co-sponsor of "Fair Share" tax legislation that would collect an additional $70 billion from wealthy taxpayers by closing loopholes. He also backs a new tax on carbon emissions, though his motivation is environmental rather than budgetary; he would return tax proceeds to businesses through lower corporate rates and to individuals through tax rebates and other benefits.

Recent history suggests the carbon tax faces a steep uphill fight, even as climate change assumes a larger role on the political stage. Nor is there much prospect of massive increases in marginal tax rates, though Thomas Piketty, the French economist whose recent book accelerated the income inequality debate, argues that top rates could reach 80 percent without harming the economy.

Yet Mrs. Clinton has not ruled out an increase in the 39.6 percent rate that her husband and President Obama both signed into law.

A recent economic report from the Center for American Progress, the think tank founded by her campaign chairman, John D. Podesta, lays out other options, like increasing "effective" tax rates by curbing tax shelters for the affluent.

Antipathy toward taxes remains a core tenet of Republican economic policy.

When Republican Senate candidates in last year's midterm elections shied away from tax-cutting proposals, the conservative lobbyist Grover Norquist explained that they would revive the issue as "tax reform" after winning full control of Congress.

But there's no sign of serious movement on the issue.

Marco Rubio, a Republican presidential candidate, has cast deficit concerns aside by advocating tax cuts for average families and high earners alike — including the elimination of capital gains and estate taxes. But he has not yet attempted to enact his plan.

Another Republican candidate, Lindsey Graham, says his party needs to back higher taxes as part of a budget deal with Democrats. A third, Jeb Bush, promises a tax reform plan but has drawn attention to the issue in a different way.

Mr. Norquist has long goaded Republican politicians, including Mr. Bush's older brother George W. Bush, to formally "pledge" opposition to all tax increases. Jeb Bush refuses to sign the pledge.

Senate Rejects Extending Veterans Benefits To Married Gay Couples And Their Kids // HuffPo // Jennifer Bendery – June 4, 2015

The Senate quietly rejected legislation Thursday that would have extended certain veterans' benefits to married same-sex couples and their children who live in states where their marriage isn't recognized.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

During debate on the 2016 National Defense Authorization Act, Sen. Jeanne Shaheen (D-N.H.) proposed amending the federal statute that prevents the Department of Veterans Affairs from granting comprehensive benefits to same-sex couples in states that don't recognize a same-sex marriage that was legally performed in a different state.

Her amendment failed 53-42, seven votes shy of the 60 votes needed to pass. None of the Senate Republicans running for president voted for it. Sens. Rand Paul (Ky.) and Ted Cruz (Texas) opposed it, while Sens. Marco Rubio (Fla.) and Lindsey Graham (S.C.) did not vote.

Shaheen called it "tremendously disappointing" that the Senate would deny benefits to people who put their lives on the line for their country.

"Veterans served their country bravely, and yet some are deprived of the very rights they risked their lives to protect," she said in an email. "The impact of this discrimination is real. Monthly benefits are less; spouses and children are not eligible for medical care at the VA; and families are not eligible for the same death benefits."

Because of restrictions in federal law, veterans in same-sex marriages who live in states that don't honor their marriage receive smaller monthly disability payments and aren't eligible to qualify for a VA home loan with their spouse. In some cases, these veterans' spouses and kids are also ineligible for VA medical care.

It's not the first time the Senate has voted to change this law. Shaheen introduced the same amendment in March, during debate on the budget, and the amendment passed 57-43. Only 51 votes were required to attach amendments to that bill. But the budget resolution is non-binding, meaning those votes were about making a statement on an issue rather than affecting law.

The Supreme Court is expected to issue a major decision later this month on whether same-sex couples have a constitutional right to marry. If they rule yes, then all states will be required to offer marriage licenses to gay couples and all states will have to recognize same-sex marriages performed in other states.

U.S. Was Warned of System Open to Cyberattacks // NYT // David e. Sanger, Julie Hirschfeld Davis & Nicole Perlroth – June 5, 2015

The inspector general at the Office of Personnel Management, which keeps the records and security clearance information for millions of current and retired federal employees, issued a report in November that essentially described the agency's computer security system as a Chinese hacker's dream.

But by the time the report was published, Chinese hackers had already cleaned out tens of thousands of files on sensitive security clearances, and were preparing for a much broader attack that ultimately obtained detailed personal information on at least four million current and former government employees. Even today, the agency is struggling to patch numerous vulnerabilities.

A number of administration officials on Friday painted a picture of a government office struggling to catch up, with the Chinese ahead of them at every step.

The agency did not possess an inventory of all the computer servers and devices with access to its networks, and did not require anyone gaining access to information from the outside to use the kind of basic authentication techniques that most Americans use for online banking. It did not regularly scan for vulnerabilities in the system, and found that 11 of the 47 computer systems that were supposed to be certified as safe for use last year were not "operating with a valid authorization."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Workers outside the Office of Personnel Management. Its computer system was hit by attackers. Credit James Lawler Duggan/Reuters

The problems were so severe for two systems that hosted the databases used by the Federal Investigative Service, which is responsible for the background investigations for officials and contractors who are issued security clearances, that the inspector general argued for temporarily shutting them down because the security flaws "could potentially have national security implications."

Hackers in China apparently figured that out months before the report was published. Last summer a breach was detected that appeared aimed directly at the security clearance records — information that could help a determined hacker gain access to email or other accounts belonging to those entrusted with the nation's secrets.

While upgrades were underway, a much broader attack occurred, apparently starting in December. Before it was detected, personal information on at least four million people was apparently downloaded by a patient, well-equipped adversary — and the number is likely to grow.

As one senior former government official who once handled cyberissues for the administration, who would not speak on the record because it could endanger the person's role on key advisory committees, said on Friday, "The mystery here is not how they got cleaned out by the Chinese. The mystery is what took the Chinese so long."

Researchers and government officials have determined that the Chinese group that attacked the office was probably the same one that seized millions of records held by the health care firms Anthem and Primera. Based on the forensics, experts believe the attackers were not part of the People's Liberation Army, whose Third Department oversees much of the military's cyberintelligence gathering. Rather they believe the group is privately contracted, though the exact affiliation with the Chinese government is not known.

For the Obama administration, which came to office holding East Room events on cybersecurity and pressing Congress, for years, to pass legislation that would allow the private sector to share information with the government, what has happened at the Office of Personnel Management can only be described as a case study in bureaucratic lethargy and poor security practices.

In the most egregious case cited by the inspector general, outsiders entering the system were not subjected to "multifactor authentication" — the systems that, for example, require a code that is sent to a cellphone to be entered before giving access to a user. Asked about that in an interview, Donna Seymour, the chief information officer at the Office of Personnel Management, said that installing such gear in the government's "antiquated environment" was difficult and very time consuming, and that her agency had to perform "triage" to determine how to close the worst vulnerabilities.

The agency now plans to install two-step authentication across its network, Ms. Seymour said. A longtime data security official, she also defended the decision to ignore the inspector general's advice to shut down two systems that contain the security clearance information. Ms. Seymour said that the investigators were using an outdated assessment of the security measures — and that the agency was in the process of getting tighter controls when the intrusion happened. Another senior official said that with the agency under pressure to clear a huge backlog of security clearances, halting the process was "a nonstarter" with Congress.

During the installation of new security scanning software, officials said, they found evidence of the broad downloading of millions of files.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But administration officials said a lack of management focus on the problems contributed to the slow response — combined with a lack of focus on protecting systems that are not part of the national security infrastructure but that contain large amounts of data. And a number of administration officials in interviews on Friday painted a picture of Chinese adversaries who appear to be building huge databases of information on American citizens, useful for intelligence gathering and other purposes.

"They didn't go to sell the data, which is what criminal groups usually do," said James Lewis, an expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "It's biographic databases that really give an intelligence benefit — and that get into an opponent's skin." Such databases indicate where a government official was posted, and security clearance information would list their foreign contacts — useful if there was an effort to track down Chinese citizens in contact with Americans.

The chronology of attacks against American targets matches China's stated economic and strategic objectives, members of Congress were told in briefings held by the Department of Homeland Security and other agencies. "I'm angry and frustrated that we are at a place where this kind of attack can be successful," said Rep. Jim Langevin, a Rhode Island Democrat who sits on both a subcommittee on cyberissues and the Armed Services Committee. The attackers, he said, "could have been inside the systems for weeks or months." In fact, investigators believe they were there for at least three months, before being detected in April.

Government officials in the United States have been tracking several such privately contracted Chinese groups since 2008 and believe they operate at the behest of the state. One, based out of Guangzhou in southern China, has been tied to thousands of attacks on victims in the United States, Britain, Canada, Europe, Russia and Africa that develop missile, satellite, space and nuclear propulsion technology.

At the White House, officials were struggling to explain on Friday how the breach could have happened after warnings from the inspector general and others. Michael Daniel, the White House's top cyberofficial, declined to speak on the record about the attack, and Lisa Monaco, who has been handling cyberissues as one of Mr. Obama's top national security officials, declined to be interviewed.

"The threat that we face is ever-evolving," said Josh Earnest, the White House press secretary. "We understand that there is this persistent risk out there. We take this very seriously."

Mr. Earnest said Mr. Obama's efforts to push legislation would bolster the nation's data.

"We need the United States Congress to come out of the Dark Ages and actually join us here in the 21st century to make sure that we have the kinds of defenses that are necessary to protect a modern computer system," he said.

U.S. Airstrikes Whack One Thousand Islamic State Fighters a Month, Air Force General Says // Foreign Policy // Paul MCleary – June 5, 2015

The top U.S. air commander in the Middle East said Friday that the American-led coalition bombing Islamic State fighters in Iraq and Syria are "removing over 1,000 enemy fighters a month from the battlefield" — adding yet another voice to the string of military and civilian leaders who have put a body count on a war where body counts aren't supposed to matter.

"The number is significant, but it's also only a single indicator," Lt. Gen. John Hesterman told reporters by phone from his headquarters in Qatar.

The number of dead extremists isn't as important as reforming Iraqi governance or strangling the finances of the Islamic State, he said, falling more closely in line with the White House. "But we're taking the enemy off the battlefield at a great rate, and you can count on that," Hesterman said.

Critics say one of the biggest failures of Washington's war plan is the refusal to put U.S. forward air controllers on the ground with Iraqi troops to more effectively call in airstrikes on Islamic State positions. Republican Sens. Lindsey Graham and John McCain have made a cottage industry out of calling for the deployment of joint terminal attack controllers — or JTACs — to Iraq, and some retired military officials have also grumbled about the lack of eyes on the ground.

JTACs are operating in air command centers spread throughout Iraq, Hesterman said, where they watch live feeds piped back from drones and fighter jets circling enemy positions instead of embedding with Iraqi troops.

Speaking to CNN on Friday, Air Force Chief of Staff Gen. Mark Welsh said while JTACs are most important in urban fights where more precise airstrikes are essential to avoid civilian casualties, persistent aerial surveillance coverage is effective in the more open areas of Iraq and Syria.

Hesterman also downplayed reports of an air strike near the city of Kirkuk on Wednesday that flattened a jihadi car bomb-making factory. He said U.S. aircraft dropped a "fairly small weapon" on the building, located in an industrial area, which triggered a secondary explosion from the bomb-making material stored inside. While that second explosion essentially flattened the entire industrial area — and the boom was heard dozens of miles away — so far there is no evidence of civilian casualties, Hesterman said.

Initial reports said dozens of civilians were killed and injured. And a U.S. Central Command spokesperson on Thursday told FP it had received reports of civilian casualties near the site and was prepared to investigate if they could be confirmed.

The overall bombing campaign shows few signs of letting up anytime soon. After 10 months and $2.6 billion spent by Washington, Islamic State forces continue their ground war against Iraqi troops and Shiite militias in a bloody struggle around the edges of Anbar province, which the jihadis own almost completely.

Hesterman and other U.S. officials insist the daily airstrikes are key to buying the Iraqi Army time to regain footing after a string of humiliating defeats in Mosul, Fallujah, and Ramadi. The strikes also create space for the estimated 3,000 U.S. troops on the ground to retrain demoralized Iraqi Army units they originally trained just a few years ago.

But even a former fighter pilot like Hesterman admitted that "air power doesn't hold and govern territory — Iraq will have to do that" with troops on the ground.

"Some competent ground forces are going to have to go peel" the jihadis out of the towns and villages in which they're hiding, he said.

Jeb Bush and the campaign money fountain // CNN // Errol Louis – June 5, 2015

Just as reformers have often warned and long feared, money has swamped the American political system, placing a critical amount of the 2016 presidential campaign in the hands of private interests, outside of regulation and largely beyond accountability. More than a year away from the 2016 election, it seems clear the new cash-driven strategies are bad for democracy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The sums involved are staggering -- we'll look at some of the numbers in a minute -- but to understand the profound transformation of politics we're watching, consider the recent maneuvering of Republican ex-Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida, who appears hell-bent on maximizing the amount of political money in his corner.

For months, Bush has been holding political fundraisers, delivering speeches and hiring advisers, but also coyly denying he's made a decision about whether to seek the White House in 2016. In one case, he slipped up and acknowledged the ruse: "I'm running for president in 2016, and the focus is gonna be about how we — if I run — how do you create high, sustained economic growth, where more people have a chance at earned success?" he said on NBC.

Note the way Bush immediately tried to clean up the gaffe -- "if I run" -- as if anybody seriously doubts that this son and brother of two presidents plans to make his own bid for the White House. The verbal contortions -- and the entire structure of Bush's nascent campaign -- are built around the new rules that allow candidates to raise unlimited funds for so-called super PACs, political action committees that can raise and spend unlimited amounts of money supporting and attacking candidates without disclosing who's behind the activity.

So we've seen Bush crisscrossing the country raising money for a super PAC called Right to Rise that's believed to have raised $100 million that will likely get spent helping likely candidate Bush and attacking his enemies. Bush isn't alone: Virtually every serious Republican candidate for office, including Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, Sen. Rand Paul, ex-Sen. Rick Santorum and Dr. Ben Carson is affiliated with one super PAC or another.

On the Democratic side, Hillary Clinton has called for strong campaign finance limits, by constitutional amendment if necessary -- but then gave in to reality and is expected to connect with Priorities USA, a super PAC created by supporters of President Obama.

There's a catch to these potentially bottomless money fountains. By law, they can't coordinate with campaigns after a candidate has officially declared he or she is running. There's also a convoluted restriction on what an official candidate can do for his or her super PAC: Candidates can meet with donors, but not ask for more than $5,000. Such pitches can be made to the donors, but not in the candidate's presence.

The first problem with this system is that it encourages, and even rewards, a kind of dishonesty by candidates. "What we're seeing is effectively a farce being played out here, where each of these candidates — in every sense of the word — is avoiding the longstanding requirements of federal election law," is how Trevor Potter, who served as a high-ranking official in the two presidential campaigns of Sen. John McCain, put it to National Journal. "It's very much a wink and a nod, we all know this, this is a game."

The game was created by a string of Supreme Court rulings that unraveled legal restrictions on political donors. Since the most important of these decisions, the 2007 ruling in Citizens United v. FEC, money has gushed into American politics.

In 2008, the year after Citizens United, more than $300 million from PACs and individual contributions was spent on the race for president. Four years later, that number more than tripled to over $1 billion and some predict spending for 2016 could edge toward $10 billion. The overwhelming majority of these new dollars will be from super PACs.

The flood of money and wink-and-nod rules have led, predictably, to corruption. Some of it is old-fashioned and obvious: Earlier this year, the U.S. Justice Department announced its first criminal conviction of a political consultant for violating the rule requiring separation of PACs and official campaign activity. Tyler Harber, who was working for a congressional campaign in Virginia, created a super PAC, then directly coordinated its activities with the campaign. Harber also spent over $300,000 in PAC money with a printing firm that kicked a fat percentage back to him personally, and lied about the whole matter when the FBI came knocking.

Harber, set to be sentenced this month, may be the first of many campaign operatives to abuse the money flood the Supreme Court set off. There's also a broader corruption taking place. The spectacle of candidates lining up to kiss the ring of Las Vegas billionaire Sheldon Adelson at an event earlier this year is being repeated by the Koch brothers, industrialists with a deep, vested interest in limiting taxes and regulation on their empire. The Kochs and some of their big-donor allies reportedly plan to spend $889 million on the 2016 election.

In the Citizens United decision, Justice Anthony Kennedy wrote that "the appearance of influence or access, furthermore, will not cause the electorate to lose faith in our democracy."

Every indication suggests Kennedy's prediction has turned out to be dead wrong. Last fall, even as more money than ever poured into the political system, America saw the lowest voter turnout level in 72 years, and 84% of Americans say money has too much influence over politics, according to a recent CBS News-New York Times poll. And 85% say the campaign finance system needs a complete overhaul.

Voters know, even if the Supreme Court doesn't, that we need to contain, control or scrap the current PAC-driven system. What should be a time for national debate about the pressing issues facing the country is turning into a kind of cattle auction. America deserves better.

Clinton goes bold on voting rights // MSNBC // Steve Benen – June 5, 2015

Before Hillary Clinton's speech on voting rights yesterday, the political world already had some sense that she intended to endorse a pretty progressive vision. The Democratic campaign told reporters in advance, for example, that Clinton would back a 20-day early-voting window for every state in the nation.

But as Rachel noted on the show last night, the Democratic frontrunner ended up going much further than expected. That's true on policy grounds, where Clinton endorsed a plan for universal registration …

"So today I am calling for universal, automatic voter registration. Everyone, every young man or young woman, in every state in the union should be automatically registered to vote when they turn eighteen – unless they actively choose to opt-out."

… and it's true on political grounds, where Clinton blasted Republicans, by name, for their ugly national voter-suppression campaign.

"Here in Texas, former Governor Rick Perry signed a law that a federal court said was actually written with the purpose of discriminating against minority voters. He applauded when the Voting Rights Act was gutted, and said the lost protections were 'outdated and unnecessary.'

"But Governor Perry is hardly alone in his crusade against voting rights. In Wisconsin, Governor Scott Walker cut back early voting and signed legislation that would make it harder for college students to vote. In New Jersey, Governor Christie vetoed legislation to extend early voting. And in Florida, when Jeb Bush was governor, state authorities conducted a deeply flawed purge of voters before the presidential election in 2000. […]

"What part of democracy are they afraid of?"

You could almost hear voting-rights advocates nationwide applauding in unison. Automatic, universal registration, for example, is seen as one of the most consequential of all possible reforms – and voting-rights opponents on the right have yet to come up with an argument against it.

But stepping back and looking at this in the broader context, it's worth appreciating just how often Clinton has exceeded expectations lately.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In Houston yesterday, voting supporters expected Clinton to deliver encouraging remarks, but she went much further, throwing her support behind a bold national agenda.

In Las Vegas last month, immigration-reform proponents expected Clinton to express support for reform, but she went beyond their expectations and endorsed a far more ambitious approach.

As we talked about at the time, the fear among many on the left was that Clinton, without any real pressure from a primary challenger, would aim for the center and effectively run a general-election campaign for a year and a half. No one would pull the former Secretary of State to the left, so she simply wouldn't bother.

But as her candidacy takes shape, note how consistently she's positioned herself as a progressive champion of late. Clinton delighted much of the left, for example, with her remarks on criminal-justice reform in April The Democratic base was equally pleased to hear about Clinton's 50-state strategy, her willingness to buck Wall Street, and her consideration of a constitutional amendment on campaign financing.

And now Clinton has done it again on voting rights.

Some critics on the left will likely note, with cause, that she's adopted a far more progressive vision than the one she used to espouse. There's some truth to that, though where she is arguably matters more than where she was. President Obama has helped shift the national debate to the left a bit on many of these key issues; the Democratic coalition has become more unified around a progressive agenda; much of the American mainstream is far more likely to embrace the left's proposals than it was eight years ago; and Clinton has clearly evolved on these issues, ending up right where most of her party – and much of her country – want her to be.

Hillary Sides With Democracy // Bloomberg News // Jonathan Bernstein – June 5, 2015

Hillary Clinton's call for universal automatic voter registration is a major positive development in the voting wars. She puts the national Democratic Party squarely behind Oregon's recent innovative registration law.

As Cass Sunstein says at View, Americans don't need to register with the government to be entitled to other rights; voting shouldn't be any different.

It's pretty simple: If we want everyone to participate, then voting should be easy. Voter registration in the U.S. is a real, and unnecessary, hurdle. That's no coincidence: Registration was originally set up around the turn of the previous century in part by those concerned that the wrong kinds of people (mostly recent immigrants from southern and eastern Europe) would vote.

There are plenty of ideas to make voting easier, but removing registration as a hurdle is the big one, on both a practical and theoretical level.

As a practical matter, political scientists have repeatedly found that making registration easy will increase turnout. Indeed, the evidence when it comes to some voting reforms (early and absentee voting, making Election Day a holiday) is mixed. Some political scientists find "substitution" effects -- in many cases, early voting just allows people who would vote anyway to do so at more convenient times, but it doesn't encourage new voters to participate (for a review of the evidence, see this new paper). But automatic or simpler registration works.

To me, however, the strongest arguments are based on democratic theory. Democracy, a system of government in which people rule themselves, is extremely difficult even with the best intentions. A core problem is that people have different resources -- money, of course, but also skills that are politically valuable, time available for political action, and even interest in government. Universal suffrage is a partial remedy, but that only works if voting is easily and equally accessible.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That's why registration is so corrosive. Even if it's not much of a barrier, those who are deterred are almost certainly the same people who lose out in a system that cannot (and in my view should not) help but reward those with more resources. Voting itself should be easy for the same reasons, but registration holds a special status as the entryway to politics.

Granted, there is a partisan component to voting as an issue. Democrats favor easier voting because they think it will help them, which is why Republicans oppose it. The evidence is that evencompulsory voting wouldn't make much of a difference (see Jamelle Bouie and Greg Sargent for the politics of automatic registration as an election issue).

Is fraud a concern? I don't think so. Yes, people could find ways to beat an automatic system, but they can find ways to beat the current system, too. Fraud is an unfortunate but unavoidable byproduct. If we want a bigger military, we're going to get more procurement fraud; if we want to make it easy to vote, some may try to abuse that.

To me, it's simple. Policies that make it easy to vote are good for democracy; policies that make it hard aren't. I'll support anything, even selective measures, that make it easier to vote. After all, if both parties reduce voting barriers for their supporters, eventually we'll get to the right place. Universal automatic registration has the virtue of not being selective. It's the right reform, and kudos to Clinton for moving her once-indifferent party in that direction.

Why Hillary Clinton Must Back a LGBT Full Civil Rights Law for Her Own Sake // HuffPo // Michelangelo Signorile – June 5, 2015

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), running for the Democratic nomination for the presidency, wants to amend the 1964 Civil Rights Act to include gay and transgender people, assuring a federal law that would ban discrimination in employment, housing, public accommodations, education and all spheres of American life, with no broad religious exemption. In 1996, he was one of only 67 House members to vote against the Defense of Marriage Act (DOMA), which President Bill Clinton signed into law.

Sanders' fellow Democratic presidential contender and former Maryland governor, Martin O'Malley, was at the vanguard of gubernatorial leadership on marriage equality, one of the few governors to spearhead and sign a marriage equality bill into law in 2012, and then fervently campaign in a statewide referendum to ratify it.

Lincoln Chafee, the former U.S. senator and Rhode Island governor, who has now announced a run for the Democratic nomination for the presidency, supported marriage equality as far back as 2004 -- when he was a Republican! -- and similarly pushed and signed a marriage bill into law in his state in 2013. Chafee also said this week that the Pentagon's ban on open transgender military service should be lifted.

And what are we hearing from Hillary Clinton nowadays? Well, she finally said in her own words that marriage for gays and lesbians is a constitutional right -- just two months back -- having previously left that to a campaign spokesperson, while just last year she was still saying it was a state issue, in line with what many Republican candidates say now. And she issued a vague LGBT Pride Month proclamation that said that the work toward equality "is far from finished" without offering any specifics -- like amending the Civil Rights Act, or fully lifting the ban on trans service or creating a whole new civil rights law for LGBT people that does both and more.

It's true that Hillary Clinton, as secretary of state, gave an important, groundbreaking speech in Geneva in 2011, pronouncing that LGBT rights are human rights, taking on brutal anti-LGBT regimes abroad. But that was then, and while we all deeply care about our brothers and sisters overseas, there is so much that needs to be done in the U.S. for LGBT people that an American presidential candidate could promise right now.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And at a time when Clinton's Democratic rivals are exploiting a dip in her approval numbers, Clinton should be going on the offensive as the candidate fighting for full equality during a civil rights movement of our time. That would not only energize progressives in the party, it would speak to younger voters, including independents, who she'll surely need. And it's in stark contrast to just about every GOP candidate, most of whom have supported discriminatory "religious freedom" laws and surely do not back anti-discrimination legislation for LGBT people.

It's baffling that Clinton hasn't done this, considering the full force with which she's taken on the issue of immigration, promising to sign executive orders more far-reaching than even the controversial ones President Obama has signed, and the way she took on the voting rights issue yesterday, calling for 20 days of early voting nationwide.

It's likely true that Clinton's slowness on LGBT rights in the past was because, as secretary of state, she couldn't get ahead of the president, who had to be pushed himself on the issue. But even long after President Obama decided not to defend DOMA in court and came out for marriage equality, and after she left the administration, Clinton was still late to the game on marriage.

More than that, Hillary Clinton, rightly or wrongly, carries the baggage of her husband, Bill, who signed both "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" and DOMA into law. She has to be twice as good on LGBT rights as everyone else just to counter that past, as unfair as that may seem. Instead, she has been defensive of Bill Clinton on the issue rather than distancing herself. While Hillary, like Bill, came to oppose DOMA and called on the Supreme Court to overturn it, for example, she, like Bill, has defended the signing of the bill into law in 1996, spinning out a narrative about how it was believed DOMA would satisfy the anti-gay crowd and blunt a possible constitutional amendment banning gay marriage.

As I've pointed out before, this is false, as there was no talk of a constitutional amendment that early on. Certainly I don't expect Hillary Clinton to say, as I have, that DOMA was a stain on Bill Clinton's presidency. But surely she can be more forceful in being out front on LGBT rights now. And, again, that's doubly true if she wants to stand out from her opponents.

It's likely that Clinton's campaign is taking advice from Beltway gay operatives. That's a mistake because many were wrong the last time around as well, only to see LGBT energy and support shift to Obama, because he spoke more forcefully on the issues. She needs a difference course this time. She could begin by giving a speech putting her full support behind a comprehensive federal LGBT civil rights bill, like the one that Sen. Merkley (D-Ore.) is set to introduce that would ban discrimination in housing, employment and public accommodations, including in the 29 states that have no statewide protections without broad religious exemptions. She could explain how she's going to fight for it in a Republican-dominated Congress that will surely beat such a bill back for years to come. Or she can call for amending the 1964 Civil Rights Act as Sen. Sanders has, and a go a few steps better, calling for lifting the ban on transgender service, pushing for passage of anti-bullying legislation and getting a law passed that end "ex-gay" therapy.

Most of all, Clinton has got to get away from empty platitudes. Things have moved at light speed, and we're way beyond the time when having a gay couple or two in your campaign video is enough, or where a vague Pride proclamation with no teeth suffices. We should be hearing concrete details from Hillary Clinton on how she is going to be a forceful champion of LGBT rights, both for the sake of equality and for the sake her own campaign.

Republicans' revisionist history on Iraq // The Hill // Diana Ohlbaum – June 5, 2015

In the wake of former Gov. Jeb Bush's (R-Fla.) bungled responses to predictable questions about Iraq, Republican strategists are rolling out a specious new argument: In essence, that all was well in Iraq at the end of the George W. Bush administration, and President Obama messed it up. Charles Krauthammer calls it "the abandonment of 2011," blaming the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria's (ISIS) recent advances on the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq at the end of 2011.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This argument flies so completely in the face of history and logic that it rivals the way Vice President Cheney intentionally misled Congress and the American public with false, exaggerated and unsubstantiated claims that Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein possessed weapons of mass destruction. Those misrepresentations led us into a war that 75 percent of the American public now says was not worth fighting. The hawks' new line is designed to get us back into it.

Let's start by remembering that the 2007 surge was intended as a temporary build-up to buy time, not as a prelude to permanent occupation. It was President George W. Bush who signed the security agreement with Iraq that set a date of Dec. 31, 2011 for all U.S. forces to withdraw from the country. And despite the U.S. success in holding up its side of the bargain — reducing levels of violence in order to create space for political progress — the Iraqi government remained unwilling or unable to do its part.

Second, we must acknowledge our own role in giving rise to ISIS. Almost all of its higher-ups were members of Hussein's security forces, disbanded under the de-Baathification policy of the Bush administration. Set loose in society with arms, training and grievances, but no jobs or income, these sacked officers formed the core of the Iraqi insurgency. And it was in U.S.-run detention camps that terrorist leaders like Abu Bakr al-Baghdadi, the head of ISIS, did their best recruiting.

Third, it is clear that leaving U.S. troops in for longer, or returning them now, would not essentially change the fundamentals of the conflict. ISIS and other extremist forces are expanding, not for lack of powerful enemies, but because those enemies are themselves so abhorrent. The repressive, violent and corrupt regimes in Syria and Iran are the chief antagonists and targets of ISIS. By inserting ourselves into this fight, we unavoidably strengthen the very regimes we find so repugnant and so threatening to U.S. interests in the region.

Strengthening Iran was, in fact, our principal achievement by invading Iraq in the first place. Before considering another ill-advised move in the region, we ought to consider the secondary and tertiary impacts of the application of military power. For instance, even if we had the ability to crush ISIS in Iraq and Syria, which is doubtful, it might only have the effect of splintering and scattering extremists across the globe, making a coordinated effort against them far more complicated.

As Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Gen. Martin Dempsey said in his testimony before Congress last fall, "there is no military solution" to ISIS; they "will only be defeated or destroyed once they are rejected by the population in which they hide." It may be difficult for us to understand why, as Defense Secretary Ashton Carter admitted, the Iraqi army lacks the will to fight, but if $26 billion and nearly a decade of effort didn't work, then it's time to step back and reexamine our assumptions.

The fact that the Iraqi army isn't standing up to ISIS doesn't mean that the United States can or should do the job for them. In fact, precisely the opposite: All we can reasonably do is help the Iraqis build a state worth fighting for.

Hillary Clinton's call for easier voting is self-serving, but so what? // LA Times // Michael Mcgough – June 5, 2015

Was Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton’s call this week for radically more convenient voting self-serving? Yes, in two ways.

If you believe that it should be easier to vote, the fact that Democrats would benefit is irrelevant.

If Clinton’s proposals for expanded early voting, automatic voter registration for 18-year-olds and a return to preclearance were adopted, she and other Democrats likely would be the beneficiaries. But so what? If you believe that it should be easier to vote, the fact that Democrats would benefit is irrelevant. The challenge for Republicans is to try harder to court the young and minority voters who are disproportionately discouraged from voting by current election laws.

Clinton's speech was self-serving in another, subtler way. By accusing Republicans of "systematically and deliberately trying to stop millions of American citizens from voting," Clinton arguably guaranteed that Republicans would react in an equally partisan way -- as they promptly did.

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie suggested that Clinton "wants an opportunity to commit greater acts of voter fraud around the country." Former Texas Gov. Rick Perry suggested that, in criticizing his state's requirement that voters show photo IDs, Clinton "dissed every person who supports having an identification to either get on an airplane or vote."

Portraying access to the ballot box as a partisan issue arguably undermines the effort to win bipartisan support for the measures Clinton proposed. It also could lead some independent voters to shrug cynically over what seems to be a battle between vested interests, not a matter of principle.

But enactment of the reforms Clinton endorsed is unlikely in the near future, either in the Republican-controlled Congress or in states where the GOP holds sway. By picking a fight with Republicans, Clinton probably galvanized Democratic voters, including the "people of color, poor people and young people" she accused the Republicans of disenfranchising. Changes in the law can come later.

Obama's Sanctions Chief to Defend Iran Deal in Israel

President Obama's sanctions chief will arrive in Israel on Friday to defend the nuclear containment deal with Iran and try to reassure a government and public deeply opposed to the accord that the United States is still prepared to inflict severe financial penalties on Tehran for its sponsorship of terrorism and support for military proxies. The Obama aide, Adam J. Szubin, the top Treasury Department official who helped negotiate the accord between Iran and six world powers, will meet with Israeli government officials and foreign policy experts to make his case during a three-day trip, administration officials announced on Thursday. It is part of Mr. Obama's full-throated effort to build support for the agreement, which faces a vote of disapproval in Congress within weeks.

UN Envoy: US will be Isolated if Iran Deal Rejected

The United States will be isolated on the world stage and its influence diminished if Congress rejects the Iran nuclear deal, the US ambassador to the United Nations has warned. In an editorial published by Politico, Samantha Power argued that a "no" vote from Congress would make it more difficult for the United States to drum up support for sanctions and partner with like-minded countries to confront crises. "If the United States rejects this deal, we would instantly isolate ourselves from countries that spent nearly two years working with American negotiators to hammer out its toughest provisions," Power wrote in a piece posted late Wednesday.

PA Continues Large-Scale Arrests of Hamas Members

At least 25 Palestinians identified with Hamas were arrested last week by security forces of the Palestinian Authority in the West Bank. This brings the total number of Hamas members or supporters held in Palestinian jails to 70. Seven were arrested late Tuesday night and five over the following two days. The arrests were made in Hebron, Nablus, Bir Zeit and Jenin. The Palestinian authority rejects claims that these are political detentions, saying that they are based on suspicions of possession of illegal weapons or of funds intended for illegal purposes. A Hamas source told Haaretz that ridiculous charges were filed against a few people (such as belonging to a cult), but that "some of those arrested were considering actions against the occupation."

UN to Decide on Whether to Raise Pal. Flag at HQ

A draft resolution was presented to the United Nations on Thursday to request that the Palestinian flag be raised the next time world leaders convene at UN headquarters, according to AFP. The resolution was presented in advance of the annual 193-nation UN General Assembly set for September 25. It originally included a request for the Vatican flag to fly as well, but was removed at the Vatican's insistence. A vote on the resolution, sponsored by 21 countries, will take place September 15. Among the co-sponsors are Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Algeria and Jordan.

Palestinians Set Date for First Congress in 2 Decades

Palestinian leaders have set September 15-16 as the dates for their first congress in nearly 20 years after President Mahmoud Abbas announced his resignation as head of a top executive body. The meeting of the Palestine National Council (PNC), a congress representing those in the Palestinian territories and the diaspora, is to be held in Ramallah in the West Bank. "It has been decided to ask the Palestine National Council to convene for a session on the upcoming 15th and 16th of September in Ramallah," senior Palestinian official Azzam al-Ahmad told AFP. "The council's agenda includes electing a new executive committee for the (Palestine Liberation Organization)."Ahmad said the congress would also discuss the stalemate in peace talks with Israel, among other issues.

New Research: 15% of WB Settlers are American

Roughly 60,000 American Jews live in West Bank settlements, where they account for 15 percent of the settler population, according to figures revealed Thursday by an Oxford University scholar and expert on this population. "This provides hard evidence that this constituency is strikingly over-represented, both within the settler population itself and within the total population of Jewish American immigrants in Israel," said Sara Yael Hirschhorn, the author of the upcoming book "City on a Hilltop: Jewish-American Settlers in the Occupied Territories Since 1967," scheduled for release by Harvard University Press in 2016. The number of American immigrants living in Israel, including their children, has been estimated at about 170,000.

Public Security Minister Fires Back at His Critics

Yesterday Public Security Minister Gilad Erdan attacked the former police commissioners and commanders who protested his choice of Brig. Gen. (res.) Gal Hirsch as incoming commissioner of the Israel Police. "They want to continue to have access," said Erdan. "When there were significant events in the police in the past two years, like the wave of resignations by commanders who were forced to leave because of all kinds of problems, there were no such emergency meetings." In a conversation with Ma'ariv, the minister said, "Let's remember that the police reached the point of crisis after many years in which commissioners were appointed from within. Their claim doesn't stand up. The result wasn't optimal when the commissioners were appointed. There are self-interested parties who oppose this appointment."

Council of Torah Allows Litzman to Become Minister

United Torah Judaism's Deputy Health Minister Ya'acov Litzman accepted the position of health minister offered to him by Prime Minister Netanyahu on Thursday after the ultra-Orthodox party's Council of Torah Sages decided to permit the move. UTJ traditionally has not allowed any of its MKs to be officials, in order that it not be seen as party to or responsible for government decisions the party believes run counter to Jewish law. But the rabbis permitted Litzman to join the cabinet after the High Court of Justice ruled that there cannot be any "deputy ministers with the status of a minister," which was how Litzman was described.

Congress, Don't Isolate America Again Over Iran

By Samantha Power

While many members of Congress have declared their positions on the Iran nuclear deal, a significant number remain undecided. I and my colleagues in the administration have spoken to many of those still digging into its details, poring over the annexes and asking specific questions—questions like how long traces of uranium would be detectable after a hidden site was "cleaned up" (answer: many lifetimes over) or what the "snap back" of sanctions at the United Nations would mean for businesses that had already signed new contracts in Iran (answer: they would have to phase out their contracts or face penalties for violating sanctions). They are asking these questions in an effort to determine what is best for our national security.

Yet while our discussions delve deep into the details of the deal itself, far less time is focused on how this deal would affect America's foreign policy heft on issues far beyond Iran's nuclear program. Serving as the United States ambassador to the United Nations, where we hold one of five permanent seats of the UN Security Council and are one of 193 member states, I spend virtually every day interacting with foreign diplomats—diplomats who are tracking the debate in Congress like they tracked the World Cup soccer pairings last year. And from this vantage point, I believe that rejecting this deal would significantly weaken our ability to achieve our broader foreign policy goals—most of which in 2015 require us to mobilize broad international coalitions.

First, if the United States rejects this deal, we would instantly isolate ourselves from the countries that spent nearly two years working with American negotiators to hammer out its toughest provisions. Those partners believe that this is a sound deal—with a rigorous set of inspection measures that would allow us to know if Iran is not playing by the rules. And those countries have been very clear that they are not prepared to walk away from this deal to try to secure different terms. So if we walk away, there is no diplomatic door number two. No do over. No rewrite of the deal on the table. We would go from a situation in which Iran is isolated to one in which the United States is isolated. That would not be ideal under any circumstances, but it would be particularly damaging in a context in which Iran continues to pose a profound threat to international peace and security, against which global unity and pressure will be critical.

Second, well beyond the consequences vis-a-vis Iran itself, rejecting this deal would likely undermine our ability to use sanctions in other circumstances. At the UN I routinely encounter countries that do not want to impose sanctions or even to enforce those already on the books. The hard-line sanctions skeptics have their own self-interested reasons for opposing sanctions, but they ground their opposition in claims that America uses sanctions to inflict punishment for punishment's sake. In response, I tell foreign diplomats that sanctions are not an end in themselves, but a means of marrying coercive measures with diplomacy to try to change behavior—whether that behavior threatens international security or inflicts widespread human suffering. And I tell those diplomats that when diplomatic paths seem to emerge, America will pursue them, and we will ease the pressure if the grounds for imposing sanctions are addressed.

In the case of Iran, the United States persuaded other countries to apply pressure for a purpose—in order to secure significant, long-term constraints that would cut off all of Iran's pathways to a nuclear weapon. If we move the goalpost now—arguing, for example, that there should not be sanctions relief until Iran stops supporting terrorist proxies or until it permanently gives up nuclear enrichment for peaceful purposes—we would give detractors a powerful tool to try to obstruct our future efforts on issues unrelated to Iran. Our efforts to reach this deal have affirmed the view of the United States as a tough but principled leader; rejecting it would be read in many quarters as a superpower intent on inflicting pain for its own sake.

So the next time we try to rally countries to join us in imposing asset freezes or travel bans on military leaders whose soldiers commit atrocities—as we succeeded in doing in July for six commanders in South Sudan—we may find it harder to marshal international support. And the next time we try to persuade the UN Security Council to ratchet up sanctions on North Korea following a nuclear weapons test or other provocative actions, we may find other countries less willing to impose stronger measures. Meanwhile, as we try to convince warlords and rogue states targeted by other sanctions regimes to change their ways, they may assume—not without reason—that we will keep punitive measures in place regardless of how they act.

Finally, walking away from this deal may well make it harder for us to rally multilateral coalitions necessary to confront other grave threats—whether those threats come from a regime armed with a nuclear weapon, a deadly virus, or a group of foreign terrorist fighters. These threats do not respect borders and pose a risk to all nations, yet too many countries sit back and expect the United States to shoulder a disproportionate share of the collective security burden. We must get other countries to do their part, but getting them to do so depends a lot on how the United States is perceived in the world.

The Iran nuclear deal has been championed by the president of the United States, every one of America's European friends and countless other countries around the world. If Congress rejects the deal, we will project globally an America that is internally divided, unreliable and dismissive of the views of those with whom we built Iran's sanctions architecture in the first place. Although it is hard to measure the precise impact of these perceptions, I and other American diplomats around the world draw every day on our nation's soft power, which greatly enhances our ability to mobilize other countries to our side. While that soft power is built in many ways, two of its most important sources are the belief among other countries' leaders and publics that we share similar values, and that America delivers on its commitments. Of course, there is no substitute for the essential deterrent and coercive effects rooted in the hard power of America's unmatched military arsenal. But we should not underestimate the political capital we will lose—political capital that we draw upon for influence—if we walk away from this deal.

Senators and representatives are right to deliberate carefully over whether America's national security interests are better served by accepting or rejecting this deal. Putting the deal under the microscope is a crucial part of that process. But so is taking a step back and weighing the cost that rejecting the deal would have on our ability to lead the world in confronting Iran and other 21st century threats. Viewed from that perspective, the price of our lonely walk away looks very high indeed.

Abbas is Flexing his Muscles

The Palestinian leader suddenly views Iran as a 'sister' country. He decided that if Hamas is working with Iran, so will he, and if the Gaza rulers are getting aid from the Islamic Republic, the PA president wants in too.

By Smadar Perry

All of a sudden, Iran is a "neighbor" and "sister" to the Palestinian Authority president. It's unclear what possessed Abbas to take advantage of a group of journalists from Poland, with whom he met two days ago in Ramallah to announce that he was going to visit the "sister" in Tehran "soon".

All of this is quite strange, because Abbas could not provide a date for his visit, and it turns out that Tehran was also surprised to learn he was coming. So far, they have neither confirmed nor denied the visit.

What is certain is that amid reports of a deal being in the works between Israel and Hamas, Abbas decided to flex his muscles. If Hamas is working with Iran, so will he. If Hamas is getting aid from Iran, Abbas wants some too. Hamas is in conflict with Saudi Arabia and Egypt, and Abbas will be too if he really does go to Tehran, especially with the Saudis.

No one is taking his resignation seriously. Not in Israel, not in the Arab world, not in Washington and especially not in Ramallah. It appears that he is more interested in appearing defiant, as if to say: "Hold me back, I'm ready to break the rules."

Hanan Ashrawi, one of the nine other officials to resign from the PLO Executive Committee, said what everyone else was thinking: The institutions of the PLO need some new blood. But Abbas, lest we forget, will remain the "Ra'ees" (head leader). He has no intention of letting go of the presidency.

We became accustomed to him even before Arafat's death, to his extreme moods and capricious decisions. An Israeli who meets him in person will encounter a nice elderly neighbor. He in no way encourages terrorism; and he knows Israeli society and its leaders pretty well. But in his old age, he is pretty sick of being stuck in the same place.

Even if Netanyahu calls on him to return to the negotiating table, he will expect nothing would come out of it, and worry that it would weaken his position on the Palestinian street. He also suspects that there's a deal brewing behind closed doors that would come at his expense. No one is talking about the "historic" reconciliation between the PLO and Hamas anymore.

One thing's for sure - Khaled Mashal's insistence to report on "progress" in talks with Israel was aimed at Abbas: To slam the one who is sitting comfortably in Ramallah and looking for a plane ticket to Tehran.

In the midst of all of this, Abbas has also managed to declare war on Mohammed Dahlan, kick Prime Minister Salam Fayyad out, and fire Yasser Abed Rabbo. If he was truly resigning or seeking to hold an election for the Palestinian Authority, he would not have spent that time cleaning house.
Abbas is 80 years old, smokes like a chimney, doesn't really exercise and doesn't keep his diet as well as Shimon Peres does. The day after Abbas can become a reality at any given moment.

I see him as a kind of tragic figure that reflects Palestinian sadness and frustration. He doesn't have Arafat's charisma, and was even robbed of a Nobel Peace Prize despite his intense involvement in the secret talks that led to the Oslo Accords.

Now he is bringing his faithful friend Saeb Erekat into his inner political circle, but at the same time he continues to keep score, and views his closest confidants in black and white, either good or treacherous, without anything in between. Younger politicians can't even get their foot in the door.

A Ra'ees in the Arab world, any Ra'ees, does not retire voluntarily. Either nature takes its course, or the masses in the squares kick him out. No one is going to protest against him in the West Bank, but there's no need to envy Abbas.
If he does decide to give up and quit, as he has been threatening to do, he will face a witch hunt over all of the affairs his senior position has so far protected him from. So he stays.

He knows the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is unsolvable: Jerusalem will not be divided and no one is going to agree on borders. And, in any case, Iran and ISIS have stolen the spotlight from him long ago.

I like this.

I am concerned that it is pretty long and that HRC will want to read it and therefore be looking down the whole time. What is the set up going to be?

Also, one small thing. This line is the exact language President Obama has used. We should switch to something else:

"We're talking about parents lying awake at night afraid of a knock on the door. "

Subject: [big campaign] New Huff Post from Creamer-Do Americans Have the Right to Bear WMD?

Do Americans Have the Right to Bear Weapons of Mass Destruction?

The massacre and assassination attempt in Tucson have reignited the ongoing battle over what limitations should be placed on our rights to bear arms.

Let's assume for a moment – though there are many Constitutional scholars who disagree -- that the majority of the Supreme Court is correct in its view that the Constitution does in fact confer on Americans a right to bear arms that is similar in scope to our right to free speech and assembly. What does it actually mean, that we have a right to bear arms?

The Second Amendment reads: A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed.

What exactly are "arms"? Do Americans have the right to bear atom bombs? How about biological or chemical weapons?

For the vast majority of Americans, the proposition that we have the right to bear our own nuclear, biological or chemical weapons is preposterous. But what about stinger missiles that can down commercial aircraft – or bazookas? They are all arms.

Strict constructionists of the Constitution would want to look back at original intent. So let's think for a moment what the framers of the Constitution meant by "arms."

At the time the Constitution was written in the late 18th century, "arms" included weapons that had a fairly limited degree of destructive power. To Thomas Jefferson or Alexander Hamilton, the term "arms" referred to clubs, swords, single shot cannons, single shot muskets and pistols. Weapons that allowed people to rapidly fire many bullets had not been invented. There were no assault rifles, machine guns or semi-automatics. While there were a few double barreled rifles as early as the seventeenth century, the double barreled rifle would not be perfected until the late 1800's. Samuel Colt would not invent the revolver – the six-shooter – until 1836.

To the framers, the term "arms" referred mainly to single shot muskets and pistols.

But beyond the question of what the Constitution means by the "right to bear arms," we must also remember that no right is absolute. Each person's rights are constrained by the extent to which they impinge on another person's rights.

If you live by yourself on an island, you have an absolute right to do whatever you want. There's no one else around with whom your rights can conflict. But as soon as you join a society of other people, an individual's personal rights are limited by the degree to which they affect the rights of others. Legislative bodies and courts were set up precisely to adjudicate the conflicts between these rights.

There is general agreement that the right to free speech does not give individuals the right to falsely cry "fire" in a crowded theater, because that conflicts with everyone else's right to avoid being killed or injured by the ensuing panic.

The right to free speech doesn't allow individuals to lie under oath to a court, because that would conflict with the rights of others to a fair trial.

Like any other right, the right to bear arms is limited by the rights of other Americans not to be killed or injured. So – given the Supreme Court's interpretation of the Second Amendment – the question is not whether Americans have the right to bear arms, but rather how that right should be limited because it conflicts with other rights.

I believe the answer to that question is clear. The mounting volume of gun deaths and injuries, the easy access that criminals and terrorists have to what amounts to weapons of mass destruction, require substantial limitations on the ability of individuals to use, carry and obtain guns. That need is enhanced by the technological advances that have been made in weapons technology in the years since 1789.

Our laws currently ban guns made of plastic, because they cannot be identified by metal detectors.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There are very few Americans who would support repealing our current laws banning guns on commercial aircraft.

For many years we have banned personal possession of large caliber machine guns – including those that could bring down airplanes.

In 1994, Congress and the President passed a bi-partisan assault weapons ban that outlawed private possession or sale of specific types of fully and semi-automatic weapons whose principle uses are to kill people in war, or by police forces. That bill also banned the possession and sale of high-volume magazines of the sort that allowed the Jared Lee Loughner, the accused Tucson killer, to fire thirty-one shots in rapid succession before stopping to reload. That bill sunset in 2004, and the Republican Congress and Bush Administration refused to extend its provisions.

Had it still been in effect it would have been likely that Loughner – who bought the magazines legally– would have had to reload after firing off only 10 rounds, which was the maximum magazine capacity under the assault weapons ban. Since nineteen people were killed or injured, that would have preventing the death or injury of at least another nine human beings.

When the ban expired, assault weapons once again began to flood our streets – and – according to the Mexican government – have played a major role in the drug violence that has torn apart the border region. Regardless of the increasing gun carnage, many Republicans are pushing to expand the right to carry weapons of all sorts. They oppose reinstituting the assault weapons ban and even want to allow people to carry guns into schools, churches, restaurants and bars.

Arizona recently eliminated the requirement that individuals get permits to carry concealed weapons.

Their argument is that if more people carried guns, there would be people around with weapons to stop other people who would use their guns against their fellow citizens. It's the "quick draw" argument. I'm not sure many people would go for that argument in a plane, or a crowed restaurant, or in a bar where most of the customers have thrown back a few drinks – particularly if the whole crowd were carrying Glocks with the ability to squeeze off 31 rounds each in a matter of seconds. Frankly, it's ridiculous.

Let's see how many of the Republicans in Congress who want to allow everyone to pack assault weapons feel about eliminating the ban on weapons in the Capitol. Why not just let any old American (or other visitor) wander the halls with Uzi's while we're at it?

You hear, "guns don't kill people, people kill people." Sure. But if Loughner had a knife or a club instead of a semi-automatic Glock with extended magazine, lots of people would be alive today.

We all agree that someone like Loughner – or any other citizen -- should not be permitted to possess a nuclear weapon or some other weapon of mass destruction. Why should he be permitted to carry semi-automatic Glock with extended magazine? It is also a weapon of mass destruction. Its only purpose is to kill or injure large numbers of people. It can't kill hundreds of thousands, but we know empirically that within a few seconds it can kill and injure nineteen.

The argument that our society would be safer if we had even more guns – and especially high-powered guns – is simply absurd. Hopefully the shock of the appalling massacre in Tucson will prompt us to snap out of our NRA-induced stupor and pass restrictions on weapons that effectively balance the right to bear arms with our rights to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

I applaud President Obama and Secretary Kerry for securing a nuclear agreement that offers the strongest chance to prevent Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon. With vigorous enforcement, unyielding verification, and swift consequences for any violations, this deal will make the United States, Israel, our Arab partners, and the region safer and more secure than if there were no agreement.

At the same time, there are aspects of the agreement that are a cause for concern, and a basis for special diligence. has not been required to answer questions about the Possible Military Dimensions (PMD), including allowing the IAEA to inspect sites, interview key scientists and officials, and review documents that would shed light on their past and current PMD activities. In addition, clarity is required on what limits are imposed during the term of the agreement and thereafter to preclude Iran's work on advanced centrifuges. It is also critical that sanctions relief must come only when Iran has demonstrates to the satisfaction of the IAEA that they have complied with their obligations. Sanctions for terrorism and other non-nuclear sanctions must remain in place. I I want to make sure as President that any violation of the agreement by Iran would trigger a reimposition of sanctions, without an Iranian veto over the findings, and in ways that assure the US can act if we feel there is a violation. Most important is monitoring and verification. The IAEA inspectors must have timely and effective access to all sites in Iran, including military sites. It is unclear if this is the case.

Despite these concerns, it is critical in assessing this agreement to ask what alternatives exist. We already have in place the most effective, broad-based sanctions ever imposed on a country in peacetime. While they have brought Iran to the negotiating table, they have not stopped the continued expansion of their nuclear program. It is difficult to see what other sanctions would lead to greater Iranian concessions. Without an agreement, there would be no two-thirds reduction in their number of centrifuges; no dismantlement of their plutonium plant at Arak; no 24/IAEA inspections; no dilution of their 20% enriched uranium. Their capacity to "break-out: would be far more likely without this agreement, than with it. We also have to consider it we could maintain the partnership with the European Union, which has made the sanctions most effective.

Today's agreement is the culmination of an effective strategy executed over many years. By the end of the Bush administration, Iran was rapidly expanding its nuclear centrifuge capacity despite unilateral American sanctions and ineffective saber rattling. The Obama administration took a different approach, working with Congress and our allies and partners around the world. As Secretary of State, I logged tens of thousands of miles and twisted a lot of arms – especially in Moscow and Beijing – to build a global coalition to impose the most crippling sanctions in history against Tehran. That unprecedented pressure shattered Iran's economy, halted the progress of its nuclear program (NB. BE CAREFUL THEY HAVE SUBSTANTIALLY INCREASED THE NUMBER OF CENTRIFUGES AND AMOUNT OF ENRICHED URANIUM SINCE OBAMA TOOK OFFICE), and forced its leaders to the table to negotiate a deal that puts a nuclear weapon out of reach.

As President, I will use every tool in our arsenal to compel rigorous Iranian compliance. The response to any violation will be clear, immediate, and devastating -- starting with the return of sanctions but taking no options off the table, including, if necessary, the use of force. The message to Iran must be loud and clear: We will never allow you to acquire a nuclear weapon; we will never allow you permit you to produce sufficient fissile material or otherwise acquire it, sufficient for a nuclear weapons; not just during the term of this agreement – never.

Going forward, we have to be clear-eyed when it comes to the broader threat Iran represents. Even with an agreement that limits its nuclear ambitions, Iran still poses a direct challenge to the United States and our allies, especially Israel. The funds it will receive with sanctions relief will provide billions of dollars more for Iran to use to support terrorism. It continues to destabilize countries from Yemen to Lebanon, while exacerbating conflict in Syria. And it fuels terrorism throughout the region and beyond, including through direct support to Hamas and Hizballah. We have to aggressively oppose and raise the costs for Iran's destabilizing activities, insist on the return of U.S. citizens being held by the Iranian government, and strengthen cooperation with our allies and partners. This agreement under my Administration will not see this agreement as the beginning of an American-Iranian partnership. Our allies in the Middle East deserve to have this assurance, and they will have it if I am elected President.

Israel should be confident that now and in a Hillary Clinton Administration, the United States will always defend its security and ensure its military edge in the region. Our two countries have to be on the same page when it comes to the threat posed by Iran, so I would invite the senior Israeli leadership to Washington for early talks on further strengthening our crucial alliance. I will provide Israel with all the military means it requires to defend itself against an Iranian threat, and support its actions to defend itself. We should also deepen our security relationship with Arab partners who are threatened by Iran's ambitions.

Ultimately, this agreement is the best way to protect our country and our allies. To walk away from a deal that will stop Iran from getting a nuclear weapon, or to bomb Iran as long an agreement offers an alternative, [as some Republican candidates for President suggest,] would be both dangerous and shortsighted – fracturing our global coalition, raising the risk of regional war, and ultimately bringing Iran closer to a nuclear weapon.

So we should proceed with wisdom and strength in implementing a deal born out of effective diplomacy and strong

Any interest?

John, August 13, 2014

I attach a four page memo that my colleague and friend Richard Lester have prepared about the outlook for nuclear power in the U.S.

I did this because of your telling me that you were concerned about this question and would welcome some outside view.

We shall be interested in your reaction. And if you request it, we will prepare a more complete paper.

Still at the cape. We expect 19 guests in the next 21 days. Mostly Phil and Marne collecting nice people. Nevertheless Pat and I may go to a motel.

I am set up to meet with Caroline Atkinson who, by all accounts, is quite excellent.

John

Hillary Clinton Calls America's Struggle With Racism Far From Over // NYT // Nicholas Fandos – June 20, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton delivered on Saturday her boldest remarks yet on race and gun violence, topics that have quickly become some of the most prominent and divisive in the presidential campaign, particularly after Wednesday's mass shooting in Charleston, S.C.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“It’s tempting to dismiss a tragedy like this as an isolated incident, to believe that in today’s America bigotry is largely behind us, that institutionalized racism no longer exists,” Mrs. Clinton said in a speech in San Francisco. “But despite our best efforts and our highest hopes, America’s long struggle with race is far from finished.”

Invoking President Obama at times, Mrs. Clinton called for a “common sense” approach to gun laws, pledging to take swift action if elected. She did not, however, make clear how she would navigate the divide in Congress that has undercut Mr. Obama’s own efforts to pass gun laws.

Mrs. Clinton’s strongly worded stance on the issue could help her make a contrast with Senator Bernie Sanders, who has been drawing large crowds in early voting states, where recent polls show him narrowing the gap with Mrs. Clinton. Mr. Sanders, a socialist from Vermont also seeking the Democratic nomination, has a decidedly mixed record on gun control, which may pose problems for his campaign as it seeks to bill itself as a more liberal alternative to Mrs. Clinton.

Saturday was not the first time that Mrs. Clinton’s Democratic campaign, still in its infancy, had found itself having to address race and racism in the wake of violence. Her first major campaign speech, at Columbia University in April, coincided with widespread unrest in Baltimore after the death of a black man, Freddie Gray, who had been injured in police custody. Mrs. Clinton used that occasion to advocate an overhaul of the criminal justice system, saying it was “time for honesty about race and justice in America.”

She echoed that sentiment on Saturday at the annual meeting of the United States Conference of Mayors, pressing for a candid national conversation on what she called a “difficult topic.”

Race, Mrs. Clinton said, remains “a deep fault line in America,” despite the election of Mr. Obama, the country’s first black president. She also cited several statistics that suggest widespread inequality between black and white Americans.

“Our problem is not all kooks and Klansmen. It’s also the cruel joke that goes unchallenged. It’s the offhand comment about not wanting those people in the neighborhood,” Mrs. Clinton said. “Let’s be honest, for a lot of well meaning, open-minded white people, the sight of a young black man in a hoodie still evokes a twinge of fear.”

Mrs. Clinton, who attended a fund-raiser Wednesday in Charleston just blocks from where the shooting took place later that night, also called Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina on Saturday to offer her support to him and his constituents, Mr. Graham said. Race and gun violence quickly reasserted themselves as topics of conversation on the campaign trail after Wednesday’s deadly shooting, which took the lives of nine people gathered for Bible study at Emanuel A.M.E. Church in Charleston. Both Republicans and Democrats have scrambled to pay respects to the victims, but also to take a stance that may attract voters.

Mitt Romney, the Republican Party’s 2012 presidential nominee, took to Twitter on Saturday to press South Carolina to remove the Confederate flag flying near its state capitol.

On the Democratic side, Martin O’Malley spoke out for gun control on Friday, sending a strongly worded email to supporters calling for a federal assault weapons ban, stricter background checks and measures to tamp down straw-buying. In 2013, when he was governor of Maryland, Mr. O’Malley signed similar measures into law, making his state one of the most tightly controlled in the country.

Mrs. Clinton and her Democratic challengers will need to persuade minority voters, an important Democratic constituency that put its vote behind Mr. Obama in 2008, to support them in large numbers to win in 2016.

In San Francisco, Hillary Clinton challenges nation on racism: 'Race remains a deep fault line in America' / / WaPo // David Nakamura – June 20, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton on Saturday forcefully challenged the nation to confront persistent racism in the wake of the mass shooting in Charleston, S.C., declaring that "race remains a deep fault line in America."

"Despite our best efforts and our highest hopes, America's long struggle with race is far from finished," Clinton told the U.S. Conference of Mayors at its annual convention here. "I know this is a difficult topic to talk about. I know that so many of us hoped by electing our first black president, we had turned the page on this chapter in our history. I know there are truths we do not like to say out loud or discus with our children. But we have to."

Clinton's appearance here came three days after nine people were shot to death at the Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church. Dylann Roof, 21, has been charged with murder in the case.

Although Clinton had called for stronger gun curbs during an appearance in Las Vegas on Thursday, her remarks in San Francisco marked a far more forceful foray into race relations, which have been strained in several cities amid a series of racially charged protests over the deaths of African Americans at the hands of police officers.

Obama addressed the mayors on Friday, and he also spoke about the Charleston shootings, while calling for stricter gun laws. The president has anguished over Congress's failure to approve his 2013 for tighter controls, including more background checks and limits to ammunition magazines, in the wake of the massacre of more than two dozen students in Newton, Conn., in Dec. 2012.

Clinton vowed to complete what Obama was unable to in Congress. "The president is right: The politics of this issue have been poisoned, but we can't give up," she said. "The stakes are too high; the costs are too dear. I will not be afraid to keep fighting for common sense reform and with you achieve that for all who have been lost because of senseless gun violence."

Obama has spoken more pointedly about race in his second term. Clinton's foray into the nation's legacy of racism came as she has sought to inspire early enthusiasm among the liberal base of the Democratic Party, staking out progressive positions on immigration, gay marriage and trade. Clinton advisers are hoping to recreate much of Obama's coalition of black, Hispanic and female voters to help push her candidacy in a 2016 battle against a Republican nominee.

The issue of gun control could become an issue in the 2016 campaign, and so could race relations, and Clinton made clear she would not shy away from talking about it. She said the problem of racism was not limited to "kooks and Klansmen," but also was perpetrated by the off-hand joke, by whites not wanting to live near blacks and by those affluent whites who are fearful of young black men.

"Let's be honest," she said.

Clinton also praised the families of the Charleston victims, including those who told Roof that they would forgive him, when he appeared in his first court proceedings.

"Their act of mercy is more stunning than his act of cruelty," she said. Wrapping up, she added that "what we need more of in this country is love and kindness."

weekend in New York.

She raised money Friday at a pair of fundraisers in Los Angeles, including one at the home of actor Tobey Maguire.

Obama also raised money for fellow Democrats in the 2016 election cycle during his California trip, attending two events in Los Angeles and two more in San Francisco. The president was scheduled to travel to Palm Springs on Saturday to play golf before returning to Washington on Sunday.

Clinton seizes the center on race and guns in wake of GOP's silence // VOX // Jonathan Allen – June 20, 2015

Hillary Clinton's not seen as honest and trustworthy by most voters. But on Saturday the Democratic presidential front-runner spoke truths about race and gun violence in America that her Republican rivals have refused to utter after a shooter killed nine worshipers at the historic Emanuel AME church in Charleston, S.C., this week.

If Clinton is to win the presidency, part of the reason will be Republicans' unwillingness to seriously confront realities that threaten the stability and strength of American society, from race and gun violence to income inequality and climate change.

It's hard to come up with solutions if you refuse to identify the problems. Clinton didn't advance the ball much on the former Saturday, but she delivered on the latter — putting tremendous distance between herself and field full of Republican gun-and-race deniers. One would think the GOP would have learned this lesson from the 1990s: If you give a Clinton the obvious middle ground, she'll take it.

Here's part of what she said on race.

"Bodies are once again being carried out of a black church. Once again racist rhetoric has metastasized into racist violence. Now its tempting, it is tempting, to dismiss a tragedy like this as an isolated incident. To believe that in today's America bigotry is largely behind us, that institutionalized racism no longer exists. But despite our best efforts and our highest hopes, America's long struggle with race is far from finished."

And this is part of what she said on guns, a line that drew a long round of applause from those in attendance at the U.S. Conference of Mayors in San Francisco.

"I know that gun ownership is part of the fabric of a lot of law-abiding communities, but I also know that we can have common-sense gun reforms that keep weapons out of the hands of criminals and the violently unstable while respecting the rights of responsible gun owners.

Clinton called the failure to implement universal background checks and restrictions on gun sales to domestic abusers, the mentally ill and people on terrorist watch lists "a rebuke to this nation we love and care about." And she called racial tension the "deeper challenge we face."

Clinton's data points

The former Secretary of State cited a litany of statistics documenting important racial disparities in American life:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Black applicants are nearly three times as likely to be turned down for a mortgage as whites

Black children are 500 percent more likely than their white counterparts to die from asthma

Black men are more likely to be stopped and searched, prosecuted for crimes and sentenced to longer prison stints than white men

Schools are more segregated now than they were in the 1960s

And, of course, the median wealth for white families is over $140,000, while the median wealth for black families is about $11,000.

"More than half a century after Dr. King marched and Rosa Parks sat and John Lewis bled," she said, "how can any of these things be true?"

Compare what Clinton is saying in the wake of the Charleston massacre to what Republican candidates for the presidency have said when asked about racism and the availability of guns as factors in the horrific murders Dylann Roof is accused of committing.

"I don't know what was on the mind or the heart of the man who committed these atrocious crimes"

His spokesman, Tim Miller, later said that "of course" Bush thinks racism was a factor in the killings.

Incongruously, Rand Paul made it an issue of failure to understand religious teachings and the size and scope of government.

"What kind of person goes into church and shoots nine people? There's a sickness in our country, there's something terribly wrong, but it isn't going to be fixed by your government. It's people straying away, it's people not understanding where salvation comes from. And I think that if we understand that, we'll understand and have better expectations of what we get from our government."

And Chris Christie, who hasn't yet declared a run for the presidency but is still considered a possible contender, said "laws can't change this."

So, in the wake of Charleston, who is honest and trustworthy? It can't be these guys.

In her remarks Saturday, Clinton said it's not just "kooks and Klansmen" who are responsible for racial division in America.

The person who lets the racist joke go unchallenged or feels a twinge of fear at the "sight of a young black man in a hoodie" is also responsible for perpetuating racial tensions, she said.

Maybe, just maybe, the presidential candidates who dare not speak of racism for fear of alienating voters who harbor deep bigotry bear some responsibility, too.

Bush and Clinton are true policy wonks. Can they make a virtue of that? // WaPo // Dan Balz – June 20, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton and Jeb Bush laid out ambitious agendas in their announcement speeches over the past eight days. If they are as good as their word, the coming months of the presidential campaign could be remembered for something unusual: a summer of substance.

Though of different parties and different philosophies, Clinton and Bush certainly share one thing in common:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

They are unabashed policy wonks. At Clinton headquarters, policy meetings with the candidate are blocked out in hours, not minutes. Bush, asked the other day to explain how he would achieve one of his big goals, responded, “How much time you got?”

The two candidates obviously have specific vulnerabilities unrelated to questions about their policy agendas. For Clinton it is the questions about honesty, trustworthiness and personal accessibility. For Bush, it is the resistance to his candidacy that comes with his family name and with perceptions that his conservatism is too squishy for some in his party. But both candidates say they are determined to make their campaigns about ideas and the policies to back them up.

Their mutual interest in the details of policy comes from their long experience in the public realm. Clinton has been grappling with domestic policy problems ever since she joined the Children’s Defense Fund as a young lawyer. Bush long has been known as the more policy-oriented brother in the family business of elective politics, a reputation he earned before, during and after his time as governor of Florida.

But if the two are steeped in policy, they have left themselves sizable challenges as presidential candidates. Clinton’s is to flesh out her pledge to make income inequality — the gap between the wealthiest and the rest of society — the central issue of her candidacy. Bush’s is to demonstrate that he has something fresh to back up his goal of returning the U.S. economy to sustainable 4 percent annual growth rates.

The speech Clinton delivered at the Franklin D. Roosevelt Four Freedoms Park on New York’s Roosevelt Island on June 13 offered sweeping rhetoric about the state of an economy that she said should work for all and not just the most privileged.

In tone, it was at least mildly populist. That was evidence of her conclusion that the Democratic Party’s most important constituencies are looking for something closer to the European Social Democrat views of Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) than the New Democrat ideas that helped elect her husband, Bill Clinton, to the presidency a quarter-century ago.

As she drilled down, however, the speech became a more familiar Clintonesque approach to domestic and economic policy: a long string of policy programs or ambitions, many of them proposed before. They represent a general continuation of the approach followed by President Obama rather than any dramatic break with mainstream, conventional orthodoxy of her party.

The list of ideas included raising the minimum wage; offering paid family leave for new parents and more flexible work schedules; giving small businesses and others tax breaks to encourage long-term investment rather than short-term profit; encouraging development of alternative energy sources and discouraging the use of fossil fuels; creating an infrastructure bank for matters including highways and broadband; providing universal preschool and more access to high-quality child care; making college more affordable; giving adults incentives for lifelong learning; offering illegal immigrants a path to citizenship.

By this reckoning, Clinton is not a believer in a big-bang approach to the problems she outlined. Instead, she favors smaller steps and an array of programs, reminiscent of the State of the Union addresses during her husband’s administration.

She said in her launch speech that growth and fairness were two goals of her economic policy, though she neither established targets for growth nor signaled the degree to which a third Clinton administration would pursue policies of redistribution.

Her speech did not broach raising taxes on the wealthiest Americans, a notable omission from a Democratic candidate trying to strike a populist tone. Clinton campaign spokesman Brian Fallon said in a message that she will deliver a fuller speech later this year calling for revising the tax code and "ensuring the wealthiest Americans pay their fair share."

In contrast, Bush established an ambitious and difficult-to-achieve growth target in his speech. "There is not a reason in the world why we cannot grow at a rate of 4 percent a year," he said.

Not a reason, except that no recent president has managed to hit that target other than for occasional quarters. Not Ronald Reagan during his Morning in America years. Not Bill Clinton during a time when the economy created more jobs than the 19 million that Bush said his policies would deliver. Not his father, George H.W. Bush, nor his brother George W. Bush, nor President Obama — each of whom governed during times of economic downturns.

Bush's "how much time you got" came in response to a question about whether he has new policies to reach sustainable 4 percent growth. He cited actions, including paring away regulations that he said began building up before Obama took office, reforming a tax code that has not been reformed since 1986, pushing for more development of traditional energy resources, tackling "fiscal structural problems" and reforming immigration "to rebuild the demographic pyramid" in the country. He also mentioned education and training to produce a more skilled workforce.

That is an agenda for perhaps two terms. Bush was asked how quickly he could get all this done. "All this stuff?" he responded. "I'm thinking about how I'm going to do in the Iowa caucuses right now."

He added: "But politics should be as much about aspirational goals and about backing it up with substance and then explaining how you have the leadership skills to make it so than just about how bad things are and how bad the other guy is. And that's what this is."

That leaves Bush with much left to do. He has to flesh out his aspirational goals with credible and achievable initiatives. He also needs to explain how he would square his advocacy for taking care of those most in need in the context of the Republican congressional budget blueprint of House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) that would squeeze domestic spending.

But Clinton's task isn't much easier. She must try to satisfy the progressive wing of her party that is hungering for harder-edged policies to match the rhetoric of populist anger, which if the subject of trade is any evidence, she is reluctant to do. She also must balance advocacy of an agenda that calls for considerable government activism with public skepticism about government's ability to deliver.

Past campaigns have seen other candidates with an unabashed interest in and knowledge of public policy, but rarely have there been two so obviously steeped in the details as Bush and Clinton. That presages what could be a compelling debate, even at long distance for the time being. But only if both step up to the challenge they've set out for themselves.

Hillary Clinton Calls for Tighter Gun Control After Charleston Church Shooting // WSJ // Peter Nicholas – June 20, 2015

Hillary Clinton called for "common-sense" gun control measures and said the fatal shooting of nine people at an African-American church was not an "isolated" tragedy, but a chilling reminder of enduring racism and "bigotry" in the U.S.

In a speech Saturday at a conference of U.S. mayors, Mrs. Clinton, spoke extensively about the murders and praised the victims' families, who in court proceedings said they forgave the white suspect, 21-year-old Dylann Roof.

“In its way, their act of mercy was as stunning as his act of cruelty,” she said.

The frontrunner for the Democratic presidential nomination, Mrs. Clinton used the speech to highlight discrimination faced by black Americans. “Race remains a deep fault line in America,” she said.

Mrs. Clinton said schools remains segregated, black Americans receive longer prison terms than whites for the same crimes, and black children are five times more likely to die from asthma than white children.

“It is tempting to dismiss a tragedy like this as an isolated incident,” Mrs. Clinton said, referring to the shootings Wednesday night.

People are mistaken to conclude that “bigotry is largely behind us, that institutionalized racism no longer exists.” she added.

Authorities have charged Mr. Roof with nine counts of murder. They say he shot and killed the victims during a Bible study class at the historic Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church in Charleston, S.C.

During the shooting spree, he said, “you are raping our women and taking over the country,” according to witness accounts.

Many of the presidential candidates have spoken out on the shootings but have been less willing to cast it as an example of broader racial injustice.

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, one of the leading Republican presidential candidates, spoke to a conference sponsored by the Faith and Freedom Coalition on Friday and did not initially address race. “I don’t know what was on the mind or the heart of the man who committed these atrocious crimes,” Mr. Bush said.

Later in the day, at a fundraising event, he framed the issue in different terms. “It just breaks my heart that someone, a racist, would do what he did,” Mr. Bush said.

In her speech, Mrs. Clinton aligned herself with President Barack Obama, who at a fundraising event Friday said the country must make it tougher for people to buy guns and then “act on this hatred.”

Mrs. Clinton laid out several steps toward offering the public greater protections while safeguarding the constitutional right to own firearms.

She called for universal background checks for gun buyers and voiced disbelief that the nation can’t keep guns “out of the hands of domestic abusers or people suffering from mental illnesses …”

“The president is right,” Mrs. Clinton said. “The politics on this issue have been poisoned. But we can’t give up. The stakes are too high, the costs are too dear.”

Hillary Clinton decries 'institutional racism' after Charleston shooting // AP – June 20, 2015

Hillary Clinton on Saturday called for “commonsense” gun control legislation and decried “institutional racism”, days after a shooting in a historic South Carolina church killed nine of its black members.

Clinton, who was speaking at the US Conference of Mayors in San Francisco after a west coast fundraising swing, said Congress should pass legislation keeping guns from criminals and mentally ill people while “respecting responsible gun owners”.

She said: “The politics on this issue have been poisoned but we can’t give up.”

In 2013, in the aftermath of a shooting in which 20 children and six adults were killed at Sandy Hook elementary school in Connecticut, Congress rejected legislation that would have expanded background checks on firearm sales.

Clinton also addressed what she called a “long struggle with race”, saying the US “can’t hide from any of these hard truths about race and justice in America”.

Clinton calls for ‘common-sense’ gun control: ‘We can’t give up’ // AP // Lisa Lerer – June 20, 2015

Issuing an emotional plea following the South Carolina church shooting, Hillary Rodham Clinton called for “common-sense” gun reforms and a national reckoning with the persistent problem of “institutional racism.”

Three days after nine black church members were gunned down in Charleston, Clinton said the country must take steps to keep guns from criminals and the mentally ill.

Regulations, she said, can be passed while still respecting the Second Amendment and “respecting responsible gun owners.”

“The politics on this issue have been poisoned, but we can’t give up,” she told the U.S. Conference of Mayors in San Francisco on Saturday. “The stakes are too high. The costs are too dear.”

In 2013 Congress rejected legislation that would have expanded background checks on firearm sales and banned some semi-automatic weapons.

President Obama has blamed the continued national political inaction on the issue on the influence of the National Rifle Association.

While Clinton did not propose any specific legislation in her address, she’s previously supported limits on gun sales and extending the assault weapons ban.

On Friday, former Maryland Governor Martin O’Malley, who’s challenging Clinton for the Democratic Party nomination, called for an assault weapons ban, stricter background checks and tougher requirements to buy a gun.

"I'm pissed," he wrote in an email to supporters. "It's time we called this what it is: a national crisis."

Clinton's remarks also marked a forceful entry into the heated topic of race relations, an issue that's become a major theme of her campaign. Clinton called race a "deep fault line" in America, noting that "millions of people of color still experience racism in their everyday lives."

The problem of racism was not limited to "kooks and klansman," she said, but included the off-hand, off-color joke; whites scared of young black men and not speaking up against poverty and discrimination.

In previous appearances, Clinton has taken up a number of issues that are important to African-Americans, calling for changes to the criminal justice system, voting laws and assistance for minority small business owners. Her campaign is trying to motivate the coalition of minority, young and liberal voters that twice elected Obama to the White House.

"We can't hide from any of these hard truths about race and justice in America," she said. "We have to name them and then own them and then change them."

Clinton's address to the country's mayors was her last stop on a cross-country tour, largely of early voting states, after formally launching her campaign a week ago in New York City. She spent Friday raising money at three fundraisers in Los Angeles, including one hosted by actor Tobey Maguire.

Hillary Clinton calls for 'common sense' gun reforms in wake of Charleston shooting // Politico // Annie Karni – June 20, 2015

With tears welling in her eyes, Hillary Clinton on Saturday delivered an emotional call to action after the Charleston church shooting, first vowing to fight for "common sense" gun reforms, then shifting to an assessment of racism in America.

"Race remains a deep fault line in America," Clinton said, speaking in front of the U.S. Conference of Mayors in San Fransisco. "Millions of people of color still experience racism in their everyday lives."

The massacre in Charleston, South Carolina, forced Clinton off of her stump speech as she sought to confront some of the country's most intractable problems a week after her first big campaign speech on Roosevelt Island.

Clinton's voice swelled with emotion as she described the testimony of the families of the nine shooting victims, who offered forgiveness to the alleged gunman Dylann Roof on Friday at a bond hearing.

"On Friday, one by one, grieving parents and siblings stood up in court and looked at that young man who had taken so much from them, and said, 'I forgive you,'" Clinton said. "Their act of mercy was more stunning than his act of cruelty."

She said one of her first reactions was to ask, "how it could be possible that we, as a nation, still allow guns to fall into the hands of people whose hearts are filled with hate."

Acknowledging that gun ownership is part of the fabric of many law-abiding communities in the country, Clinton said firmly that the country "can have common sense gun reforms that keep weapons out of the hands of criminals and the violently unstable, while respecting responsible gun owners."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She said she agreed with President Barack Obama that the issue of gun ownership has been politically poisoned.

“It makes no sense that we couldn’t come together to keep guns out of the hands of domestic abusers, or people suffering from mental illnesses, even people on the terrorist watch list,” she said. “That doesn’t make sense and it is a rebuke to this nation we love and care about.”

But Clinton said the deeper challenge the country faces is racism. “Despite our best efforts and our highest hopes, America’s long struggle with race is far from finished,” she said.

“So many of us hoped that by electing our first black president, we had turned the page on this chapter in our history,” she said, adding that millions of Americans are held back by racism every day.

Black people are three times as likely to be denied a mortgage, she said, and the median wealth of a black family in 2013 was $11,000, compared to $134,000 for whites. She said black children were 500 percent more likely to die of asthma than white kids.

“More than half a century after Dr. King marched, and Rosa Parks sat and John Lewis bled, after the civil rights act and the voting rights act and so much else, how can any of these things be true?” she asked. “But they are.”

She said racism was pervasive in our society beyond the “kooks and clansmen,” noting that well-meaning, open-minded white people still feel a “twinge of fear” at the sight of a young black man in a hoodie. “We can’t hide from any of these hard truths about race and justice in America,” she said.

“I known it’s not usual for someone running for president to say what we need more of in this country is love and kindness,” she said, “but that’s exactly what we need more of.”

In Charleston's wake, Clinton speaks forcefully on guns, race // CNN // Dan Merica – June 20, 2015

An emotional Hillary Clinton on Saturday called for more gun control in the wake of the deadly Charleston, South Carolina church shooting that left nine dead earlier this week.

"This generation will not be shackled by fear and hate," she said to applause at the U.S. Conference of Mayors in San Francisco.

"We can have common sense gun reforms that keep weapons out of the hands of criminals and the violently unstable while respecting owners," said Clinton, the Democratic frontrunner for the 2016 presidential nomination. "The stakes are too high, the costs are too dear, and I am not and will not be afraid to keep fighting for common sense reforms and along with you, achieve those on behalf of all who have been lost because of this senseless gun violence in this country."

Clinton also said race remains "a deep fault line in America."

"Bodies are once again being carried out of black churches. Once again, racist rhetoric has metastasized into racist violence," Clinton said. "Now it is tempting, it is tempting, to dismiss a tragedy like this as an isolated incident. To believe that in today's America, bigotry is largely behind us, that institutionalized racism no longer exists. But despite out best efforts and our highest hopes, America's long struggle with race is far from finished."

Clinton has made addressing race issues a staple of her campaign since she announced her candidacy in April.

Weeks after she formally announced her campaign, Clinton called for mandatory body cameras on police and the end of the "era of mass incarceration." Clinton told an audience in New York that it was time for the United States to come to terms with "unmistakable and undeniable" racial patterns in policing.

"As a citizen, a human being, my heart breaks for these young men and their families," Clinton said, listing a number of incidents in the last year that have seen black men killed at the hands of law enforcement. "We have to come to terms with some hard truths about race and justice in America."

When the former first lady traveled to South Carolina -- an early voting state -- for the first time, she focused her trip on minority women small business owners.

And earlier this week in an interview in Las Vegas, Clinton called for "a candid national conversation about race and about discrimination, prejudice, hatred" in the wake of the Charleston shooting.

Clinton's aides argue that her outspokenness on race and crime follow her history as someone who stands up for the oppressed. But the policy positions also have political benefits and help the Democratic frontrunner keep together the diverse coalition of voters that helped President Barack Obama win the White House.

African-American voters flocked to Obama during the 2008 nomination fight. The 2008 fight for South Carolina took a racial turn, too, and damaged Clinton with some in the community.

But 2016 is not 2008. Obama won't be on the ballot and some of the President's most vocal African-American supporters from 2008, like South Carolina's Edith Childs, have already joined Clinton's nascent campaign.

"There is a time and a season for everything. That was his time," Childs said during Clinton's first trip to South Carolina.

Childs became famous for coining the chant "fired up, ready to go," a phrase that followed Obama from South Carolina in 2007 all the way to the White House. Childs appeared next to Obama -- and against Clinton -- a number of times during the 2008 primary fight. Now, though, she is ready for Hillary.

"She is a woman and she can handle the job," Childs said. "And she knows what we need especially as a woman because a lot of times men forget what we need. With her being a woman, she knows exactly what we need."

Clinton calls for new gun control laws, outflanking Sanders // MSNBC // Alex Seitz-Wald – June 20, 2015

In the wake of the Charleston, South Carolina massacre at a historically black church this week, Hillary Clinton vowed Saturday to fight for new gun control laws despite the overwhelming opposition. She also said America must address lingering racism exposed by the shooting.

By leaning into gun control, Clinton found a place where is squarely to left of Sen. Bernie Sanders, who has energized liberal crowds across the country and gained steam in recent polls as her top rival for the Democratic presidential nomination.

In a speech to the U.S. Conference of Mayors in San Francisco, Clinton said it “make no sense” that Congress has failed to pass simple gun control laws, like universal background checks. She vowed to keep fighting and promised to achieve reform if elected president.

“The politics of this issue have been poisoned,” she acknowledged. “But we can’t give up. The stakes are too high.”

Sanders hails from Vermont, a rural state that lacks virtually any gun regulations and he seems uncomfortable discussing the issue. At an event in Las Vegas, Nevada Friday, he was asked twice about guns, but declined to promise specific new gun control laws and said he didn’t want to get into the issue at the moment.

An attendee at a town hall meeting asked about his stance on gun control. He explained that people in rural and urban areas view guns differently. “This is an issue that must be dealt with,” he said, without getting into details.

Reporters followed up by asking Sanders about the issue afterwards. “I think we need to have as serious conversation about that,” he said. Pressed again, he added: “I will talk about guns at some length, but not right now.”

Sanders voted against the Brady Handgun Violence Prevention Act in 1993, arguing that waiting period for handguns could be better dealt with on the state level. And he was boosted in his 1988 run for Congress when the NRA attacked his opponent. In 2005, he voted for a controversial bill pushed by the firearms industry. Slate recently labeled Sanders a “gun nut” in a headline.

His defenders note that Sanders voted for the Assault Weapon Ban and has an “F” rating from the NRA. And they argue that he is doing his job by representing the interest of Vermonters, where gun laws are lax, hunting is common, and violent crime is very low.

Nonetheless, Saunders’ record leaves enough room for Clinton – who has a long history of supporting gun control – to outflank her liberal challenger on his left. And with her visibility, Clinton can single-handedly ensure that guns become a major issue of the Democratic presidential primary, if she so chooses.

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O’Malley, who is also running for the nomination, sought to do the same Friday. He blasted out a strongly worded letter to supporters calling for strict new gun control laws.

“I’m pissed that after working hard in the state of Maryland to pass real gun control – laws that banned high-magazine weapons, increased licensing standards, and required fingerprinting for handgun purchasers – Congress continues to drop the ball,” he wrote.

Meanwhile on Saturday in San Francisco, Clinton spoke passionately about the need to address racial inequities that persist to this day.

“It is tempting to dismiss a tragedy like this as an isolated incident,” she said Saturday of the Charleston shooting. But she dismissed that notion, saying the crimes of confessed shooter Dylann Roof must be placed in the larger context of racism in America. “Once against racist rhetoric has metastasized into racist violence,” she said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But while Roof and his compatriots get the most attention, “our problem is not all kooks and Klansman,” she continued, saying racism persists deep and often unnoticed into otherwise upstanding communities.

“We can’t hide from any of these hard truths of race,” she continued. “We have name them, then own them, then change them.”

But she said she had hope that “this generation will not be shackled by fear and hate.”

Hillary Rodham Clinton makes strong plea for gun control // USA Today // Jon Swartz – June 20, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton made a stirring plea for "common sense" gun control Saturday.

"The passing of days has not dulled the pain or shock of this crime," Clinton said, in her most extensive comments yet on the tragedy Wednesday that left nine dead in Charleston, S.C.

"As a mother, grandmother and fellow human being, my heart is bursting for the victims, a wounded community and a wounded church," she said in a passionate 30-minute address to American mayors gathered here.

"It makes no sense that bipartisan legislation fails in Congress despite overwhelming public support," Clinton said. "The politics on this position have been poisoned. I will not be afraid to fight for common-sense reforms ... because of this senseless gun violence."

"How is it possible that we as a nation allow guns to fall into the hands of people whose hearts are filled with hate?" she said, voice rising. "We can have common sense gun reforms that keep them out of the hands of criminals and the mentally unstable while not penalizing responsible gun owners," Clinton said to sustained applause. (Half of the audience of about 1,000 stood.)

The shooting spree at the predominately black church in Charleston, the latest in a string of disturbing incidents in America over the past few years, underscores an intolerant nation deeply in need of healing and understanding, she said.

"Race remains a deep fault line in America," Clinton said, pointing to ongoing discrimination, disparity in pay, illegal housing and other social chasms.

Citing former Atlanta Mayor Andrew Young in the audience, Clinton said America needs to emulate that city's slogan when he was mayor — a city too busy to hate.

"What we need more of in this country is love and kindness," a resolute Clinton said.

She spoke to civic leaders gathered for the U.S. Conference of Mayors here this weekend.

Tech is a hot topic at the conference, which kicked off Friday with pointed remarks from President Obama on the shooting rampage in Charleston.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If Congress passed what Obama called "common sense" gun safety, the assembled mayors might have had to attend fewer funerals, Obama said.

It was Obama's 20th visit to San Francisco, where tech is the dominant industry in the region and a major source for fundraising. The president successfully tapped into it twice as a presidential candidate, and Clinton is expected to do the same in her 2016 bid.

A key piece of her presidential bid is to help "build an economy for tomorrow," Clinton said Saturday.

Ride-hailing service Uber is sponsoring the conference, where Cities 3.0 is a major theme. A tour of Uber's downtown San Francisco headquarters is scheduled Monday.

Executives from Airbnb and Salesforce.com are also scheduled to appear at the four-day summit.

First on CNN: Hillary Clinton calls Lindsey Graham in wake of Charleston shooting // CNN // Dana Bash – June 20, 2015

South Carolina Republican Senator Lindsey Graham picked up the phone Saturday afternoon to hear a familiar voice on the other end: that of Hillary Clinton.

The Democratic presidential candidate told the Republican presidential candidate that she was reaching out to extend her condolences on the tragedy in his home state.

"She said she was calling to see how I was doing, and wanted to let me know that she was thinking about me and about everyone in South Carolina," Graham told CNN, recounting the telephone conversation.

He said he was "pleasantly surprised" to get the call -- mostly because he knows how busy she is.

"I know firsthand how hard it is to run for president," Graham said.

Although Graham, like other GOP presidential candidates, regularly blasts Clinton on the campaign trail, the two actually had a good relationship while serving with one another in the Senate.

They traveled together as members of the Senate Armed Services Committee, and even co-authored legislation to give military reservists health benefits.

"She is a nice person," Graham said.

"I told her that the call meant a lot to me, and would mean a lot to the people of South Carolina. It is a tough weekend for all of us," he added.

Bobic – June 20, 2015

Hillary Clinton pledged to fight for "common sense" reforms to the nation's gun laws in the wake of a tragic shooting at a historically black church in Charleston, South Carolina, and urged Americans to engage in a broader conversation about race in order to build a more inclusive society.

Addressing the 83rd annual meeting of the U.S. Conference of Mayors in San Francisco on Saturday, Clinton promised to do what President Barack Obama has so far been unable to do -- pass legislation to curb gun violence.

"We can have common sense gun reforms that keep weapons out of the hands of criminals and the violently unstable while respecting responsible gun owners," she said. "The stakes are too high, the costs are too dear, and I am not and will not be afraid to keep fighting for common sense reforms, and along with you, achieve those on behalf of all who have been lost because of this senseless gun violence in this country."

Noting the nation's struggle with race was "far from finished," Clinton issued an impassioned plea for all Americans to come together in order to create a more tolerant and empathetic society.

"I know that so many of us hoped by electing our first black president we had turned the page on this chapter in our history. I know there are truths we don't like to say out loud or discuss with our children. But we have to. That's the only way we can possibly move forward together. Race remains a deep fault line in America. Millions of people of color still experience racism in their everyday lives," she said.

Clinton cited statistics showing vast disparities between white and black families in the U.S., including differences in arrests and sentencing guidelines -- reforms for which she has called for in the past.

"Our problem is not all kooks and Klansmen, it's also the cruel joke that goes unchallenged," she added. "It's the offhand comment about not wanting 'those' people in the neighborhood. Let's be honest, for a lot of well-meaning, open-minded white people, the sign of a young black man in a hoodie still evokes a twinge of fear."

The former secretary of state pointed to the woman credited with helping authorities apprehend the suspected shooter in North Carolina as an example of how all Americans must do their part in helping build a more inclusive society.

"I know it's not usual for someone running for president to say what we need more of in this country is love and kindness," she said. "But that's exactly what we need more of. We need to be not only too busy to hate, but too caring, too loving to ignore, to walk way, to give up."

She also praised the relatives of the victims of the shooting, calling "their act of mercy ... more stunning than his act of cruelty."

A racist manifesto that appears to be from the alleged shooter, entitled "The Last Rhodesian," emerged earlier Saturday, detailing why the writer, identified as Dylann Roof, chose to open fire in Charleston. It contains a passage in which the writer cites the death of Trayvon Martin, a black teenager in Florida who was killed by George Zimmerman, as a turning point in his life that led him to research "black on White crime." It also includes several photographs that appear to be of Roof, including one in which he waves a Confederate flag.

Roof is charged with nine counts of homicide and possession of a firearm during commission of a violent crime.

Hillary Clinton Calls for 'Common Sense' Gun Control After Charleston Shooting // ABC News // Erin Dooley – June 20, 2015

n the wake of the massacre in Charleston, South Carolina, Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton today vowed to keep fighting for common sense gun control and delivered a blistering indictment of racism in America.

Speaking at the Conference of Mayors in San Francisco, Clinton said “bodies are once again being carried out of a black church,” referring to the nine people killed inside Emanuel AME Church on Wednesday. The suspect in the shooting, Dylann Roof, has been charged with nine counts of murder and possession of a firearm during the commission of a violent crime.

“How it could be possible that we as a nation still allow guns to fall into the hands of people whose hearts are filled with hate?” Clinton said, noting that “massacre after massacre” makes the urgency of passing gun control legislation clear.

As a former resident of Arkansas, Clinton explained, she understands that gun ownership is a cultural mainstay. But she said America needs to find a way to keep guns out of the hands of those that would do their neighbors harm.

“It makes no sense that bipartisan legislation to require universal background checks would fail in Congress despite overwhelming bipartisan support,” she said. “It makes no sense that we couldn’t come together to keep guns out of the hands of domestic abusers, or people suffering from mental illnesses, even people on the terrorist watch list. That doesn’t make sense, and it is a rebuke to this nation we love and care about.”

Earlier this week, President Obama said the politics of Washington "foreclose" some gun control legislation. But at the mayor’s conference Friday, he said he was “not resigned” on the issue.

“The president is right -- the politics on this issue have been poison,” Clinton said. “But we can’t give up. The stakes are too high, the costs are too dear, and I am not and will not be afraid to keep fighting.”

But firearms aren't the most pressing problem, said Clinton. A friend of Roof, 21, had said he wanted to start a race war and that he supported segregation.

“It is tempting to dismiss a tragedy like this as an isolated incident, to believe that in today’s America, bigotry is largely behind us, that institutionalized racism no longer exists,” Clinton said.

But electing a black president didn't eliminate racial disparities in the criminal justice system, education and the economy, Clinton said.

“More than half a century after Dr. King marched and Rosa Parks sat and John Lewis bled, after the Civil Rights Act and the Voting Rights Act, how can any of these things be true?” she asked.

“America’s long struggle with race is far from finished,” she said. “Our problem is not all kooks and Klansman. It’s the joke that goes unchallenged; it’s the offhand comment about not wanting 'those people' in the neighborhood.”

The former secretary of state lauded the families of the Charleston victims, who Friday offered Roof their forgiveness.

“In its way, their act of mercy was more stunning than his act of cruelty,” Clinton said.

She also recognized Debbie Dills, who spotted Roof and called police, vowing, “she didn’t remain silent -- well neither can we.”

Hillary Clinton Calls for Gun Reforms in Speech to U.S. Mayors // Bloomberg News // Alison Vekshin – June 20, 2015

Hillary Clinton called for an end to gun violence and said the country’s long struggle with race is far from finished after a mass shooting at a South Carolina church this week left nine people dead.

Clinton, 67, didn’t offer specific solutions beyond pledging to fight “for common-sense reforms” and bemoaning gridlock in Congress over legislation to require universal background checks for people buying guns.

“It makes no sense that we couldn’t come together to keep guns out of the hands of domestic abusers or people suffering from mental illnesses, even people on the terrorist watchlist,” Clinton, a Democratic presidential candidate, said Saturday at a U.S. Conference of Mayors meeting in San Francisco. “That doesn’t make sense and it is a rebuke to this nation that we love and care about.”

Clinton’s speech was one of her first major addresses after the national tragedy and as she makes her case for the White House. The former senator, secretary of state and first lady echoed President Barack Obama’s remarks at the mayors’ event on Friday in which he said mass shootings were becoming too commonplace and called for curtailing easy access to firearms.

“We can have common-sense gun reforms that keep weapons out of the hands of criminals and the violently unstable while respecting responsible gun owners,” Clinton said to a standing ovation.

Wednesday night’s rampage by a lone gunman at Charleston’s Emanuel AME Church is the latest in a string of such tragedies, including the school shooting in Newtown, Connecticut, and the movie-theater massacre in Aurora, Colorado, in 2012.

Racism Pervasive

Clinton told the mayors the incident illustrates that racism is still pervasive in the U.S., noting that blacks are more likely than whites to be denied a mortgage and black men are more likely to be stopped and searched by police.

“It’s tempting to dismiss a tragedy like this as an isolated incident, to believe that in today’s America bigotry is largely behind us,” Clinton said. “But despite our best efforts and our highest hopes, America’s long struggle with race is far from finished.”

Clinton, who in April announced her bid to become the nation's first female president, is running on a message of championing everday Americans, including tackling income inequality, supporting gay rights and helping immigrants become citizens. She gave her first stump speech June 13 on New York's Roosevelt Island, outlining a populist agenda aimed at girding the middle class.

Chicago Mayor Rahm Emanuel and Los Angeles Mayor Eric Garcetti were among the 277 U.S. mayors registered to attend the four-day annual conference where Martin O'Malley, a Democratic presidential candidate and former Maryland governor, is scheduled to speak Sunday.

"Mayors around the country are pretty tired of dealing with the inability of Congress and state legislatures to be more aggressive and constrain gun possession in a country where gun access is ubiquitous," Sam Liccardo, mayor of San Jose, California, said after Clinton's speech.

Clinton didn't offer details on gun-control legislation she'd push for if elected, Liccardo said.

"We recognize this wasn't a policy speech," Liccardo said. "I don't think any of us were waiting for specifics. On the other hand, I'm hopeful there will be some leadership on the federal level for real change because it hasn't been there."

Hillary Clinton Talks About Racism And Gun Reform Following Charleston Mass Shooting // International Business Times // Michelle FlorCruz – June 20, 2015

An impassioned Hillary Clinton spoke at the U.S. Conference of Mayors in San Francisco, making a call for stricter gun control and challenging racism following the mass shooting at a church in Charleston, South Carolina, earlier this week. Nine people were shot and killed in a racially motivated attack at the Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church.

"Despite our best efforts and our highest hopes, America's long struggle with race is far from finished," the presidential candidate told the U.S. Conference of Mayors at its annual convention. "Bodies are once again being carried out of a black church. Once again, racist rhetoric has metastasized into racist violence."

Clinton continued on to say that racism is an enduring pattern in America and that the events that took place in Charleston should not be accepted as an isolated incident. "Despite our best efforts and our highest hopes, America's long struggle with race is far from finished." Clinton also called race issues "a deep fault line in America."

She also discussed gun control reform, saying that gun violence -- much like racial injustice -- is not an isolated event. Clinton urged for politicians to find a way to introduce gun reforms that could prevent future violence.

"I know that gun ownership is part of the fabric of a lot of law-abiding communities, but I also know that we can have common-sense gun reforms that keep weapons out of the hands of criminals and the violently unstable while respecting the rights of responsible gun owners."

The issue of gun control has become polarizing among politicians, making it difficult for new legislation -- such as universal background checks -- to be adopted, despite being supported by most gun owners. "It makes no sense that we wouldn't come together to keep guns out of the hands of domestic abusers or people suffering from mental illnesses, even people on the terrorist watch list," Clinton said. "That doesn't make sense, and it is a rebuke to this nation we love and care about."

Clinton's words on gun control were met with a long applause.

Hillary Clinton: 'America's long struggle with race is far from finished' // LA Times // Cathleen Decker – June 20, 2015

an evocative and emotional address, Hillary Rodham Clinton on Saturday urged the nation to come to grips with the "deep fault line" of race in the U.S., blaming it and easy access to guns for the slayings of nine worshipers at an historic black church in Charleston, S.C., days ago.

"It's tempting to dismiss a tragedy like this as an isolated incident, to believe that in today's America, bigotry is largely behind us, that institutional racism no longer exists. But despite our best efforts and our highest hopes, America's long struggle with race is far from finished," Clinton told hundreds of the nation's mayors gathered in San Francisco for their annual meeting.

Tackling an issue that has split the 2016 presidential candidates in the wake of the horrific violence at Emanuel AME Church, Clinton ticked off a litany of circumstances in which black children and families are hobbled by lack of money, illness and thwarted opportunity.

"A half-century after Dr. King marched and Rosa Parks sat and John Lewis bled and the Civil Rights Act and the Voting Rights Act and so much else," she said, "... how can any of these things be true? But they are."

She called on everyday Americans to play their role, beginning in conversations with family members, to help the nation move past what she called "a history we desperately want to leave behind."

"Our problem is not all kooks and Klansmen," Clinton said. "It's also the cold joke that goes unchallenged; it's the offhand comment about not wanting 'those people' in the neighborhood. Let's be honest -- for a lot of well-meaning, open-minded white people, the sight of a young black man in a hoodie still evokes a twinge of fear."

The Charleston shootings, coming in a season of candidate announcements, has thrust the issue of race and violence against African Americans into the presidential campaign and exposed a rift between the political parties.

Let's be honest -- for a lot of well-meaning, open-minded white people, the sight of a young black man in a hoodie still evokes a twinge of fear - Hillary Rodham Clinton

Republican candidates have largely cast the shootings as an assault against faithful churchgoers, rather than delving into its racial implications. They have also brushed aside new calls for gun controls and any discussion of South Carolina's practice of flying the Confederate flag on the Capitol grounds.

The flag has spawned controversy in numerous campaigns, with Republican politicians generally defending it as a historic relic important to many of the area's residents. (An exception was 2012 Republican presidential nominee Mitt Romney, who tweeted Saturday that "to many, it is a symbol of racial hatred. Remove it now to honor Charleston victims.")

Clinton and other Democrats, including President Obama, have cited the Charleston killings as evidence that stricter gun laws are needed. She reiterated that plea on Saturday, to a standing ovation from the assembled -- and bipartisan -- group of mayors.

"I know that gun ownership is part of the fabric of a lot of law-abiding communities," she said. "But I also know that we can have common-sense gun reforms that keep weapons out of the hands of criminals and the violently unstable, while respecting responsible gun owners."

It makes no sense, Clinton said, that a measure to require background checks failed in Congress despite support from a vast majority of Americans.

"It makes no sense that we wouldn't come together to keep guns out of the hands of domestic abusers, or people suffering from mental illnesses, even people on the terrorist watch list," she added. "That doesn't make sense, and it is a rebuke to this nation we love and care about."

Clinton said she would work to "make this debate less polarized" — a hope that belies the vitriolic nature of the nation's past feuds over gun measures. She asked the mayors to work with her to win passage of background checks and other unspecified gun measures "on behalf of all who have been lost because of this senseless gun violence in our country."

Clinton's discussion of the lasting impact of race in American life rested, she said, on growing up during the civil rights movement and living in one of its flash points, Arkansas, during her husband's governorship.

In 1957, black students attempting to integrate Little Rock's Central High School were blocked by white residents and National Guard troops ordered in by the state's governor, Orville Faubus. President Dwight D. Eisenhower federalized the guardsmen, who were then ordered to protect the students, and, as in other areas of the South, race relations remained fraught.

In broaching an unusual conversation for a national politician even in the era of Obama, Clinton insisted that sympathy for victims of crime or discrimination was not enough.

Too rarely, she said, do incidents like the Charleston shootings "spur us to action or prompt us to question our own assumptions and privilege."

"We can't hide from any of these hard truths about race and justice in America," she added. "We have to name them and own them and then change them."

Hillary Clinton After Charleston Shooting: Race Remains 'Deep Fault Line' // NBC News – June 20, 2015

Hillary Clinton on Saturday echoed President Barack Obama's call for "common sense" gun reform to help prevent another mass shooting after the deadly rampage on a historic black church in Charleston, South Carolina.

"It makes no sense that bipartisan legislation for universal background checks would fail despite overwhelming public support," Clinton, a Democratic presidential candidate, said at the U.S. Conference of Mayors in San Francisco.

She said that as a former resident of Arkansas and representative of New York she understands that "gun ownership is part of the fabric of a lot of communities."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"But I also know that we can have common sense gun reforms," she said.

But in America, Clinton added, the challenge is that "race remains a deep fault line." Police say the shooting at Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church on Wednesday that left nine dead was a hate crime and a white supremacist website appears to belong to the 21-year-old arrested gunman, Dylann Roof.

"It's tempting to dismiss a tragedy like this into an isolated incident," but "our problem is not all kooks and Klansmen," Clinton said. "It's the jokes that go unchallenged. It's the off-hand comment about not wanting 'that kind of person' in the neighborhood."

Clinton, who was campaigning in South Carolina a day before the church massacre, said the country can learn plenty from the way those affected by the shooting responded with mercy.

"On Friday, one by one, grieving parents and siblings stood up in court and looked at the young man who had taken so much from them and said 'I forgive you'," Clinton said. "Their act of mercy was more stunning than his act of cruelty."

In a departure from politics to advocate for something that cannot be voted on or approved, Clinton also commended those who were at the Bible study and hosted the accused shooter in their church.

"During their last hours, nine people of faith welcomed a stranger in prayer and fellowship," Clinton said. "That's humanity at its best, that's also America at its best."

Hillary Clinton calls for "common-sense gun reforms" after Charleston // CBS News // Reena Flores – June 20, 2015

After a tragic church shooting in Charleston, South Carolina left nine people dead on Wednesday, Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton is promising to fight for what she calls "common-sense gun reforms."

"You can't watch massacre after massacre and not come to the conclusion that, as President Obama said, we must tackle this challenge with urgency and conviction," Clinton told a crowd at the U.S. Conference of Mayors on Saturday. "But I also know that we can have common-sense gun reforms that keep weapons out of the hands of criminals and the violently unstable while respecting responsible gun owners."

The former New York senator also expressed disbelief at the legislative push for universal background checks for gun and high-ammunition magazine sales -- a 2013 measure that failed in Congress despite its national momentum after the shooting at Sandy Hook elementary school.

"It makes no sense that bipartisan legislation to require universal background checks would fail in Congress despite overwhelming public support," Clinton said. "It makes no sense that we couldn't come together to keep guns out of the hands of domestic abusers or people suffering from mental illnesses, even people on the terrorist watch list."

Addressing the same mayors' conference a day earlier, President Obama said he would refuse "to act as if this is the new normal, or to pretend that it's simply sufficient to grieve and that any mention of us doing something to stop it is somehow politicizing the problem."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In a nod to the president's strong response, Clinton added that the politics on the issue have indeed "been poisoned," but that the "stakes are too high, the costs are too dear" to give up on tougher gun legislation.

The presidential hopeful, who made campaign stops in South Carolina on the day of the shooting, had previously called on the country to face "hard truths about race, violence, guns, and division." While her stance on stricter gun regulation now aligns closely with that of President Obama's in the wake of the Charleston shooting, during the 2008 Democratic primary race against the then-Illinois senator, Clinton positioned herself to the right. In a televised primary debate that year, the Democratic candidate backpedaled from a proposal for a national gun registry she had made in 2000.

And in what may have been the strongest comments yet from Clinton on the issue of race in America, the presidential contender called on the country to confront systemic racism as the "deeper challenge we face."

"It is tempting to dismiss a tragedy like this as an isolated incident," she said. "To believe that in today's America, bigotry is largely behind us. that institutionalized racism no longer exists. But despite our best efforts and our highest hopes, America's long struggle with race is far from finished."

Hillary Clinton Calls for "Common Sense" Gun Control, Decries "Institutional Racism" // Slate Daniel Politi – June 20, 2015

Hillary Clinton spoke forcefully about race and violence on Saturday in a speech in which the presidential contender tried to address some of the most difficult issues facing the country after the mass shooting in Charleston, S.C. Clinton called for "common sense" gun reform to help prevent another mass shooting. "It makes no sense that bipartisan legislation for universal background checks would fail despite overwhelming public support," Clinton said at the U.S. Conference of Mayors in San Francisco.

"I lived in Arkansas and I represented upstate New York. I know that gun ownership is part of the fabric of a lot of law abiding communities," Clinton said, according to CNN. "I also know that we can have common sense gun reforms that keep weapons out of the hands of criminals and the violently unstable while respecting responsible gun owners."

The presidential hopeful spoke extensively about the mass shooting and praised the families who allegedly said they forgave the 21-year-old suspect, Dylann Roof. "In its way, their act of mercy was as stunning as his act of cruelty," she said.

The mass shooting in South Carolina though is not just about availability of guns, Clinton said as she called on the country to confront the racism that persists across society. "It's tempting to dismiss a tragedy like this as an isolated incident, to believe that in today's America bigotry is largely behind us, that institutionalized racism no longer exists," she said.

"Despite our best efforts and our highest hopes, America's long struggle with race is far from finished," Clinton said, according to the Washington Post. "I know this is a difficult topic to talk about. I know that so many of us hoped by electing our first black president, we had turned the page on this chapter in our history. I know there are truths we do not like to say out loud or discus with our children. But we have to."

Although several presidential contenders have spoken out on the mass shooting they "have been less willing to cast it as an example of broader racial injustice," notes the Wall Street Journal.

Clinton's words do not just help her differentiate herself from the Republican candidates but can also help her gain an upper hand on Bernie Sanders. "Mr. Sanders, a socialist from Vermont also seeking the Democratic nomination, has a decidedly mixed record on gun control, which may pose problems for his campaign as it seeks to bill itself as a more liberal alternative to Mrs. Clinton," notes the New York Times.

Watch Hillary Clinton address Charleston shooting and 'America's long struggle with race' // Fusion // John Walker – June 20, 2015

Hillary Clinton used her speaking engagement at a mayoral conference in San Francisco on Saturday to address the recent shooting at an historic black church in Charleston, S.C.

"Once again, racist rhetoric has metastasized into racist violence," the presidential candidate said at the Hilton-hosted 83rd Annual U.S. Conference of Mayors. "America's long struggle with race is far from over."

Clinton discussed various forms of institutionalized racism in the U.S., from housing discrimination to the disparity in median wealth between black and white Americans. She went on to address less overt types of bias that goes beyond "kooks and Klansmen," like "cruel jokes," "off-hand comments," and similar microaggressions.

The Democratic hopeful also tied the massacre—which took the lives of nine congregants of the Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church, including state Sen. Clementa C. Pinckney, on Jun. 17—to another systemic issue facing the nation: gun violence.

"You can't watch massacre after massacre and not come to the conclusion that, as President Obama said, we must tackle this challenge with urgency and conviction," she told the nearly 300 American mayors in attendance. "I am not and will not be afraid to keep fighting for commonsense reforms."

Dylann Roof, the 21-year-old white supremacist who confessed to the shooting, was apprehended by law enforcement on Thursday. His trial began with a bail hearing on Friday.

Flashback: As Governor, Bill Clinton Honored Confederacy On Arkansas Flag // Daily Caller // Derek Hunter – June 20, 2015

As the fight to remove the Confederate flag from the state House grounds in South Carolina heats up, politicians are weighing in on the debate.

Republican Sen. Lindsey Graham defended displaying the flag, while former presidential candidate Mitt Romney called for its removal. Carly Fiorina called it a "symbol of racial hatred," but stopped short of saying it should be removed. Sen. Ted Cruz said South Carolinians should decide what their state does. President Barack Obama's spokesman said the flag belongs in a museum.

But while former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton has weighed in on the gun control aspect of the national discussion, the leading candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination has remained silent on the flag controversy.

In 1987, when her husband was governor of Arkansas, Bill Clinton signed Act 116 that stated "The blue star above the word "ARKANSAS" is to commemorate the Confederate States of America."

When the Confederate flag issue arose in the 2000 election, Matt Drudge reported that then-President Bill Clinton's spokesman Joe Lockhart was asked about the issue. Lockhart told reporters, "I've just never heard any discussion or any objections that the president has raised.

In 2000, Drudge reported Vice President and Democratic nominee Al Gore as accusing then-Texas Gov. George W. Bush of refusing to take a stand on the Confederate flag issue, which then was flying over the capital dome in South Carolina.

Drudge wrote:

The Gore campaign over the weekend repeatedly refused to comment on the vice president's silence when it comes to the flag flying over the Arkansas State House!

"The vice president will not be commenting on the Arkansas flag," a campaign rep told the DRUDGE REPORT.

The debate of the Confederate flag resurfaced after the terrorist attack on the Emanuel AME Church that saw nine people slaughtered because of the color of their skin.

Hillary Clinton: 'America's Long Struggle With Race Is Far From Finished' // Crooks and Liars // Karoli – June 20, 2015

Today Hillary Clinton delivered a powerful call for Americans to stand up and really work at the race issues that bedevil this country.

Speaking to the US Conference of Mayors, Clinton was blunt, and her remarks were not limited to evil acts of white supremacists.

But today, I stand before you because I know and you know there is a deeper challenge we face.

I had the great privilege of representing America around the world. I was so proud to share our example, our diversity, our openness, our devotion to human rights and freedom. These qualities have drawn generations of immigrants to our shores, and they inspire people still. I have seen it with my own eyes.

And yet, bodies are once again being carried out of a black church.

Once again, racist rhetoric has metastasized into racist violence.

Now, it's tempting, it is tempting to dismiss a tragedy like this as an isolated incident, to believe that in today's America, bigotry is largely behind us, that institutionalized racism no longer exists.

But despite our best efforts and our highest hopes, America's long struggle with race is far from finished.

I know this is a difficult topic to talk about. I know that so many of us hoped by electing our first black president, we had turned the page on this chapter in our history.

I know there are truths we don't like to say out loud or discuss with our children. But we have to. That's the only way we can possibly move forward together.

Race remains a deep fault line in America. Millions of people of color still experience racism in their everyday lives.

Here are some facts.

In America today, blacks are nearly three times as likely as whites to be denied a mortgage.

In 2013, the median -- the median wealth of black families was around $11,000. For white families, it was more than $134,000.

Nearly half of all black families have lived in poor neighborhoods for at least two generations, compared to just 7 percent of white families.

African American men are far more likely to be stopped and searched by police, charged with crimes, and sentenced to longer prison terms than white men, 10 percent longer for the same crimes in the federal system.

In America today, our schools are more segregated than they were in the 1960s.

How can any of that be true? How can it be true that black children are 500 percent more likely to die from asthma than white kids? Five hundred percent!

More than a half century after Dr. King marched and Rosa Parks sat and John Lewis bled, after the Civil Rights Act and the Voting Rights Act and so much else, how can any of these things be true? But they are.

And our problem is not all kooks and Klansman. It's also in the cruel joke that goes unchallenged. It's in the off-hand comments about not wanting "those people" in the neighborhood.

Let's be honest: For a lot of well-meaning, open-minded white people, the sight of a young black man in a hoodie still evokes a twinge of fear. And news reports about poverty and crime and discrimination evoke sympathy, even empathy, but too rarely do they spur us to action or prompt us to question our own assumptions and privilege.

We can't hide from any of these hard truths about race and justice in America. We have to name them and own them and then change them.

You may have heard about a woman in North Carolina named Debbie Dills. She's the one who spotted Dylann Roof's car on the highway. She could have gone on about her business. She could have looked to her own safety. But that's not what she did. She called the police and then she followed that car for more than 30 miles.

As Congressman Jim Clyburn said the other day, "There may be a lot of Dylann Roofs in the world, but there are a lot of Debbie Dills too. She didn't remain silent." (Applause.)

Well, neither can we. We all have a role to play in building a more tolerant, inclusive society, what I once called "a village," where there is a place for everyone.

You know, we Americans may differ and bicker and stumble and fall, but we are at our best when we pick each other up, when we have each other's back.

Like any family, our American family is strongest when we cherish what we have in common, and fight back against those who would drive us apart.

I'm certain that we'll hear the usual flurry of clucking from the right wing media complex about how she's politicizing what happened in Charleston, and how we don't dare politicize these terrible tragedies because good Lord, people, those bodies aren't even buried in the ground yet!

That's just the right wing's way of encouraging collective attention deficits on the cancer rapidly multiplying in today's day and age. Ignore it. Whether you support Hillary Clinton or not, she has a long record of believing what she said right here, reaching all the way back to her days as Arkansas' First Lady. For that reason alone, 2016 or not, what she says should carry some weight.

Hillary Clinton on Charleston: 'We Can't Hide' From Truth of White Privilege // Mediaite // Andrew Husband – June 20, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton addressed the 83rd annual U.S. Conference of Mayors in San Francisco on Saturday morning. Among other things, she addressed Wednesday night's shooting at the historic Emmanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church in Charleston, South Carolina, and the renewed discussion of gun control and the second amendment.

Reflecting on her time in Arkansas, Clinton noted:

"I know that gun ownership is part of the fabric of a lot of law abiding communities, but I also know that we can have common sense gun reforms that keep weapons out of the hands of criminals and the violently unstable, while respecting responsible gun owners."

She expresses her hope that those participating in the debates past, present and future can "make this debate less polarized, less inflamed by ideology and more informed by evidence."

However, it's later in the address that Clinton explicitly discusses the racial nature of the Charleston shooting and the larger context it invokes:

"For a lot of well-meaning, open-minded white people, the sight of a young black man in a hoodie still evokes a twinge of fear. And news reports about poverty and crime and discrimination evoke sympathy, even empathy, but too rarely do they spur us to action or prompt us to question our own assumptions and privilege. We can't hide from any of these hard truths about race and justice in America. We have to name them, and own them, and then change them."

In One Quote, Hillary Clinton Just Took a Bold Stance on Race in America // Mic // Tom McKay – June 20, 2015

Over the past few days, the nation has been shocked, bereaved and outraged by the terrorist attack on Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church in Charleston, South Carolina, during which alleged white supremacist Dylann Storm Roof killed nine African-American congregants.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

While prominent politicians were obviously quick to condemn the murder, not all of them have been so quick to acknowledge the role racism played in the massacre. But on Saturday, while speaking to the U.S. Conference of Mayors, Hillary Clinton challenged the United States to go beyond condemning individuals like Roof and stand up against racism in all the pernicious ways it goes unchallenged across the country.

"After the Civil Rights Act and the Voting Rights Act and so much else, how can any of these things be true? But they are. And our problem is not all kooks and Klansmen, it's also the cruel joke that goes unchallenged," Clinton said, according to NBC News. "It's the offhand comment about not wanting 'that kind of person' in the neighborhood."

Clinton criticized the mentality of other national leaders who have sought to downplay the vicious racism that fueled the terrorist attack, announcing that Americans "can't hide from any of these hard truths about race and justice in America."

During the rest of the speech, Clinton thoroughly highlighted the challenges facing people of color across the country, from mortgage discrimination to systematic racism among police forces. Though she endorsed tougher gun laws, the focus was on race.

Why it's important: Clinton wants the American people to understand that it's not enough to pretend that racism doesn't exist in the United States, a notion as ridiculous as some Russian politicians' insistence that there are no gays in Russia. Instead, she made the case that the struggle is far from over by pointing to an immediate event in our recent collective memory as an example of the damage racism still causes.

But she didn't stop there. By tying racism to the everyday conversations and attitudes many Americans have, Clinton attacked the kind of implicit racism that runs rampant in polite society and asked well-meaning individuals to challenge it wherever it props up. She also made it clear that solving racism will require people across America to actually change their attitudes towards race — particularly white people, who despite boldly proclaiming themselves non-racist in increasing numbers, continue to hold screwed up opinions about people of color.

She called out what racism is: Roof didn't emerge from a vacuum. He grew up in a culture that tolerated racism instead of fighting to root it out. Clinton has broken the tepid moratorium on calling out America's stagnation on civil rights, which has troubled the country in many, more mundane ways than singular and disturbing terrorist attacks.

Racism is when black people get herded out of their own communities. Racism is when black men in poor communities experience permanent economic recession. Racism is when powerful politicians say explicitly racist things and then just shrug it off like they never opened their mouths. Racism is when white folks insist that merely saying "I'm not racist" is a "get out of jail free" card. Racism is the separation of the lived experience of people of color from the political discourse that determines how they will be treated by the rest of society.

If Americans don't want to be racist, then they can take Clinton's challenge and step forward to defend the principle that all people deserve to be treated with respect and dignity regardless of the color of their skin. Or they can shrug and hesitate, and say "this was a terrible tragedy, but..." and let whatever privileged position of their own choosing fill in the rest of the blank.

Clinton calls for gun reforms in wake of Charleston shooting // The Hill // Kevin Cirilli – June 20, 2015

Democratic presidential frontrunner Hillary Clinton called for new restrictions on firearms in wake of the shooting in the shooting at a predominantly black church in Charleston, S.C., earlier this week.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton also called for a national conversation about race relations, saying institutionalized racism still exists in prepared remarks in San Francisco at a national mayoral conference.

"How is it that we as a nation still allow guns to fall into the hands of people whose hearts are filled with hate?" she asked. "You can't watch massacre after massacre and not come to the conclusion that as President Obama said, we must tackle this challenge with urgency and conviction."

"I am not and will not be afraid to keep fighting for common-sense reforms and, along with you, achieve those on behalf of all who have been lost because of this senseless gun violence in our country," she said.

She said that "once again, bodies are being carried out of a black church," adding that while "it is tempting to dismiss [this tragedy] as an isolated incident ... America's long struggle with race is far from finished."

Earlier this week, authorities arrested Dylann Roof, 21, in connection with the killing of nine members of Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church, a predominantly black church.

"Faith has always seen this community through and I know it will again. Just as earlier generations threw off the chains of slavery and then segregation and Jim Crow — this generation will not be shackled by fear and hate," Clinton said.

Clinton alluded to a gun-reform proposal put forth by Sens. Joe Manchin (D-W.Va.) and Pat Toomey (R-Pa.) that failed to become law after an elementary school shooting in Newtown, Conn.

"It makes no sense that bipartisan legislation to require universal background checks would fail in Congress despite overwhelming public support," she said. "It makes no sense that we couldn't come together to keep guns out of the hands of domestic abusers or people suffering from mental illness, even people on the terror watch list."

"That doesn't make sense and it is a rebuke to this nation we love and care about," she said.

On the topic of race, she said Americans need to ask themselves uncomfortable questions, saying that "the sight of young black man in a hoodie still evokes a twinge of fear" for many white people.

Racism, she said, still exists subtly in "the cruel joke that goes unchallenged. It's the offhand comment about not wanting 'those' people in the neighborhood."

"We can't hide from any of these hard truths about race and justice in America," she said. "We have to name them and own them and then change them."

Hillary Clinton vows to keep fighting for common sense gun control // The Financial Times // Megan Murphy – June 20, 2015

Hillary Clinton vowed to keep fighting for “common sense” gun control reforms if elected president, denouncing the persistent stain of racism in America days after a 21-year-old white gunman killed nine black churchgoers in Charleston, South Carolina.

Mrs Clinton, speaking at a US conference of mayors in San Francisco, referred to race as a “deep faultline” that continued to divide America. And she refused to shy away from America’s decades-old battle over gun control, where efforts to pass legislation restricting ownership and certain types of deadly weapons have repeatedly stalled even after the kind of tragedies seen in Charleston.

“The politics of this issue have been poisoned, but we can’t give up,” Mrs Clinton said. “The stakes are too high, the costs are too dear, and I am not and will not be afraid to keep fighting for common sense reforms and along with you, achieve those on behalf of all who have been lost because of this senseless gun violence in this country.”

The comments, Mrs Clinton's most expansive yet on race and gun control, will probably move both issues toward the heart of the 2016 presidential campaign.

While the former secretary of state has repeatedly talked about race during the early months of her campaign, including the disparate incarceration rates between black and white men and the need for reforms to the criminal justice system, resistance to gun control has long been a sacred cow among the Republican party.

Speaking at a "Faith and Freedom" coalition event in Washington this week, several leading GOP candidates affirmed their support for the right to bear arms under the second amendment hours after the South Carolina shootings.

"If I am president of the United States, we will appoint justices and we will have an attorney-general who will protect our second amendment rights," said Marco Rubio, the Florida senator who is one of the early frontrunners for the nomination.

Dylann Roof, 21, has been arrested and charged with nine counts of murder after being caught in North Carolina a day after the killings, in what US authorities are investigating as a hate crime.

Mrs Clinton on Saturday acknowledged that discussing race openly remained difficult in the US. Even for Barack Obama, the nation's first black president, it has been difficult to move forward on an issue that continues to divide Americans amid deep mistrust, particularly between the black community and law enforcement in urban centres.

"I know this is a difficult topic to talk about. I know that so many of us hoped by electing our first black president, we had turned the page on this chapter in our history, " Mrs Clinton said. I know there are truths we do not like to say out loud or discus with our children. But we have to."

Here's why one of Hillary Clinton's big ideas is a smart move for 2016 // Business Insider // Maxwell Tani – June 20, 2015

Democratic presidential frontrunner Hillary Clinton is making a big deal about an issue of rising importance within her party: voting rights.

And new poll released by Public Policy Polling on Friday shows that her focus on the issue may prove politically popular in 2016 among more than just Democrats.

Automatic voter registration, something Clinton proposed earlier this month, enjoys relatively strong support, with 48% approving and 38% disapproving, according to the PPP poll.

In one of the first major speeches of her campaign earlier this month in Texas, Clinton railed against voter suppression and laid out a broad set of initiatives that would expand access to voting.

The former Secretary of State called for allowing early voting weeks before an election, automatic voter registration for 18-year-olds, and a strengthened Voting Rights Act, which was gutted by a Supreme Court decision two years ago.

Automatic enrollment is also popular among moderate voters, 57% of whom said they back the initiative. And it's a favorable concept among voters that Clinton is hoping to court in the primary and general elections. Black (73%) and young voters (58%) overwhelming support it. And according to PPP, women opposed restrictions on voting at much lower rates than men — only 35% of women oppose, compared to 42% of men.

It's unlikely that the concept will prove to be one that drives voters to the polls like economic or foreign policy initiatives, but the PPP poll suggests it's a smart issue for Clinton to latch onto for support from her base and from certain broader portions of the electorate.

But any progress made on the issue would likely come when the next president inhabits the White House. Congressional Republicans have declined to take up voting reform issues, including the fix to the Voting Rights Act that Clinton is pushing.

Clinton's advocacy may not be helping, at least right now. Automatic voter registration is also becoming increasingly partisan. As The Huffington Post notes, since March, the percentage of Republicans who support automatic voter registration has dropped from 53% to around 38%.

Election 2016: Beating Hillary Clinton Top Conservative Voter Priority // IB Times // Ginger Gibson – June 20, 2015

Conservative voters, regularly chided by the establishment for putting ideology above electability, are starting to come around to the importance of picking primary candidates who are best equipped to win a general election. But that doesn't mean they're jumping on board with Jeb Bush yet, even though he is considered in many establishment circles to be the most formidable candidate to topple Hillary Clinton.

This weekend, many of the nation's conservative voters convened at the sprawling Omni Shoreham Hotel in Washington to watch as a parade of Republican candidates took turns making their pitch as to why they should be the next president and brandishing their religious credentials. It was the Faith & Freedom Coalition's "Road to Majority" conference, and 14 confirmed or likely Republican candidates showed up to make their appeal. The only ones missing were Donald Trump and Mike Huckabee.

"Electability is very important, absolutely," said Jerry Jenkins, 72, of Kennett Square, Pennsylvania. Jenkins is leaning toward Ben Carson, but he realizes that the neurosurgeon is going to face struggles and may not have enough political experience to win. When it came to electability, Jenkins pointed to New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie who he called “a guy who is the most impressive.”

It’s counter to the conventional wisdom that Bush is being painted as the most electable. “Jeb, I was disappointed,” Jenkins said. “Can he get the nomination? He might be able to pull off the nomination, but I think Hillary [Clinton] can beat him.”

The question of electability versus ideology has become pervasive through the GOP. Washington insiders have taken to procrastinating just what the electorate is going to be inclined to favor. The arguments tend to go one of of two ways. Some Republican voters see Clinton as so easily defeatable that any of the more than 15 likely candidates could topple her. They believe the best course of action is to nominate the most conservative candidate and ensure the White House doesn't get too moderate. This camp points to the defeats of John McCain and Mitt Romney -- two candidates closer to the center -- as evidence that a moderate can't win.

The opposing side believes that Clinton could easily defeat several of the Republican candidates. They believe that nominating a very conservative candidate -- particularly on social issues and immigration -- would give Democrats a bevy of possible attacks and weaken their chances. They point to tea party darlings like Christine O'Donnell and Sharron Angle as evidence that someone that far right -- even in favorable conditions -- can't get elected.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Many of the voters who convened for the Faith & Freedom event did seem to think that any candidate in their field could beat Clinton. But they're still growing cautious about how Republicans should be approaching the election.

The warning signs are starting to go up. Katie Packer Gage, who was deputy campaign manager for Romney in 2012, penned a piece this week warning candidates against repeating the former nominees' mistake of trying to move to the right during the primary on immigration. "What we found is that GOP nominees chasing the relatively small group of anti-immigration primary voters — and giving opponents ammunition to portray them as anti-immigration — risk alienating 24 percent more voters in a general election than they attract," she wrote.

Kathy Dwan, of Saginaw, Michigan, wants her party to stop talking about social issues. The self-described "far right" and "extreme" conservative said she sees among her friends those who don't vote for Republicans because of social issues but would vote for the GOP if they dropped them.

"I really wish they would all stop talking about the social issues," Dwan said. "To be honest, I think they should stay out of politics. I know I'm here at Faith & Freedom, and everybody is pro-life -- which I am -- but I think the government should stay out of the social issues...we should just talk about the health of our country fiscally and rule of law. We have to get back to some basics."

Dwan -- who is leaning toward Rand Paul because she likes his message of personal liberty -- thinks the whole field can beat Clinton. But she isn't sure who is in the best position to take on Clinton. "The jury is out on who might be the best because we're just starting," Dwan said.

Texas Sen. Ted Cruz appeared to receive the warmest reception from crowds at the event, at least in the first couple of days before Scott Walker had a chance to woo the crowd. And Cruz is trying to court the evangelical vote, a path that candidates have previously taken to victory in the early primary state of Iowa. But political observers warn that Iowa -- and evangelical voters around the country -- are beginning to worry more about picking winners instead of picking those who are like-minded.

Some evidence that conservatives are looking beyond a strict set of ideological parameters could be the reception received from candidates who most dismiss as too moderate to ever win the far-right voters.

Brian Frey, 34, also of Saginaw, Michigan, walked away from the event impressed with a couple of candidates he had never seen speak before, including Ohio Gov. John Kasich -- who has yet to announce his campaign -- and former New York Gov. George Pataki. "I was kind of blown away by Pataki," Frey said. "He is very electable."

Kasich, Washington insiders will tell you, will never make inroads with conservatives because he expanded Medicaid in his state as part of the Affordable Care Act. Pataki, who was a three-term governor of New York, came under fire for naming a moderate Republican to challenge Chuck Schumer in the 2004 Senate race. And in the last 11 years, the political ecosystem has only made it harder for Republicans to overcome such criticism.

But most surprising was the warm reception New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie received. Conservatives began scoffing at the brash-talking governor after his much-derided embrace of President Barack Obama on a tarmac in New Jersey after Hurricane Sandy. While the criticism lacked much substance -- Christie has been a consistent critic of the president -- the imagery created headaches for the governor.

But Linda Cleaver of Chester County, Pennsylvania, said after hearing Christie speak Friday at the conference, he moved up her favorites list. Cleaver, who said she's "one step to the left of radical" conservative and is a tea party member, said she was pleased to hear Christie talk about taking on entitlement programs.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"He would never have been my choice," Cleaver said. "[But] I like somebody who just speaks and doesn't pull any punches. They tell you the truth whether they think you can handle it or not."

And what about Bush? "I will never vote for him," Cleaver said. "Unlike other people, I did like George [W.] Bush, but he has the party message. Religiously, he's good, apparently. But he has some positions that may change in time, but I think he's just the party and that needs to change."

CNN Panel Discusses Troubling Polling Numbers for Clinton 'This wasn't her best week' // Free Beacon // Washington Free Beacon Staff - June 21, 2015

CNN's Inside Politics panel discussed polling showing Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton underwater on honesty and trustworthiness in key battleground states Sunday.

A Quinnipiac poll revealed majorities of voters in Florida (51 percent), Ohio (53 percent) and Pennsylvania (54 percent) do not find she has those qualities.

"This wasn't her best week," host John King said.

Self-described socialist Sen. Bernie Sanders (I., Vt.) also finished just 10 points behind Clinton, 41-31, in a poll of likely New Hampshire voters, something else that could alarm her campaign.

Associated Press reporter Lisa Lerer said Clinton had played it "extremely safe" on issues important to the left flank of the Democratic Party, and she's "stayed silent" on controversial intra-party topics like trade and NSA surveillance.

Clinton confidant cuts ties with the formidable family // NYPost // Isabel Vincent and Melissa Klein - June 21, 2015

Just weeks before Hillary Clinton kicked off her campaign for president on Roosevelt Island, a Clinton family loyalist quietly parted ways with the powerful clan.

Doug Band, a man once so close to President Bill Clinton that he was considered a surrogate son, left the Clinton Foundation, where he had various board appointments, The Post has learned.

Band declined to comment, except to confirm he resigned his position last month. The departure marks the end of a complicated relationship between Band's controversial consultant corporation, Teneo, and the Clintons.

And while the Clinton Foundation has been under fire for allegedly trading millions of dollars in donations for access to Bill and Hillary Clinton when she was secretary of state, Teneo's role is less well-known.

But Teneo played a part in what author Daniel Halper in his 2014 book "Clinton Inc.," described as a vast money-making machine.

"I think Teneo is not just emblematic of how Clinton Inc. works, it shows the political and financial mess that this whole thing has created," Halper told The Post.

In a preview of the Clinton Foundation scandals that have dogged Hillary Clinton this year, The New Republic noted the suspicious nature of Band's work in a 2013 article.

"There's an undertow of transactionalism in the glittering annual dinners, the fixation on celebrity and a certain contingent of donors whose charitable contributions and business interests occupy an uncomfortable proximity. More than anyone else except [Bill] Clinton himself, Band is responsible for creating this culture. And not only did he create it, he has thrived in it."

Get Rich Quick

Now headquartered on the 45th floor of the Citigroup Center in Manhattan, and with offices around the world, Teneo — Latin for "to guide" — started more modestly in 2009 by business consultant Paul Keary.

Band and Declan Kelly, who had been US economic envoy to Northern Ireland in Hillary Clinton's State Department, joined the firm in 2011, turning it into a global powerhouse.

Modal TriggerBand is a 42-year-old Florida native who started his career at 22 as an intern in the Clinton White House. He earned a law degree, worked his way up at the White House, eventually becoming indispensable to the president as his aide or "body man." Band was constantly by the president's side, carrying bags and keeping Clinton on schedule.

When Clinton left office in 2001, Band reportedly turned down a job at Goldman Sachs and stuck with the former president as his personal assistant.

Band became the gatekeeper for those wanting access to Clinton. The two were so close that Band was at Clinton's bedside when he had heart bypass surgery in 2004.

It was Band who, in 2005, came up with the idea for the Clinton Global Initiative, a yearly meeting of business bigwigs and heads of state in Manhattan.

Band was paid by Clinton and, once the Global Initiative was up and running, he drew a salary of $110,000 to head the group. But he was also paid an undisclosed extra amount of money by Clinton benefactor Ron Burkle, who sent checks to SGRD, Band's Florida-based LLC, The Wall Street Journal reported. It was an attempt to keep Band on board with Clinton and not flee to a more lucrative position, the newspaper reported.

Band got rich quickly. By 2003, he bought a $2.1 million condo at the Metropolitan Tower on West 57th Street. He sold it in 2008 for $4.1 million and moved to the tony Essex House on Central Park South, where he still lives in a sprawling apartment.

Band married investment banker Lily Rafii in 2007. Clinton attended the wedding in a Paris chateau even though Band had asked him not to come. "Not only did he come, he made this incredible speech," Band told a Florida newspaper in 2009.

Band traveled the world with Clinton, even accompanying him to North Korea in 2009 to secure the release of two journalists.

Band, in his bio on the Teneo website, says he was "part of the negotiation team that handled all aspects of Hillary Clinton's becoming secretary of state."

Clinton told The Washington Post in 2008, "I'm amazed he still works for me because he could make a lot more money somewhere else."

‘Promise of Access’

In 2011, Band did branch out on his own, joining the fledgling Teneo and recruiting Bill Clinton to be a member of the advisory board. Clients paid staggering monthly retainers — up to $250,000 — to Band’s company. They were reportedly encouraged to give to the Clinton Foundation and, in turn, foundation donors were encouraged to use the services of Teneo.

“The idea for Teneo was to have Fortune 400 companies pay large monthly stipends in exchange for access to Band, Clinton and their massive international network. The group would ‘consult’ with the companies, offer strategic advice and help them overcome issues in various countries across the globe,” Halper wrote in “Clinton Inc.”

But a former Teneo employee told Halper that what the clients really got was nothing, other than an “implicit promise of access to Clinton.”

In addition to Clinton, former British Prime Minister Tony Blair, former US Sen. George Mitchell and Ed Rollins, Ronald Reagan’s campaign manager, all came on board at Teneo.

Clinton was the key to Teneo’s success. “The two needed the president,” a source told Halper. “It was he who they were selling to their corporate clients. Or, more precisely, it was their proximity to power — President Clinton, and his wife, who was then secretary of state — and their own Rolodexes, which were a natural extension of the work they had done over the years for the Clintons.”

Clients included Bank of America, Dow Chemical, UBS Wealth Management and Coca-Cola.

In exchange, Bill Clinton was given a contract with Teneo worth $3.5 million, Halper said. It is unclear, however, how much Clinton was actually paid.

The Chelsea Problem

Chelsea Clinton and her husband, Marc Mezvinsky, also wanted to muscle in on the action and asked for an equity stake in the company, Halper reported. But Band refused, seeing too much of a potential conflict in doing business with the daughter of the secretary of state. There may have been some “sibling” rivalry between Band and Chelsea Clinton.

In 2008, Band told restaurant owner Nino Selimaj to take down Chelsea’s photo from the wall of Osso Buco saying the former first daughter was not a public figure, according to New York magazine.

In the end, Bill Clinton’s tenure at Teneo was short-lived.

The Post reported in December 2011 that Teneo had been advising MF Global, the doomed international brokerage firm headed by former New Jersey Gov. Jon Corzine. The firm paid Teneo an eye-popping $125,000 a month as it was imploding and losing millions for its investors.

Although Clinton’s office insisted the former president was not profiting from the MF Global arrangement, Hillary Clinton was said to be furious over the controversy. By February 2012, Clinton stepped down from Teneo.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Shortly before he severed ties with the company, Clinton reportedly started to resent how Band and his partner Declan Kelly threw his name around to inflate Teneo's importance.

In one reported instance, Kelly seemed to take public credit for getting Clinton invited to speak at an economic forum in Dublin. But the former president had actually been invited by the Irish prime minister and was said to explode in anger at the suggestion that Teneo had somehow brokered his participation at the event.

But the connection to the Clintons continued. In June 2012, Hillary Clinton's senior aide Huma Abedin began working as a part-time consultant to Teneo during her final months at the State Department.

Abedin, the wife of disgraced former Congressman Anthony Weiner, was designated a "special government employee," which allowed her to both work for the State Department and to hold outside gigs. She also consulted for the Clinton Foundation and for Hillary Clinton.

Once the arrangement became known, there was criticism that there was overlap between a private firm and the inner workings of the State Department.

A source close to the negotiations told The Post that the deal came about as a way to help Abedin financially after her husband resigned in the wake of a sexting scandal in June 2011.

"The truth is people felt sorry for Huma," the source said. Asked if Abedin provided any inside intelligence about the State Department for Teneo, the source denied it. "People watch too much 'House of Cards.' "

After Huma's arrangement with Teneo came to light, Sen. Chuck Grassley, an Iowa Republican, asked the Government Accountability Office to conduct a review of the special government employee exception.

New Business

While it's not clear whether Band or Teneo will play a part in Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign, the company has continued to wield influence on a global scale without Bill Clinton on the board.

Its website says its executives are involved in everything from sorting out issues around the Greek financial meltdown to working to leverage economic opportunities in Africa. It recently opened offices in the Far East and Brazil.

Tax filings show that Band was last paid by the Clinton Foundation in 2012, when he got $53,000. He remained linked to a European arm of the Clinton Foundation until stepping down last month.

A source told The Post that it became increasingly difficult for Clinton loyalists like Band to work with the Foundation after Chelsea Clinton was brought on board. "She wanted to be famous and rich and have a place to go," said the source, adding that Chelsea was too inexperienced for the job. "It just didn't make any sense."

Democrats veer left then blast everyone else for being 'right wing' // NYPost // By Kyle Smith - June 21, 2015

Hillary Clinton knows she has more baggage than Newark Airport. She doesn't care, because she is counting on two strong forces to carry her to victory: Demographics and the leftward turn in American culture.

She and the other Democrats suffer from cultural hubris, though. Their social justice wings always threaten to take them a little too close to the sun.

Even if all enemies are vanquished, the progressive wars can never be won. The Democrats will always find new hostile territory to invade, always creating a New Frontier.

Two weeks ago I wrote about a massive, silent cultural revolution in American attitudes: Since just the middle of the last decade, there has been a huge increase in support for gay marriage, legalized marijuana and single parenthood.

These changes favor Democrats, as does increasing ethnic diversity. Mitt Romney won the same percentage of white Americans on election day of 2012 as Ronald Reagan did in 1980. Reagan became president in a landslide. Romney was seen pumping his own gas the following week.

Yet as the parade veers left, the Democrats must always race out to be in front of it. This week's Gallup poll says that a record high 47% of Democratic voters identify as both socially liberal and economically liberal or moderate. That's up 8 points since the 2008 election of President Obama and 17 points since 2001.

Just as yesterday's luxuries become today's necessities, Democrats are continuously redefining what it means to be Democrats.

They celebrate their many gay-marriage victories, with a final, 50-state resolution due soon, perhaps any day now. But that won't be the end of the issue. As recently as early 2012, even Obama opposed gay marriage. Within 15 minutes after he publicly reversed course, liberals were routinely comparing gay-marriage opponents to racists, and 30 seconds after that liberal judges started forcing evangelical bakeries out of business for declining to participate in gay weddings.

Just this spring, Obama's own solicitor general let slip that "it is certainly going to be an issue" whether universities that decline to back gay marriage will be able to retain their tax exemptions.

If such exemptions are henceforth made conditional on offering hearty support for same-sex unions, by what logic would churches that oppose homosexuality be able to retain their tax-exempt status?

We've already seen that the First Amendment's guarantee of religious freedom couldn't save a Christian bakery.

Could Catholic priests be forced to marry Adam and Steve? "Not a chance," declared Slate's Emily Bazelon in a sneering column that said this was a mere "scare tactic." Political sci-fi. You might as well fear an invasion of zombies.

That was 2¹/ years ago. Two months ago, gay New York Times columnist Frank Bruni pushed the goalposts down the field. He wrote approvingly of Mitchell Gold, a gay philanthropist and founder of the activist group Faith in America, which is dedicated to stamping out what it calls "religion-based bigotry." Gold says churches must "take homosexuality off the sin list."

Last year an essay by The Atlantic's Ta-Nehisi Coates touting reparations payments for black Americans was warmly received by the left-wing intelligentsia. Yet in a YouGov poll, only 6% of white voters agreed that blacks deserve cash payments, while 59% of black voters think so.

How much longer will Democrats be able to forestall talking about an issue that receives strong support from their base? It's not hard to picture Bernie Sanders clobbering Clinton with the idea in a debate.

And, by the way, Sanders's self-identification as a "socialist" no longer marks him as extreme, at least to Democrats. Forty-three percent of Democrats say they approve of socialism, the same percentage who like capitalism. The public, to say the least, does not agree: By a margin of two to one, they preferred capitalism to socialism in a May YouGov poll.

Obama supports a federal minimum wage of $10.10 an hour. Hillary Clinton has moved far to the left of that, seemingly endorsing a $15-an-hour wage floor in a call to fast-food workers this month. On free trade, which is backed by Obama, was a core policy of her husband's administration and which she herself has supported many times in the past, Clinton is suddenly silent.

In order to lock down Latino support, Clinton has staked out a position to the left of Obama's extreme position on immigration, and less than 48 hours after arsonists in Baltimore burned down an innocent CVS store, she said "it is time to end the era of mass incarceration," marking herself as perhaps the first president ever to run overtly as a friend of the criminal class.

The media often remind us that Democrats and Republicans used to forge bipartisan policy solutions, scolding Republicans for supposedly moving right.

But if the center is becoming a lonely place in American politics, Democrats are walking away from it much more rapidly than Republicans are.

Will Obama's coalition readily accept Clinton? // Las Vegas Sun // Clarence Page – June 20, 2015

His campaign is a long shot, but I'm happy to see Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders putting forth a good impersonation of a serious challenge to Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign. Like a near-sighted javelin thrower, the self-described democratic socialist may not score many points, but he'll keep the crowd alert.

The former first lady, senator and secretary of state needs someone to keep her alert. Her avoidance of reporters and any other unscripted public moments sometimes makes her appear to be asleep at the wheel.

Her slow reaction to widespread suspicions about her private, unsecured email server, for example, seemed odd compared with her husband's rapid-response campaign team in 1992. And why encourage an image of aloofness and entitlement at a time when voters are expecting candor and transparency?

One wonders: Is she relying on her potential Republican opponents, whose numbers seem to grow by the day, to trip over themselves so much that she can quietly waltz her way to her party's nomination? That's not a totally bad bet, considering how the mere mention of Clinton's name was driving right-wingers bananas years before anyone had reason to mention "Obama derangement disorder."

At least no one has demanded to see her birth certificate, but just wait.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Yet, as much as her campaign seems to be leaning on celebrity style more than substance, her initial speeches offer hints of a long-term goal: She aims to rally the same coalition of voters who twice elected President Barack Obama.

You can hear it, for example, in her pronouncements on voting rights, immigration, the incarceration explosion and equal pay for women.

At Texas Southern University in Houston, she issued a major appeal for every American to be automatically registered to vote when they turn 18 unless they choose not to be. She called for a nationwide standard of at least 20 days of early voting. She called on Congress to strengthen the Voting Rights Act, which a 2013 Supreme Court ruling weakened. She also attacked restrictive voter-identification card laws imposed by Republican lawmakers in some states for discouraging lawful voters from voting.

Republican governors from two of those states, New Jersey's Chris Christie and Texas' Rick Perry, sharply denied her accusation, even though Perry did sign a controversial requirement that Texans show photo identification before voting.

But those responses were politely restrained compared with those of conservative critics who accused Clinton of "race-baiting" and "playing the race card."

"She needs black voter turnout in 2016 in order to win," townhall.com editor Katie Pavlich said on anchor Gregg Jarrett's Fox News program. "And the way that she's going to do that is by perpetuating this bogus, race-baiting narrative that somehow voter-ID laws disenfranchise minority voters."

Actually, that narrative is not so bogus. A report released last fall by the Government Accountability Office, Congress' investigative arm, on voter-ID laws in Kansas and Tennessee found a dip in 2012 election turnout of about 2 percent points in Kansas and between 2.2 and 3.2 percent in Tennessee. As the Demoratic lawmakers who called for the probe suspected, the GAO found the declines to be greater among younger and black voters.

That's not a huge percentage, but it's certainly big enough to have a significant impact in close elections. Yet, the perception of minority voter suppression is believed to have contributed to a surge in the nationwide black turnout rate in 2012 that, for the first time, exceeded the white turnout rate.

A big looming question: How much have black voters gotten over hard feelings left over from Clinton's long-running primary battle against Obama in 2008? A lot of people have long memories, especially in politics.

Another question: Are Obama's core supporters so disenchanted over what he was unable to accomplish against his strong Republican opposition that they won't bother to vote this time?

That's always possible. But here, too, Clinton has hope. She undoubtedly hopes her political adversaries overreact harshly enough to remind her base that things always could be worse. A lot worse.

Hillary Clinton's shameful charge to a children's charity // NY Post – June 20, 2015

Hillary Clinton says, "Success isn't measured by how much the wealthiest Americans have, but by how many children climb out of poverty." So why did she charge an exorbitant speaking fee to a charity that helps poor kids?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Fine, she sent the cash to another "nonprofit" — the family's $2 billion foundation. But Condi Rice, another ex-secretary of state, gave her own (much lower) fee from the same outfit — the Boys and Girls Club of Long Beach, Calif. — back to the charity.

Politico reports that Clinton charged $200,000 to speak at the club's annual fund-raiser last year, the most the group ever paid a speaker. As a result, the club — which provides after-school programs to underprivileged children — netted only $106,000 from the event, its lowest take in 25 years.

Rice spoke at its 2009 fund-raiser, charged $60,000 and immediately donated it back. That event yielded nearly $258,000.

The difference — $150,000 — is a big deal for a charity with a budget of under $3 million a year.

Hillary's better half charged the charity $150,000 for a 2007 speech. And, Politico notes, that "was reported as personal income — not a donation to the Clinton Foundation."

Oh, and the woman who says she "has spent my life fighting for children, families and our country" gave her speech and left "without visiting any of the club's facilities to meet the children who benefit from its services," Politico reports.

Yep, the Clintons just love the little people.

John Bolton: No Hillary Clinton or Rand Paul for President // The Blaze // Fred Lucas – June 20, 2015

Former United Nations Ambassador John Bolton has not decided who he will support for president, but he knows who he won't.

Bolton, who served in the position under President George W. Bush, said he will work to ensure that neither former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton nor Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul come to occupy the Oval Office.

"National security needs to be at the center of debate," Bolton told TheBlaze. "For the last six-and-a-half years there has been inadequate debate on the threats we face."

He will be pushing his super PAC and a separate organization, Foundation for American Security and Freedom, to make national security a more paramount issue.

"Hillary Clinton does not have sound judgment," Bolton told TheBlaze. "She is an ideological twin to President Obama. The majority of Republican candidates for presidential candidates are in the right direction. I want to see them elaborate on their good judgment."

As for Paul, Bolton said he understands the Republican senator's appeal to conservatives on domestic issues, but argued his opposition to the Patriot Act and unwillingness to take action abroad could put the United States in a precarious situation.

"His views are contrary to the conservative and tea party movement," Bolton said. "There is a lot of support for him on domestic issue, but would lead us down the wrong path on national security."

Bolton considered a presidential run in 2016 himself but opted against it. His political action committee contributed to 87 House and Senate candidates in the 2014 election cycle. He said he hasn't decided if his organizations would endorse a candidate in the Republican primary or wait until the general election.

Sanders banters on HBO with Bill Maher, praises pope and seeks support of younger voters // WaPo // John Wagner – June 20, 2015

ernie Sanders, the surging 73-year-old contender for the Democratic presidential nomination, talked up his appeal to younger voters and his appreciation of Pope Francis during an appearance Friday night on HBO's edgy "Real Time with Bill Maher."

Maher welcomed Sanders to the live broadcast by informing him "you're a rock star now," a reference to Sanders's swelling crowds on the campaign trail and his rising poll numbers.

Maher noted that Hillary Rodham Clinton remains well ahead with women voters, telling Sanders that "some women you will just never get."

"I don't mean personally -- although that too," Maher told a beaming Sanders. "Because there's a lot of enthusiasm for the first woman candidate."

But Maher said Sanders is doing well with men, particularly older men, and said that he sees a lot of potential for Sanders to do well with younger voters -- a point on which Sanders agreed.

"We are being very aggressive in reaching out to young people," the senator said, noting his large following on Facebook. "What we want to do is have the idealism of the kids."

Sanders cited climate change as an example -- kids want to lead the world in fighting it, he said -- and praised the leader of the Catholic faith for issuing his encyclical this week on the subject.

"This pope, dare I say, has been a miracle for humanity," said Sanders, who was born to Jewish parents and describes himself as a democratic socialist. "He makes me very conservative on economic issues, and that he spoke out on climate change in as forceful a manner as he did is just extraordinary."

Sanders predicted that the pope's input would have "a profound impact all over this world."

The show was broadcast from Los Angeles. On Saturday, Sanders is scheduled to hold an event in Denver, where campaign officials said they already have received about 7,000 RSVPs. If they all show up, it would be perhaps the largest rally any candidate in either party has staged thus far in the 2016 campaign cycle.

Defying conventions, Bernie Sanders emerges as a challenger for Hillary Clinton // AP // Ken Thomas – June 20, 2015

Bernie Sanders likes to call it "practicing democracy."

He doesn't take the stage to a blaring soundtrack. He doesn't have a teleprompter or a phalanx of Secret Service agents surrounding him. But when his Brooklyn accent booms out at a campaign stop in rural Iowa, heads nod along in approval.

"What I'm doing in this campaign is trying to tell the people the truth — but a truth which is not heard a whole lot in Washington or discussed a lot in the media," Sanders said recently at a picnic in Iowa's Warren County, south of Des Moines.

"So let me lay it out on the table for you," he said. "You're living in a country today which has more wealth and income inequality than any major industrialized nation on earth."

In a race for the Democratic presidential nomination with Hillary Rodham Clinton, the blunt talk about the economy and the gap between the rich and poor is working for Sanders.

The independent senator from Vermont is an unconventional messenger at a time when many politicians test-drive what they want to say in polls and with focus groups.

Sanders is drawing sizable crowds in the early voting states. He's also gaining against Clinton in very early polls, particularly in New Hampshire, a factor that impresses the political class even though opinion surveys at this point are limited in predicting who will win.

Clinton remains the race's overwhelming favorite, but there's no question that the 73-year-old self-described democratic socialist, whose disheveled white hair might remind some of Doc Brown from "Back to the Future," isn't just a novelty.

"This is a unique individual," said Iowa Democratic state Rep. Scott Ourth, who introduced Sanders last weekend at the picnic in Indianola. "This guy has only one standard. If it's right for people, he's going to fight for it. If it's bad for people, he's going to take a stand against it."

Drawing unexpectedly large crowds, the campaign has moved a town meeting planned in Las Vegas on Friday into a more spacious venue. About 5,000 people are expected at a rally Saturday at the University of Denver.

"The challenge for us, really, is that at this point the crowds are way ahead of us," said Sanders campaign manager Jeff Weaver.

Sanders is running with a relentless focus on policy. He rarely talks about his family, other than mentioning his four children and 7 grandchildren when explaining the importance of confronting climate change. In Minneapolis he was joined on stage by his wife, Jane, and noted they had just celebrated their 27th wedding anniversary.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He's promoting a massive government-led jobs program to fix roads and bridges. He wants a $15-an-hour minimum wage, and higher taxes on the wealthy and Wall Street. He advocates for a single-payer health care system, an expansion of Social Security benefits and debt-free college.

He's combative, too.

Sanders often points to some European and Scandinavian countries that provide subsidized or free education, universal health care and generous family leave policies as models for the U.S.

While speaking to graduate students recently, Sanders asked a student from Finland whether his country is "crazy" to pay for his education. Then he grilled the students about U.S. policy on paid sick leave for new parents.

"C'mon guys, you're in graduate school!" he barked. "What are you teaching these guys? Do you know anything?"

One woman yelled, "None," meaning no national policy on such leave. Nodding, Sanders instructed the students that people in Finland get paid leave after they have children.

"Ahhh. Now I want to get everybody very nervous," Sanders said sarcastically. "This is called European socialism! Terrible, horrible, right? Because none of you want to be able to go to college and graduate school tuition-free.

"None of you, when you have kids, want the opportunity to bond with your kids. Terrible! European socialism!"

His speeches often reflect such a black-and-white view of the world. He rarely mentions that tax rates in such countries are far higher than in the U.S.

It's a style that couldn't be more different than Clinton's.

Hours before the first major rally of her campaign, Clinton released a Spotify playlist of songs, featuring music by Katy Perry, Kelly Clarkson and Sara Bareilles. One of her campaign Twitter feeds showed a green silhouette of her head wearing trendy headphones.

Clinton has been traveling with Secret Service agents since her husband's presidency in the 1990s.

Sanders shows up at rallies and events with a small contingent of aides. In Indianola, he carried a folded piece of paper scrawled with notes while he spoke.

Other presidential candidates in Iowa and New Hampshire will linger long after their speeches, trying to shake every hand and make a personal connection with a potential voter. Sanders doesn't make a lot of small talk. After receiving a standing ovation in Indianola, he was stopped repeatedly for photos and handshakes — which he obliged — but he kept moving.

"Very quickly, very quickly," he said to one man requesting a photograph.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For all of that, the woman he's challenging is perhaps the most dominant front-runner within the party in a generation.

"Clinton is going to be a safer bet," said John MacBride, a 24-year-old Sanders supporter who drove from Kansas City to see him speak. "A lot of my peers think she's a safer bet. But they like what he says better."

Bernie Sanders' battle to get on the New Hampshire ballot // Politico // Jonathan Topaz – June 20, 2015

Bernie Sanders has vowed to win the New Hampshire Democratic presidential primary. As of right now, though, the Vermont independent isn't entirely assured that he'll qualify for the ballot.

Unlike early nominating states such as Iowa and South Carolina — where the process for getting on the ballot will be very simple for the Vermont independent — it has the potential to get a bit dicey in the Granite State (see below for the process).

At a town hall Friday in Nevada, a supporter said some of her friends were still concerned Sanders would be running as a third-party candidate in the mold of Ralph Nader — whom his campaign has explicitly cited as a model they wanted to avoid. "I am running for the Democratic nomination!" Sanders said loudly into the mic, drawing raucous cheers from the crowd.

It's a complication for Sanders, who for a long time mulled a third-party presidential bid as an independent. Unlike former Gov. Howard Dean, who was the last Vermonter to run for president in 2004, Sanders has never called himself a Democrat, has declined the Democratic Senate nomination in Vermont and remains an independent in Congress, where he has served as an independent since 1990. (He's the longest-serving independent in congressional history.)

Sanders does have many factors in his favor, and remains a virtual lock to get on the New Hampshire ballot: The Democratic National Committee has welcomed him into the Democratic race without qualification. Sanders has caucused with the Democrats for the past 25 years and has held top committee positions within the party — he's now Senate Budget Committee ranking member and served as Senate Veterans' Affairs Committee chairman when the Democrats were in the majority. In Vermont, he's voted in Democratic presidential primaries.

He also has the unqualified support of the New Hampshire Democratic Party, which would be allowed to make its case to a bipartisan commission in the event of a challenge. "The New Hampshire Democratic Party considers Bernie Sanders a Democratic candidate for President and we will work to satisfy any requirements to make sure he's on the ballot in February," said state party chairman Ray Buckley.

People in New Hampshire also note that it would be a political nightmare for the state to ban Sanders — who is receiving more than 30 percent support from New Hampshire Democratic voters according to two polls this week — from the ballot. "It would cause all sorts of negative feedback if Sanders was banned for the ballot, no matter if there technically was a legal case or not," said University of New Hampshire political science professor Dante Scala.

Sanders has said several times that he will win in New Hampshire, and his campaign doesn't seem unduly concerned about getting on the ballot.

Said spokesman Michael Briggs: "We don't think it's going to be an issue."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The process:

The Sanders campaign will file a declaration of candidacy — which will declare his registration with the Democratic Party in the state — to the New Hampshire Secretary of State's office, which is tasked with certifying his candidacy. New Hampshire Secretary of State William Gardner has not committed to putting Sanders on the ballot, previously citing that Sanders isn't yet a registered Democrat.

Vermont doesn't have voter registration by party, meaning that Sanders can't be a registered Democrat in the state even if he wanted to.

Even if Gardner certifies his candidacy, which is not a foregone conclusion, Sanders can face another challenge. If an individual with standing contests his candidacy, the bipartisan New Hampshire Ballot Law Commission will hear an official challenge.

"Usually we've been pretty liberal about letting people challenge," said Brad Cook, the commission chairman, when asked how the committee determines what New Hampshire residents have standing.

"Frankly, with the number of people running and the contentiousness of the primary, I wouldn't be surprised if we couldn't find a Democrat to challenge it," said Cook, who added that many Republicans in the state would also likely have standing to challenge his candidacy.

If the commission took up a challenge, Cook, a Republican appointed to his position by Democrats, would assess Sanders' candidacy with two Democrats and two Republicans.

Maher tells Bernie Sanders: Your campaign must be working 'You've got Hillary talking like Elizabeth Warren' // Raw Story // Tom Boggioni – June 20, 2015

Friday night Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-VT) got the rock star treatment from Real Time host Bill Maher who praised the darkhorse candidate's campaign for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination, telling the fiercely liberal senator that his run from the left has forced consensus favorite Hillary Clinton to start "talking like Elizabeth Warren."

Walking onto the stage to chants of "Ber-nie, Ber-nie" the Vermont independent sat down and explained that his campaign was about something other than normal politics, stating, "It's a very radical idea: we're going to tell the truth."

"The truth is that, for forty years, the middle class of this country has been disappearing. And there has been a huge transfer of billions of dollars of working families to the top one-tenth of one percent." Sanders said. "And what the people of this country are saying is, 'Enough is enough, our government, our country, belongs to all of us, not just a few billionaires.'"

"So let's dig down a little deeper into the campaign," Maher replied. "I mean you are closing the gap on Hillary, but obviously she's still way ahead with women. You do very well with men and the older — older men, especially. Now some women you will just never get…I don't mean you personally."

Maher went on to advise the candidate that "You could do well with younger voters. They liked Ron Paul. He was not a young-un, but he had that same authenticity thing going," before jokingly asking Sanders "Are you on Tinder?"

Sander explained that his campaign has “A very active social media effort.”

“In the Senate, we have more people on our Facebook page, than any other member of the United States Senate,” he said, before adding, “Look, what we want to do is tap the idealism of the kids. And what the kids are saying, for example, is that this country should lead the world in transferring our energy system and dealing with climate change. And that solution we’re going to talk about a whole lot.”

Leaving Brooklyn, Bernie Sanders Found Home In Vermont // NPR // Tamara Keith – June 20, 2015

How did a city kid, who grew up in a 3 1/2-room apartment in Brooklyn, N.Y., end up the mayor of Burlington, Vt., and later one of the state's two senators? For Bernie Sanders, it began with a subway ride into Manhattan with his brother.

"We stopped near the Radio City Music Hall and at that point the state of Vermont had a storefront there, advertising Vermont land," says Sanders. "It was for tourists."

Sanders, 73, the independent senator turned Democratic presidential candidate, has called Vermont home for almost all of his entire adult life. It started when he was around 13 years old, a fascination with the Green Mountain State born in glossy real estate guides.

"We picked up the brochures," Sanders says. "We read them and we saw farms were for sale."

And then after college, in the mid-1960s, Sanders, his then-wife and his brother pooled some inheritance money and bought a small piece of the dream.

"We had never been to Vermont in our lives; we just drove up," Sanders says. "We bought 85 acres for $2,500. How's that? But it was woodland."

From Gadfly To Mayor

Before long, Sanders had moved to Vermont full time. He did a series of odd jobs, and got active in politics as a member of the Liberty Union Party, which defines itself as a nonviolent socialist party. That's when he met his very good friend Huck Gutman, a poetry professor at the University of Vermont.

"A couple of my students said, you know, there's a guy you should meet. He sounds like you. And I don't think they meant that we both sounded like we came from New York," says Gutman — who does in fact sound like a New Yorker, though less so than Sanders. "It meant that we both sounded progressive. So I remember meeting with Bernie and talking about politics, and we've been friends ever since."

Sanders ran for senator twice and governor once, but, Gutman says, "It was a third party of the sort that doesn't gain much traction in the United States — anti-big business, anti-war."

Sanders never garnered more than 5 percent of the vote as a member of the Liberty Union Party. He never changed his politics, but he did switch his party registration to independent and set his sights a little lower. His 10-vote victory over a Democratic incumbent in the 1981 race to be mayor of Burlington is now part of the legend of

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bernie Sanders.

With that win, he went from gadfly to elected official — with all that entailed.

Another part of the legend: the snowplows. His wife, Jane Sanders, remembers many a snowy night when Mayor Sanders obsessively monitored the progress of the city's snowplows.

"Before the end of the night he would be out on the trucks, on the snowplows with them, to make sure things were going well," she says. "He takes his responsibilities extremely seriously."

A Little League Through Force Of Will

In the Senate recently, that meant teaming up with Arizona Republican John McCain to pass significant changes to the Department of Veterans Affairs. Or, back when he was mayor and Jane was the head of the city's youth agency, insisting that the economically depressed Old North End neighborhood get its own children's baseball league.

"He told me, 'We're going to start an Old North End Little League,' and everybody said, 'Oh, it can't be done, they just can't sustain it — we've tried,' " says Jane. "And he said, 'No, we're going to do it, just — here, do a poster, and put it out, and we'll have everybody meet.' "

That first Saturday, she said, 90 kids showed up, along with Bernie and two city attorneys, who served as coaches. "We got them uniforms. And we still run into people who say, 'I was on your team.' "

Now, there weren't actually enough children for age-appropriate teams, but that didn't stop them: Kids ages 6 to 16 were all on the same team. Jane says the teenagers were simply told to take it easy on the little guys.

"So it became the most compassionate and supportive place to be," she says.

The league still exists today.

Supportive and compassionate: That pretty much sums up Burlington — a city of 40,000 that Bernie Sanders led for eight years.

Just Don't Call It The 'People's Republic Of Burlington'

The weekly Burlington farmers market is a central meeting point that started shortly before Sanders became mayor. There are people doing yoga on the grass and parents pushing their kids in strollers.

Walking around, you could get the impression that this is an ideal place to pick up overpriced organic arugula, at the heart of the 'People's Republic of Burlington' — but the people at the market say that stereotype is not quite right.

"So much of it is seeing people bump into their friends and chitchat all day long," says David Zuckerman. "And that's part of what Burlington is: You go anywhere in Burlington — or frankly anywhere in Vermont — and you're going to bump into somebody that either you know or knows someone you know."

Zuckerman is an organic vegetable farmer, pig farmer and chicken farmer, and a state senator. Yes, he sells arugula, but this farmers market — and Burlington — is really about people. About community, he says.

'He Needs His Fix Of Vermont'

On a recent Saturday Bernie Sanders sat outside an ice cream stand that sells a maple soft-serve called a maple creemee. (I can report it is delicious.) The restaurant has ample outdoor seating and a pretty amazing view of Lake Champlain.

At first, it seemed like the interview might not work, as people constantly tried to say hi to their senator or catch his eye. People walking by shot cellphone pictures.

Sanders told a story about a trip he took back to New York 10 or 15 years ago. It just didn't feel like home, he says.

"I was walking in Manhattan, and I saw people and I'd say hello, and people had this look like I was threatening them," said Sanders. "Here, when you walk down the street, you nod to people and say hello. In the rural areas it's not uncommon for two cars going in a different direction to stop. People chat."

His friends say that, for Bernie Sanders, the hardest part of running for president may be spending so much time away from Burlington. Gutman says that until his friend started running for president, he came home to Vermont regularly.

"I don't mean to suggest he's a junkie, but I think he needs his fix of Vermont," says Gutman. "I think he needs to get his feet on the ground in this state and in this city to feel at home with himself, and I think that is a great thing. He's grounded here."

Jane says Sanders came back from a recent campaign swing in Iowa, where the landscape couldn't be more different, and he told her: "You're going to like the people there — they're very much like Vermonters."

Bernie Sanders Wows Hollywood Progressives at Two L.A. Fundraisers // The Hollywood Reporter // Tina Daunt – June 20, 2015

With the dust still settling after Barack Obama's and Hillary Clinton's glitzy fundraising trips to Hollywood this week, Clinton's first official Democratic rival — Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders — slipped quietly into town Saturday for a pair of low-key events that didn't raise seven-figure sums, but did warm the hearts of two overflowing crowds of Hollywood progressives.

Sanders' supporters might be called the entertainment industry's irreconcilables — the left flank of the Hollywood Dems' most progressive faction, with activists deeply disappointed in Obama, who they supported, and unwilling to sign on to a Clinton presidential campaign. In the former Secretary of State, they see another moderate waiting to happen.

Early Saturday morning, they filled the already blazing frontyard of actress Mimi Kennedy's Van Nuys home and — at midday — the living room of long-time activists Betty and Stanley Sheinbaum's sprawling Brentwood Park mansion to hear the program of a candidate they see as everything Hillary is not.

“I’m here with my wife and my friends because we believe Bernie is providing us with the opportunity to have a voice and a role in the Democratic process at a time when progressives are on the rise,” said former California state Senator Tom Hayden, who introduced Sanders at the Van Nuys event.

“Bernie has launched a very critical campaign in several states,” Haden said. “He’s actually doing well in the early polls. He has an opportunity to change the conversation in the country. He has an opportunity to be an effective debater (against Clinton) in the primaries. He has an opportunity to attract Libertarians and Republicans, as well as Democrats and Socialists. It always was a motley crew — the progressive coalition.”

With Massachusetts Senator Elizabeth Warren definitely out of the race, Sanders — a self-described Democratic socialist — is the candidate who checks all the progressive boxes, earning him a devoted Los Angeles following. About 300 people turned out for Sanders’ two events on Saturday. Attendees included Days of Our Lives actress Deidre Hall, Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas producer Richard Foos, Sister Act producer Cindy Gilmore Asner, filmmaker James H. Stern and actress/producer Sheila Emery.

In Van Nuys, Sanders told that crowd that the best part of running for president is being able to talk about the issues the other candidates are avoiding.

“Our campaign is catching fire,” he said. “It’s for one simple reason: We are telling the truth. And I think that’s what the American people want to hear. The truth may not be necessarily pleasant, but we can’t go forward unless we have the courage to take a hard look at where we are today. And where we are today is not in a good place.”

Income inequality and working conditions are one of his major concerns, and he recently put his views to one interviewer like this: “What we have seen is that while the average person is working longer hours for lower wages, we have seen a huge increase in income and wealth inequality, which is now reaching obscene levels. This is a rigged economy, which works for the rich and the powerful, and is not working for ordinary Americans. You know, this country just does not belong to a handful of billionaires.”

Since declaring his candidacy last month, Sanders has pointedly rejected the usual stump speech ambiguities. His style seems to declare that when you’re clearly on the attack, you don’t need room to maneuver. He has declared himself against free-trade agreements and the Keystone XL pipeline. He wants higher taxes on corporations and investors’ capital gains to finance universal healthcare and free college educations for all qualifying students. He has introduced legislation to require paid leave and vacation time for every American worker.

He wants more regulation of Wall Street and the big banks and a rollback of the Citizens United decision that ushered in the era of Super PAC’s. “I don’t believe that the men and women who defended American democracy fought to create a situation where billionaires own the political process,” he said. Sanders, in fact refuses to accept Super PAC contributions and several millions his campaign has taken in so far came from donors whose average check was $43.

“Look, we knew from day one that we don’t have any Super PACs, and I don’t have too many billionaires putting a lot of money into the campaign,” Sanders told supporters gathered in the Sheinbaums' living room. Promoting laughter, he added: “In fact, we have no billionaires.”

But he said that he believes he’ll have enough money to run a strong campaign. In fact, Sanders has declared himself “stunned” by the crowds his campaign stops have drawn. On Saturday, the Kennedy and Sheinbaum events were no exception.

Betty and Stanley Sheinbaum are as close as the progressive Westside comes to a first couple. (She's Jack Warner's daughter, and he's a former economics professor turned anti-Vietnam War and civil liberties activist.) Their light-filled Brentwood Park living room has hosted generations of liberal Democratic politicians and progressive foreign leaders. Some of Bill Clinton's first introductions to Hollywood occurred there.

Daniel Ellsberg's defense in the Pentagon Papers case was planned there and the ACLU Foundation of Southern California founded around the fireplace before which Sanders spoke on Saturday.

"In this country, when we stand together there are extraordinary things we can do," Sanders told the overflowing crowd. "We can provide health care to all of our people. We can create decent paying jobs for all of our people. We can lead the world in terms of combating climate change. We can end racism and sexism and homophobia in the United States. We can end the disgrace of having the highest rate of childhood poverty. All of that is possible. This is not a poor country. This is a rich country. So work with me please in bringing about this political revolution."

Amid rousing applause he added: "Let's stand together and let's do what needs to be done to make this country the greatest country in the world."

Following his Brentwood Park appearance, Sanders was off to Denver to address a huge gathering of supporters eager to drink from the cup of unadulterated progressive conviction.

Obama, Clinton mining state's gold, not voters // LA Times // Cathleen Decker - June 21, 2015

Last week proved anew just how convincingly California has become the place where politicians go to rich people's homes to talk about the lives of less-fortunate people they rarely meet.

President Obama crossed into Southern California airspace on Thursday and promptly took part in two events with donors, one at the home of producer Chuck Lorre and the second hosted by entertainer Tyler Perry. Later he had dinner with Hollywood moguls Steven Spielberg and Jeffrey Katzenberg.

"Just dinner with friends," White House spokesman Eric Schultz said.

On Friday, after an interview for a comedian's podcast in Highland Park, Obama spoke in San Francisco at the annual meeting of the nation's mayors, then hitfundraisers on Nob Hill and at the Golden Gate Bridge-view home of Tom Steyer, the hedge-fund billionaire who spent $74 million to become the nation's most generous individual political donor in 2014. Then it was off to Palm Springs, where Obama had plenty of time for a couple of rounds of golf before Sunday's departure.

Hillary Rodham Clinton surfaced in Southern California on Friday, holding three fundraisers in wealthy environs during which she "continued talking about her commitment to being a champion for everyday Americans," her campaign said.

She spoke to the mayors in San Francisco on Saturday, then raised money elsewhere in the city. Clinton's speech to the mayors, an emotional discussion of the lasting stain of racism, was the first non-fundraising event in California of her two-month-old campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For Democrats, the absence of a connection with the non-wealthy in California prompts a certain unease, since it cuts against the party's desired image and policy priorities. But it also represents a giant political victory, one whose major participants include Clinton and her husband, President Clinton, and Obama.

When a state is completely in the bag for either political party, there's no need — indeed, it arguably would be wasteful — to spend the resources it takes to mount an effort to persuade voters. And with more than a little help from Republicans, Democrats have commanded the state completely for two decades.

As last week reminded, California now serves the single purpose of providing the financial heft to be used in the states that matter.

"California's just different. It's a money machine now, more than anything else," said Tom Epstein, a former Clinton administration political hand and now a vice president at Blue Shield of California, based in San Francisco. Epstein's experience dates to the days it wasn't.

Little more than a generation ago, California's urban centers, suburban sprawl and rural towns were regular battlegrounds for presidential candidates. In 1988, Republican nominee George H.W. Bush held two campaign events in Southern California the Sunday before election day, a time set aside for big targets. A few days earlier, Democratic nominee Michael S. Dukakis had chartered a train to choo-choo up the Central Valley, where he spoke in Hanford, Fresno and Stockton.

Bush won — but when he ran for reelection four years later, Bill Clinton used California to paint himself as the candidate who best represented the future. Voters cranky about the recession-battered present sided with him.

Clinton's 13-point victory here was striking, and easy. His last California visit came weeks before the election, with an exclamation-point foray into the then-Republican stronghold Orange County.

Epstein became the administration's California point person, charged with keeping Clinton in good favor here as he looked to repeat his victory in 1996.

California "was a very high priority," Epstein said. "Virtually every trip he did he had a little reception for his supporters and tried to keep them fired up and engaged.... The president really enjoyed California as we all know, enjoyed hanging out with the Hollywood types and engaged pretty well with Northern California. It was a top political priority in a way it just isn't any more."

The attention dovetailed with Republican campaigns against illegal immigration that enraged the state's growing Latino population, whose retribution cinched Clinton's second victory and four subsequent Democratic presidential wins here. President Obama lost the 2008 primary to Hillary Clinton but won swamping victories here in the last two general elections.

Nothing, at this early moment, appears to stand in the way of Hillary Clinton winning a resounding primary victory in June, followed by the seventh-straight general election win for a Democrat in the state. Every California poll shows her as the front-runner.

Hillary Clinton could use the state's cutting-edge image as Bill Clinton did, embracing the tech wonders of Northern California — where the state's center of political gravity has shifted — to portray herself as completely in tune with the economic needs of the future. That is one of her main planks, but there will be a temptation to put forward that argument — and all others — in states that matter.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For his part, Obama has lavished attention on California's fundraising salons — the Bay Area visit was the 20th of his presidency, most of them involving money. To the mayors on Friday, he noted the presence of Gov. Jerry Brown and Rep. Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco, briefly praising Brown's moves on climate change and lauding the House Democratic leader despite their recent break over a trade treaty.

Apart from that, there was no talk about the state in which he stood. The mayors, to be sure, came from all over, so parochialism might have had limited benefits. But it seemed symbolic nonetheless that Obama said almost nothing at all about California before he left to collect more of its money.

Here's a challenge for Jeb Bush: Evangelical Christians like him – but they don't seem eager to vote for him. That's one reason Mr. Bush hasn't met expectations that he'd break away from the GOP pack. Here's a look at how he fares currently, in three charts.

1. Jeb's Evangelical Strength, Weakness

Some 55% of white evangelicals hold a favorable view of Mr. Bush—a larger share than for any other GOP candidate tested by the Pew Research Center. For Mr. Bush, that's the good news.

2. Mike Huckabee Out Front

But those same voters favor other GOP candidates over Mr. Bush. He trails Mike Huckabee significantly among evangelicals as their top choice for president.

3. Evangelical Voters Early Influence

One reason for this may be that while Mr. Bush is seen favorably by many evangelicals, he also leads his rivals in the share who hold a negative view of him. That suggests that many evangelical voters are off the table for Mr. Bush, at least for now.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And that's significant, because evangelical voters have a big presence in states that fall early on the nomination calendar. Mr. Bush doesn't need to dominate among evangelicals, since he appeals to a wide set of GOP voters. But he does need a solid share of evangelical votes to build a winning coalition.

Jeb Bush and Marco Rubio's backyard battle royal // Politico // Marco Caputo – June 20, 2015

Jeb Bush built the Miami-Dade Republican Party. And now Marco Rubio wants to take possession.

Just five days after Bush made his campaign for president official, Rubio will be the headliner Saturday at the local GOP's Lincoln Day Dinner fundraiser. It's indicative of the awkward predicament South Florida's two White House hopefuls find themselves in, and one of the complications of having two Miami Republicans running simultaneously for the nation's highest office.

Known simply as "Jeb" and "Marco," the men are longtime allies, friends and neighbors who live a five-minute drive from each other in bordering cities. Now the Miami-Dade GOP, built into a powerhouse by Bush in the 1980s, isn't big enough for the two of them.

The family feud between these two titans of the Republican Party has loomed for months, during which GOP insiders from Miami to Tallahassee have dealt with it like many a conflicted family: with denial. Then it became indisputable Monday when Bush officially announced his bid — and his surrogates threw a few not-so-subtle jabs at Rubio for his lack of accomplishments and executive experience.

In one of the most politically dynamic counties in the most politically dynamic state, many Republicans say it will only get worse.

"There's a lot of passion, and this could almost literally come to blows," said David Custin, an independent and longtime Miami-Dade political consultant who's often hired to work on some of the roughest campaigns.

"If someone says the wrong thing in Nevada or something, there could be a brawl at the Ball & Chain bar in Little Havana. If someone starts shoving somebody in Illinois, fists could fly at The Pub in Coral Gables," Custin said. "A lot of us, a lot of my Republican clients, don't know what to do. They don't want to pick a side. But they might have to."

The contest between the two is particularly vexing to many here because Bush and Rubio are party icons in Miami-Dade and across the state. Most Republicans who run for office — especially in a primary — covet the endorsement of both. They're featured in candidate mailers, ads, robocalls, fundraisers and rallies. Their respective endorsements are believed to move poll numbers.

Perhaps the most-conflicted Republican of all is Nelson Diaz, the county party chairman who secured Rubio's commitment to appear at the fundraiser a year ago — before it was clear that the first-term senator would run for president. Diaz used to work as Rubio's legislative aide. But he's also a lobbyist for Southern Strategy Group, established by Paul Bradshaw – the husband of Bush's top adviser, Sally Bradshaw.

"The Republican Party of Miami is and will remain neutral until we have a nominee, at which point we will go all out to ensure there is a Republican in the White House in 2016," Diaz said, acknowledging a measure of frustration that he has to bat down false rumors that he's trying to give Rubio an edge.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There are benefits, though, to being home to two serious candidates for the presidency: Diaz on Friday triumphantly announced that the Lincoln Day Dinner was sold out, and that the local GOP hasn't had this many attendees in more than 25 years.

The tensions and rumblings surrounding the question of who backs whom have ratcheted up as the polling margin between the two men has shrunk. The two are virtually deadlocked in Florida – a state that Republicans likely must win in order to carry the White House. Bush nominally leads Rubio among Florida Republicans, 20 percent to 18 percent — an inside-the-error margin — according to Quinnipiac University's latest survey. Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker comes in a distant third (out of 16 potential candidates) with 9 percent support.

The trend has been in Rubio's favor. The two percentage point margin between the two represents a net shift of 10 points toward Rubio and away from Bush since March, when the former governor led the U.S. senator 24-12 percent in a Quinnipiac poll.

Nationally, it's a similar story. According to Real Clear Politics' national polling average of the race, Bush is essentially tied with Rubio. The margin between the two is less than a percentage point, with Walker in between. At its height at the beginning of the year, Bush's lead over Rubio was 17 percent to 5 percent. Bush's advantage started to dissipate about the same time Rubio announced for president in April.

The venue for Rubio's campaign announcement – the Freedom Tower, nicknamed "The Ellis Island of the South" — was a testament to the history of Miami, particularly for Cuban exiles and immigrants. Many had their immigration status processed at the iconic Mediterranean-style building after they fled to the United States in the wake of Fidel Castro's 1959 coup.

Bush's Monday announcement also took place within the county borders, but at a gymnasium lacking that symbolism. His team held a larger, more traditional and well-organized campaign announcement that showcased more surrogates and videos explaining his biography – a tacit admission that Bush, who last ran for office in 2002, knows he needs to start from scratch in introducing himself to voters. Where Rubio spoke only a line of Spanish in his address, Bush spoke more Spanish and emphasized Latino culture.

It's a practice he learned here in Miami-Dade, where campaigning in Spanish — with a salsa-attuned-ear to Latin culture — is a must. Unlike any other county in the United States, registered Republicans in Miami-Dade are overwhelmingly Hispanic – almost 73 percent – and nearly all Cuban-American. There are more Republicans here (it's the most-populous county in the state, with 1.3 million voters) than anywhere else in Florida. And they vote at some of the highest rates in the state.

The nearly 360,000 registered Republicans are outnumbered 42 percent to 28 percent by registered Democrats but GOP politicians control the county's power structure, holding more seats on the county commission and the state's legislative and congressional delegations. As a result, GOP politics, and therefore countywide politics, are often covered more in Spanish TV and radio than in English here.

A majority of the county's top elected officials – the three Cuban-American members of Congress, top Republican state legislators – are with Bush, an established figure since 1980. The race, though, could be far closer among rank-and-file voters, said Armando Ibarra, who's not siding with anyone and is the director of club growth for Miami-Dade's young Republicans.

"People are conflicted. Jeb has ties that stretch back 30 years in this community, and that's tough to match. But Marco is in a good spot. What I hear from some people is that they were jittery about Jeb for a while," Ibarra said. "It's going to be hard for a lot of Cuban-Americans in the end to resist the temptation to vote for Marco, a son of this community. There's a saying with Cubans, 'la juventud impone' – it means something like, 'the youth gets ahead,' that what the older generation is doing is for the younger. A lot of older people like the idea that a kid who was riding bikes in the neighborhood could be president."

But Sasha Tirador, an independent political consultant who often handles Spanish-language Republican campaigns, said she has heard older Cuban-Americans grouse that Rubio didn't wait his turn.

"The sense among many of them is that Marco betrayed his mentor," Tirador said. She said that Bush's record of accomplishments might be more attractive to Republican voters here, even Cuban-Americans, who don't necessarily view Bush as an Anglo.

"Jeb Bush is more than an honorary Cuban. He's an honorary Hispanic," she said.

More than any other single figure in the county, Bush is responsible for making the GOP what it is in Miami — and, perhaps, the state. And those efforts helped pave the way for Rubio's rise.

The bilingual Bush moved to Miami in 1980 when he was 27 years old (Rubio was 9) to work on his father's campaign for president and then vice president on the ticket of Ronald Reagan, whose campaign team identified Cuban-Americans as ripe for plucking because of their cultural conservatism, vehement anti-communism and still-fresh memories of John F. Kennedy's botched Bay of Pigs invasion.

Ahead of Reagan's 1984 re-election campaign, Jeb became chair of the county party. He became known as a relentless recruiter who reveled in his work — he described converting Democrats as "missionary work."

The results: 4,000 Democrats switched their party registration that year, with Bush hand-delivering half of that total to the elections office in a single day. On one notable occasion, immediately after a 1984 naturalization ceremony in the Orange Bowl, nearly 10,000 Hispanics registered Republican. In all, voter rolls grew 20 percent that year, an increase disproportionately due to Hispanics, 74 percent of whom registered Republican. Bush's efforts helped reduced the Democrats' 3-1 registration edge over Republicans to 2-1 by Election Day, The Miami Herald reported.

A decade later, Bush ran for his first statewide elected office against incumbent Gov. Lawton Chiles and narrowly lost. He continued building the local GOP but also began to direct his efforts at the state level as well. He won in 1998, becoming the first Republican since Reconstruction to govern with a majority-Republican Legislature. In his 2002 re-election, Jeb throttled his opponent as Republicans seized the Governor's mansion, Florida Legislature and Cabinet. In both of his wins, Bush carried Miami-Dade, which remained disproportionately loaded with Democratic voters.

Along the way, Rubio entered Bush's orbit. A child of the Reagan years, Rubio came of age during the Bush-led Republican ascendancy in Florida. He interned for Congresswoman Ileana Ros-Lehtinen and, in 1996, was recruited by Bush's future state GOP chairman, Al Cardenas, to run Miami get-out-the-vote efforts for Bob Dole's doomed presidential campaign. Two years later, he won a city commission seat in the middle-class suburb of West Miami, which borders the tonier Coral Gables where Bush lives today. In 1999, less than a year after Bush assumed office, Rubio won a tough special election for a state House seat.

A loyal Bush-agenda voter, Rubio scaled the rungs of power in the state House and quickly began running for a future post as Florida House speaker. Bush's machine helped, but Rubio did much of it on his own as well.

Rubio started his two-year term as speaker in 2007, the same year Bush left office due to term limits, and became the standard bearer for his legacy. He hired Bush's old staffers and policy wonks and resisted the agenda of then-GOP Gov. Charlie Crist, who was viewed by conservatives with suspicion. When the two clashed in the 2010 Senate race, Bush and his network helped keep Rubio alive until he picked up momentum and defeated Crist.

Rubio showed his gratitude by lavishing praise on Bush in his “American Son” autobiography. A year after that, in 2013, Republicans started to turn on both of them for supporting a pathway to citizenship for illegal immigrants. Rubio tried to make amends with conservatives and backed away from the immigration bill he helped draft. But Bush didn’t change much and, unlike Rubio, stuck by his support for the Common Core educational standards.

It caused a strain with the local party: the Republican Executive Committee voted in September 2013 to oppose Common Core, a slap at the self-styled “education governor.”

“Is loyalty to its lead promoters – Jeb Bush and the rest of the Republican leadership — so cemented that we will be whipped into one mindset and put party over principal?” activist Pam Evans asked Republicans before the vote.

Even as two favorite sons ascend to the national stage, the Republican brand in Miami-Dade is diminishing. Local voters have drifted leftward in the last two presidential elections: President Obama won the county in 2012 by a stunning margin of 208,459 votes, enabling him to squeak past Mitt Romney in Florida. Registered Democrats now outnumber Republicans by 188,119; for the first time last year, voters of no major party affiliation – typically called independents — now outnumber registered Republicans.

As if those trends weren’t worrisome enough for Bush and Rubio, younger Cuban-Americans are less likely to register or vote Republican like their parents or grandparents — the GOP is the last choice for non-Cuban Hispanics lately when they register to vote.

Jeb Bush's Standing Improves Among Republicans // NBC News // Mark Murray – June 21, 2015

Jeb Bush's standing among Republican primary voters continues to improve, Marco Rubio remains popular with the party and two-thirds of GOP voters say they couldn't support Donald Trump.

Those are the findings from a brand-new NBC News/Wall Street Journal, which was conducted June 14-18 — during the build-up and coverage of Bush's and Trump's official presidential announcements.

According to the poll, 75 percent of Republicans say they could see themselves supporting Bush, the former Florida governor, for president, versus 22 percent who couldn't (+53 points). That's up from his 70 percent-27 percent score in April (+43), and 49 percent-42 percent score in March (+7).

Rubio, the Florida senator, has the highest margin of support among Republicans, with 74 percent who could see themselves backing him and 15 percent who couldn't (+59) - unchanged from April's poll.

Meanwhile, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, who is expected to announce his presidential bid next month, has plenty of upside with GOP voters: 57 percent could see themselves supporting him, versus 19 percent who couldn't (+38), but there's another 21 percent who say they don't know his name.

The most unpopular GOP presidential candidate in the poll? Donald Trump, who announced his White House bid last Tuesday (but who still has yet to file his "statement of candidacy" with the Federal Election Commission). Just 32 percent of Republican primary voters say they could see themselves supporting him, compared with a whopping 66 percent who couldn't (-34).

Below are the scores on this question for the full GOP field:

- Marco Rubio: 74 percent-15 percent (+59)
- Jeb Bush: 75 percent-22 percent (+53)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Scott Walker: 57 percent-19 percent (+38)
- Mike Huckabee: 65 percent-32 percent (+33)
- Ben Carson: 50 percent-21 percent (+29)
- Rick Perry: 53 percent-31 percent (+22)
- Ted Cruz: 51 percent-31 percent (+20)
- Rick Santorum: 49 percent-40 percent (+9)
- Bobby Jindal: 36 percent-28 percent (+8)
- Rand Paul: 49 percent-45 percent (+4)
- Carly Fiorina: 31 percent-29 percent (+2)
- John Kasich: 25 percent-30 percent (-5)
- Chris Christie: 36 percent-55 percent (-19)
- Lindsey Graham: 27 percent-49 percent (-22)
- George Pataki: 13 percent-44 percent (-31)
- Donald Trump 32 percent-66 percent (-34)

The margin of error on this question in the NBC/WSJ poll is plus-minus 6.4 percentage points. The full poll - which will include the horserace numbers for the Democratic and Republican fields, as well as general-election numbers - will be released on Monday night at 6:30 pm ET.

Jeb Bush faces key test on immigration // Albequerque Journal // Andres Oppenheimer – June 20, 2015

Jeb Bush, who speaks fluent Spanish and has a Mexican-born wife, is the Republican hopeful who would do best among Hispanic voters in the 2016 presidential elections. But his party – and he himself – have veered so far to the right on immigration and social issues that even he will have a big Latino problem.

Most pollsters agree Republicans will need between 40 percent and 44 percent of the Hispanic vote to win in 2016, more than they received in recent elections. The most recent Republican candidate, Mitt Romney, lost the 2012 election to a large extent because he only got 27 percent of the Latino vote.

There is little question that Jeb would be the best equipped to win Latino votes among the current Republican hopefuls. He is the only one who speaks Spanish at home, has lived in Mexico and Venezuela, majored in Latin American studies at the University of Texas, and has had close Cuban-American ties since he moved to Miami in 1980.

It was no coincidence during his presidential announcement on Monday the crowd chanted “Viva Jeb!” Congresswoman Ileana Ross Lehtinen, R-Miami, said: “Jeb is Cuban. He’s Nicaraguan. He’s Venezuelan.”

While fellow Republican hopefuls Sens. Marco Rubio, R-Fla., and Ted Cruz, R-Texas, have Cuban parents and Rubio also speaks fluent Spanish, they don’t have a Mexican wife and Mexican-American children who can campaign with them in Spanish, nor Bush’s personal history of having lived in Latin America.

Despite all of this, Bush would face an uphill battle to get more than 40 percent of the Latino vote and win the 2016 elections. Democrats and pro-immigration groups are already stressing that Bush is running for what they call “the deportation party” and say that he is already retrenching from his previous moderation on immigration issues.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Among their main lines of attack:

First, Bush is voicing strong opposition to Obama's executive action on immigration, which would freeze the deportations of up to 5 million undocumented immigrants. That will put Bush at odds with millions of Hispanic voters who have relatives and friends who would benefit from Obama's measure, critics say.

Second, Bush has adopted the conservative Republicans' mantra that "we have to secure the border" before implementing immigration reform. Critics say that new measures to "secure the border" would not only be a waste of money at a time when illegal immigration from Mexico is at a historic low, but also is a Republican excuse for not doing anything about undocumented immigrants now in the country.

Third, Bush has stepped back from his previous support for eventual citizenship for undocumented immigrants who regularize their status, writing in a 2013 book that he supports a legal path to permanent status, but not to citizenship, critics say. In fact, Bush has gone back and forth on this, but remains the most pro-immigrant among the major Republican hopefuls.

Fourth, Bush supports many conservative stands, such as opposition to Obamacare and raising the minimum wage, which most Hispanics support.

Matt Barreto and Gary Segura, of Latino Decisions, a Hispanic market polling firm, wrote earlier this week that these and other stands are likely to cause Bush to lose the Latino vote.

"Latino voters have proven more than willing to reject even actual Latinos as candidates when their policy positions are in contrast to the community preferences," they wrote.

My opinion: The key test for Bush's presidential bid will be whether he can withstand the temptation to shift further to the right on immigration during the primaries, where he will need to court anti-immigration voters in northern states and where he will be attacked by his fellow Republican hopefuls for his support for comprehensive immigration reform.

If Bush can win the nomination by keeping a pro-immigration profile and convincing fellow Republicans that – whether they like his immigration stance or not – he's their best hope to win the White House, he'll have a chance in 2016.

If, as many of us suspect, he shifts to the right on immigration because he thinks that it will be the only way to win the primaries, as Romney did in 2012, he's doomed to lose the Hispanic vote, and the 2016 election.

Mitt Romney, Jeb Bush Say Confederate Flag Should be Removed // Slate // Daniel Politi – June 20, 2015

Those calling for the removal of the Confederate flag that is flying above the grounds of South Carolina's state Capitol received support from two Republicans on Saturday. Mitt Romney was by far the most forceful. The 2012 Republican presidential nominee did not mince words, taking to Twitter to write: "Take down the #ConfederateFlag at the SC Capitol. To many, it is a symbol of racial hatred. Remove it now to honor #Charleston victims."

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush wasn't as direct but his words left little room for interpretation. In a post on Facebook, Bush said that his position "is clear" on what should be done with the flag. "In Florida, we acted, moving the flag from the state grounds to a museum where it belonged," Bush said. "This is obviously a very sensitive time in South Carolina and our prayers are with the families, the AME church community and the entire state. Following a period of mourning, there will rightly be a discussion among leaders in the state about how South Carolina should move forward and I'm confident they will do the right thing." Bush's words appeared to closely echo President Obama's views on the issue. “The president has said before he believes the Confederate flag belongs in a museum, and that is still his position,” spokesman Eric Schultz told reporters aboard Air Force One on Friday.

Other Republican contenders got close to the line but fell short of saying the flag should be removed outright. Carly Fiorina, for example, said she agrees the flag is a “symbol of racial hatred” but her “personal opinion is not what’s relevant here,” according to the Associated Press. Senator Ted Cruz of Texas, meanwhile, told the Washington Post that South Carolina is the one that has to decide what to do about the flag. “I think that’s a question for South Carolina, and the last thing they need is people from outside the state coming in and dictating how they should resolve that issue,” Cruz said.

Although Romney’s strong statement was surprising considering how Republican leaders have appeared reluctant to discuss the role of race in the church shooting in South Carolina, the New York Times points out that the former governor has been speaking up against the flag for years. “That flag shouldn’t be flown,” Romney said in 2008. “That’s not a flag I recognize.”

Confederate flag fell in Florida under Gov. Jeb Bush // Tampa Bay Times // Alex Leary – June 20, 2015

Take down the #ConfederateFlag at the SC Capitol. To many, it is a symbol of racial hatred. Remove it now to honor #Charleston victims. – Mitt Romney

We've asked the Bush campaign if he agrees with Romney. It would seem so. Florida removed the flag under Bush. (Bush began yesterday not addressing the racial motivation behind the shooting in Charleston but then pointedly called the shooter a "racist."

"My position on how to address the Confederate flag is clear," Bush said in a statement provided to the Tampa Bay Times. "In Florida we acted, moving the flag from the state grounds to a museum where it belonged. This is obviously a very sensitive time in South Carolina and our prayers are with the families, the AME church community and the entire state. Following a period of mourning there will rightly be a discussion among leaders in the state about how South Carolina should move forward, and I'm confident they will do the right thing."

From the St. Petersburg Times, Feb. 10, 2001:

The Confederate flag was removed this month from the Florida state Capitol, with little notice and none of the uproar that accompanied its departure in other Southern states.

The "Stainless Banner," which features the Confederate battle flag design in the top left corner of a field of white, was retired Feb. 2. It had flown since 1978 outside the Capitol's west entrance.

Gov. Jeb Bush and Secretary of State Katherine Harris -- Republicans who angered thousands of black Floridians during the controversial presidential election -- simply decided it was time for the flag to go.

"Regardless of our views about the symbolism of the . . . flags -- and people of goodwill can disagree on the subject -- the governor believes that most Floridians would agree that the symbols of Florida's past should not be displayed in a manner that may divide Floridians today," Bush spokeswoman Katie Baur said in a written statement.

Flags commemorating the French, Spanish and British governments that once ruled the state and flew beside the Confederate flag also were removed. All four will be housed at the Florida Museum of History a few blocks from the Capitol.

"The governor is confident that a new historical display at the museum will better reflect the context and history of Florida's historical flags as we begin a new century," Baur's statement read.

RUBIO

In Miami, Rubio downplays competition with Bush: 'It's politics. It's not personal.' // WaPo // Sean Sullivan – June 20, 2015

Jeb Bush launched his presidential campaign here in his hometown on Monday. On Saturday, his Republican rival and mentee Marco Rubio took a turn under the local spotlight. His message: Nothing personal.

Hours before he was scheduled to address a major Republican Party fundraiser here in the city where both he and Bush have deep political roots, Rubio, a Republican senator, sought to downplay his emerging competition against the former governor.

"It's politics. It's not personal," Rubio told reporters, later adding: "I'm not running against Jeb Bush. I'm running for president."

And when he gave his speech, Rubio emphasized that he is not looking for nasty fight, complementing the field of GOP hopefuls.

"I am not running against any of my fellow Republicans," he said.

Bush mentored Rubio as he rose through the Florida political ranks. The competition between the two has put Republicans here in their stomping grounds in an awkward position.

"A lot of Republicans are kind of torn," said Miami-Dade County GOP Chairman Nelson Diaz, a former Rubio aide who is staying neutral in the primary. He said the decision to invite Rubio to speak at the Lincoln Day Dinner was not a slight against Bush; Rubio was asked 14 months ago.

Fielding questions from reporters on a variety of subjects ahead of his speech, Rubio said it is up to the people of South Carolina, not "outsiders," to decide whether to remove the Confederate flag from the state Capitol grounds, declining to echo Mitt Romney's call to remove it.

"This is an issue that they should debate and work through and not have a bunch of outsiders going in and telling them what to do," he told reporters.

Rubio said he supports the 2001 decision in Florida, by then-governor and now-rival Jeb Bush, to move the flag from the capitol to a museum.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But as a state House member in 2001, Rubio was one of the sponsors of a measure to prohibit the "relocation, removal, disturbance, or alteration of a monument, memorial, plaque, marker, or historic flag commemorating or memorializing specified wars and military engagements," including the Civil War, "permanently displayed on public property of the state or any of its political subdivisions."

Rubio spokesman Alex Conant told the Huffington Post that Rubio, "along with four other Cuban-Americans, two African-Americans, and a Jewish Democrat co-sponsored this legislation" to protect "war monuments."

In his most expansive remarks on the deadly mass shooting at a black church in Charleston that has sparked a national debate over the flag, Rubio said the white man charged with the killings "carried out an act motivated by racial hatred."

"It's an atrocity. It's a horrifying instance," said Rubio. He said the suspect "is full of hate in his heart."

Asked about Pope Francis's encyclical on the environment, Rubio, a Roman Catholic who has questioned how much humans have contributed to climate change, sounded a respectful note, but he did not endorse the pontiff's blaming of human activity for climate change.

"I have no problem with what the pope did," said Rubio. "He has a moral authority, and as a moral authority, is reminding us of our obligation to be good caretakers of the planet."

Rubio continued: "I am a political leader. And my job as a policy maker is to act in the common good. And I do believe it's in the common good to protect our environment. But I also believe it's in the common good to protect our economy."

Outside the dinner Rubio supporters tried to drown out a handful of immigration protesters critical of the senator:

In his speech, Rubio also made light of report about his purchase of an $80,000 boat, saying it is "cleverly disguised as a family fishing boat."

Jeb Bush vs. Marco Rubio: Can the friendly tone last? // CS Monitor // Linda Feldman – June 20, 2015

Jeb Bush and Marco Rubio, both top GOP prospects for president, often describe one another as “friend” or even “good friend.” And they seem to mean it.

They are so close they’re practically family, like uncle and nephew, people who know them have said. It is a relationship born of their days in Florida politics, Mr. Bush as governor, Senator Rubio as a state representative. They still live just a few miles apart, Bush in Coral Gables and Rubio in West Miami.

Now they are out to vanquish one another. For the moment, top-tier candidates like Bush and Rubio – and those with a shot at making the top tier – are working on channeling their inner Ronald Reagan or even their inner Barack Obama. Both presidents won election twice with positive, hopeful messages.

That isn’t necessarily a bad thing, political analysts say. Campaigns are all about making contrasts – in candidates’ styles, temperaments, records, skill sets, and ideas. Voters need information on which to make a decision.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sometimes, the information that emerges can be unflattering, but if it's accurate, then it's fair game.

While unfair attacks or outright lies are another matter, a number of factors – from the sheer size of the presidential field to the rise of outside political groups – suggest that such attacks will remain a part of the campaign playbook this election. Indeed, Bush's own father in many ways proved the power of the negative campaign, and so long as it remains effective, politicians will use it.

"In politics, especially on this level, you have friendships, but just like in business, when it's time for business, it's time for business. When it's time for politics, it's time for politics," says Matthew Corrigan, political scientist and author of the book "Conservative Hurricane: How Jeb Bush Remade Florida."

Bush and Rubio "are both going to run very tough campaigns, and they're going to have to," says Mr. Corrigan, who teaches at the University of North Florida in Jacksonville.

Clearly, Bush and Rubio have much at stake in the messages that come out of both their campaigns and the outside groups that support them – groups over which the candidates have no control, in theory, as they are barred from coordinating with the campaigns by law. Bush has pledged to campaign "joyfully" and with a message of optimism. Rubio, the son of Cuban immigrants, has gone far – and fast – by campaigning as a happy warrior and a man of the future who embodies the American dream.

Still, they are taking shots at each other, if ever-so-gently. Bush regularly touts his executive experience as a governor by comparing the senators in the 2016 race – no names mentioned – to a certain former senator now occupying the White House.

"As our whole nation has learned since 2008, executive experience is another term for preparation and there is no substitute for that," Bush said in his announcement speech Monday.

When Rubio announced in April, he made a comment that was interpreted as a swipe at Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton, who had announced the day before. But it could just as easily have been a jab at Bush, the son and brother of former presidents. "Yesterday is over, and we're never going back," Rubio said.

This is all pretty tame stuff. But it's early, and history suggests that as the stakes mount, the tone becomes more combative. It was Bush's father, the genteel George H.W. Bush, who brought in the aggressive operative Lee Atwater to run his 1988 presidential campaign. Mr. Atwater was most famous for using Willie Horton, a convicted murderer who had raped a woman while on furlough, against Democratic nominee Michael Dukakis. Atwater famously said he would make Mr. Horton "[Governor] Dukakis's running mate," after an outside group made an ad highlighting Horton.

Jeb's brother, George W. Bush, also benefited from the aggressive actions of an outside group, Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, during his successful reelection campaign for president in 2004. The Swift Boaters effectively attacked Democratic nominee John Kerry's military service during the Vietnam War. John McCain, the Arizona senator and former prisoner of war, condemned the attacks, but the Bush campaign did not.

In both cases, it was not the Bushes themselves who were making the negative assertions. It was operatives, or advertisements, or outside groups. That's the lesson Jeb learned when he ran for governor of Florida the first time, unsuccessfully, in 1994.

"Bush was the one making the tough statements, and of course he got hit for it and lost," says Corrigan at the University of North Florida. "He learned from that model, it's not the candidate that should be making the big haymakers, usually. You've got a whole operation to do that."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Indeed, part of the purpose of the political machinery around candidates is to allow the candidates themselves to remain positive while still attacking through back doors. Even as Bush and Rubio take the rhetorical high ground, their surrogates – people deputized to speak for the candidates – will not feel the need to be so high-minded.

“Do I think you will see campaign surrogates attacking the other candidates? Yes,” says Kathleen Hall Jamieson, director of the Annenberg Public Policy Center at the University of Pennsylvania in Philadelphia. “Will they try to do it off the record? Yes. Will they be planting opposition research with the press? Yes. Because that’s how politics works these days. If they didn’t do that, they would not be a competitive campaign, unfortunately.”

For other, lower-tier candidates, the size of the Republican field could spur desperate moves. Then there's billionaire Donald Trump, who plays a different kind of political game. He went after Rubio and Bush by name in his 40-minute stemwinder of a campaign announcement Tuesday, slamming both for their answers to questions on the Iraq War.

Mr. Trump doesn’t mince words – and he wins some support for his brash style, possibly enough to qualify for the first debate on Aug. 6. Though he has virtually no chance of winning the GOP nomination, with three-quarters of Republican voters ruling him out, the tactic of attack will likely become an integral part of the campaign.

At Miami-Dade GOP, a homecoming for Marco Rubio // The Miami Herald // Patricia Mazzei – June 20, 2015

It was homecoming for Marco Rubio at the Miami-Dade Republican Party on Saturday night, and he relished the chance to kid around with the people who know him best.

“My son was saying ‘Polo,’” Rubio joked.

The Florida senator and 2016 presidential candidate headlined the local GOP’s annual Lincoln Day fund-raiser. They booked him a year ago, long before he launched his candidacy. The choice proved prescient: The party sold more tickets than it had since 1989, Chairman Nelson Diaz said.

With the loyalties of Miami Republicans split between Rubio and that other local candidate, no one on stage uttered the words “Jeb Bush.”

Bush, who kicked off his campaign Monday at Miami Dade College, was alluded to several times. But this night was Rubio’s.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I am not running against any of my fellow Republicans,” Rubio insisted, addressing the news media. “I know they want us to fight. I know they want us to argue. It makes for better articles.”

He directly poked fun at a New York Times story that detailed Rubio’s finances — a story he then used as a campaign fund-raising pitch.

“We’ve even been able to make enough to buy a luxury speedboat,” Rubio said, “though I admit it’s cleverly disguised as a family fishing boat.” The crowd roared.

He declared himself “proud” to be from a state with four presidential candidates — also Ben Carson and Mike Huckabee — and “from a city with more presidential candidates per capita than any city in America.”

Seated in the ballroom at the DoubleTree by Hilton Miami Airport & Convention Center were longtime Rubio friends he praised by name, including “political godmother” Rebeca Sosa, a county commissioner, and David Rivera, a former congressman. Rubio’s wife, Jeanette, and their four children were also in attendance — a rare occurrence, he pointed out, considering how much time he’s spent on the road since declaring his candidacy in April.

He recounted his first campaign, for West Miami City Commission in 1998, as the time he “really met my community face to face.” He’d have 18 cups of Cuban coffee a day, he said, and get so jittery that “my hands were shaking.”

Rubio didn’t deviate much from his stump speech, portions of which are familiar to many Miami-Dade Republicans who have been listening to him for years. As a result, his remarks weren’t especially rabble-rousing. He received much applause for opposing the Affordable Care Act — “We will repeal and replace Obamacare before it repeals and replaces American jobs” — and got in a few indirect jabs at Bush, including over educational standards — “We still improved our schools without Common Core,” he said of his time in the statehouse.

And he concluded by tugging at the immigrant heartstrings of the heavily Cuban-American audience by mentioning his father, who worked as a bartender.

“The journey from behind that bar to behind this microphone — journey is the essence of the American Dream,” he said. “In America, that’s not just my story. That’s our story. In Miami, that is our story.”

The crowd ate it up.

Marco Rubio: 'No problem' with Catholic Church on climate change but economy more important // The Miami Herald // Patricia Mezzai – June 20, 2015

Marco Rubio, a Roman Catholic, said Saturday he has "no problem" with Pope Francis' encyclical urging action on climate change -- but added he won't support policies that could help the environment but "hurt our economy."

"I have no problem with what the pope did," Rubio told reporters in Miami before speaking to the Miami-Dade County Republican Party. "He is a moral authority and as a moral authority is reminding us of our obligation to be good caretakers to the planet. I'm a political leader. And my job as a policymaker is to act in the common good. And I do believe it's in the common good to protect our environment, but I also believe it's in the common good to protect our economy."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Though scientists are in broad agreement that climate change is man-made, Rubio continued to question that premise. He said his focus is on tackling the consequences rather than what caused it.

"I don' think there is a scientific consensus on what percent, how sensitive, climate is to human activity," he said. "But the broader question as a policy maker is not whether I believe humans have contributed 10 percent, 50 percent or 99 percent. The fundamental question I have as a policymaker must be what can we do about it and what impact will it have on the rest of our country and the rest of our lives. And what I am not going to support are measures that will hurt our economy and put people out of work and increase the cost of living."

He began answering the question by poking at Democrats who have trumpeted the pope's position on the environment but not social issues.

"I find it ironic that a lot of the same liberals who are touting the encyclical on climate change ignore multiple pronouncements of this pope on the definition of marriage and on the sanctity of life," Rubio said.

Marco Rubio to name Adam Hasner, Tom Rooney Florida campaign chairs // The Miami Herald // Patricia Mezzai – June 20, 2015

Marco Rubio on Saturday will name two longtime supporters as co-chairmen of his 2016 presidential campaign in Florida.

U.S. Rep. Tom Rooney of Okeechobee and former Florida House Majority Leader Adam Hasner of Delray Beach will be in charge of building a grass-roots donor and activist network for Rubio.

The Republican senator will announce the appointments at the Miami-Dade County GOP's Lincoln Day dinner Saturday night.

Rooney briefly flirted with running for Rubio's U.S. Senate seat but decided against it in April. He is one of only a few members of Florida's Republican members of Congress who have endorsed Rubio for president. The majority have backed hometown rival Jeb Bush.

Hasner was the GOP leader under Rubio's House speakership from 2007-08. Rubio's team has already named statewide chairs or co-chairs in the four key early primary and caucus states: Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada.

Marco Rubio, Jeb Bush focus on home-state Republicans // Sun Sentinel // Anthony Man – June 20, 2015

Neither Marco Rubio nor Jeb Bush is willing to cede an inch of Florida territory to the other.

Speaking just five days after Bush's presidential announcement, Rubio showed Saturday night with a speech to a hometown crowd why Florida's presidential primary may be a close contest — and critical in deciding who wins the Republican presidential nomination.

Rubio told almost 750 party faithful at the Miami-Dade Republican Party's Lincoln Day dinner that he had "no intention of running for president with the desire of tearing anyone down," then took a couple of jabs at Bush.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When he was speaker of the Florida House, Rubio said, "we still improved our schools without Common Core." Bush supports the Common Core educational standards, an attempt to improve the way schools teach and test critical subjects that is vehemently opposed by many in the conservative wing of the party.

Before the dinner and during his speech, Rubio, 44, also repeated his pitch for the future, which serves as a contrast with Bush, 62. "This is an election about the future, not the past. And I think we need to be led by leaders in this country who understand the 21st Century and have an agenda for it."

In his kickoff in Miami on Monday, a short drive from Rubio's speech Saturday night, Bush presented himself as a leader whose background as a governor shows he can produce results. "There's no passing off responsibility when you're a governor, no blending into the legislative crowd or filing an amendment and calling that success."

On Saturday, Rubio promised to ensure America remains strong and powerful, suggesting a difference with President Barack Obama. "We're not just going to hold press conferences where we talk tough."

Rubio punctuated his 36-minute speech with frequent humor, often aimed at himself. He noted Lt. Gov. Carlos Lopez-Cantera's frequent swigs of water during his speech. It was lunging for a bottle of water on nationwide TV early in his term that earned Rubio lots of negative attention.

He observed that Miami has more presidential candidates per capita than any other. He reproached some of the shoppers at the Kmart where his mother worked. "Thanks for making a mess in the aisles. She had to clean it up."

And he poked at a recent New York Times investigation into his finances, with the newspaper reporting he bought a speedboat, something his campaign has said isn't true. Rubio joked that his family was successful enough that "we've even been able to buy a luxury speedboat," he said. "It is cleverly disguised as a family fishing boat."

Judging from the applause, the crowd liked what it heard, something Nelson Diaz, chairman of the Miami-Dade Republican Party, said is easy to understand. "Marco's a hometown boy. He's running for president. And he's a superstar," he said.

But Rubio can't take the region for granted.

West Miami is home to Rubio, the state's junior U.S. senator, and Coral Gables is home to Bush, the state's former governor.

Miami-Dade County, home to the largest pool of Republican voters in Florida, likely will play a critical role in determining which man wins the state's March 15 primary, which could turn it into ground zero at a critical stage of the competition for the Republican presidential nomination.

The Sunshine State primary comes after the pivotal early states — Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada — begin winnowing the field and two weeks after a flurry of other states' primaries on March 1.

Florida is an early mega-state primary, and a rule change for next year makes it a winner-take-all contest instead of awarding nominating convention delegates based on each candidate's share of the vote.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So a win or loss for one of the favorite sons could prove decisive — giving a jolt of momentum to the winner and major blow to the loser.

With such high stakes, the contest for Florida is highly competitive between the two.

"I think it's going to be very competitive," said Mike Rump, president of the Republican Business Network in northwest Broward, who attended the dinner. "Jeb might win Florida, but they've both won statewide elections. Marco might beat him."

A Quinnipiac University Poll released Thursday showed the two men are effectively tied, with 20 percent for Bush and 18 percent for Rubio, with no other candidate coming close.

When Republicans' first and second choices are combined, Rubio is 3 percentage points ahead of Bush.

As the race has tightened in recent months — Bush was ahead by 17 percentage points in February and 12 points in April — opportunities to rally Republican activists are more important than routine stops on the rubber-chicken circuit.

After his Monday kickoff that drew 3,000 people to Miami-Dade College's Kendall's campus, Bush was back in the state for a speech Friday at the Hillsborough County Republican Party's Lincoln Day dinner in Tampa.

Bush announced that his Florida campaign would be headquartered in Tampa — not in his South Florida home base — signaling the importance of the Interstate 4 corridor that runs through the central part of the state.

On Saturday, Rubio announced that his Florida campaign will be headed by former Florida House Majority Leader, R-Boca Raton, and U.S. Rep. Tom Rooney, R-Okeechobee.

He declined to offer any expectations for Florida's primary. "That's a long way off. There are a lot of votes before that. And I can tell you if you don't do well in some of those early states, you won't be involved in the Florida primary."

Senate race

Also present was Rubio pal and Florida Lt. Gov. Carlos Lopez-Cantera.

Lopez-Cantera is widely expected to enter the race for the Republican nomination to succeed Rubio, who isn't running for a second term because he's running for president.

Lopez-Cantera teased the audience about his intentions. He said he wouldn't run if he couldn't still be a good husband and father — and revealed that his wife is urging him to run. He also took swipes at U.S. Rep. Patrick Murphy, who is seeking the Democratic Senate nomination, and U.S. Rep. Alan Grayson, expected to run for Senate.

He revealed that he'd announce his decision on July 15.

Senator Rubio falls silent on immigration, his signature subject // The Boston Globe // Matt Viser – June 20, 2015

Over the first six months of 2013, freshman Senator Marco Rubio shot to national prominence as he took the lead on one of the nation's most divisive issues, with all the political promise and peril that goes with such a move.

He joined a bipartisan group of senators pushing a law to crack down on illegal immigration while blazing a path for some of the 11 million illegal immigrants already here to achieve legal status.

In that cause, Rubio relentlessly pursued the spotlight. He granted at least 50 interviews on television and radio, many with conservative hosts who adamantly disagreed with his plan and considered him a traitor for working with Democrats. On one Sunday alone, he appeared on seven television shows.

"In my heart and in my mind, I know we must solve this problem once and for all," he said, just before the Senate bill passed. "Or it will only get worse and it will only get harder to solve."

But then, almost as soon as he and his allies finished pushing the bill through the Senate, Rubio walked away from the issue in what, even for Washington, represented a stunning about-face. Hopes for an immigration overhaul soon fizzled in the House, where the conservative critics vowed to block any bill offering what they consider "amnesty."

Now, as Rubio runs for president in the Republican primary, he has almost completely purged his signature issue of two years ago from his political vocabulary.

During 2013, he mentioned "immigration" or "immigrant" 135 times on the Senate floor. But over the last two years, he's only uttered those words two times, according to a Globe review of the Congressional Record. Over those first six months of 2013, his office sent out nearly 150 press releases on immigration. Since then, he has issued just three press releases on the subject.

'Young Mr. Rubio is figuring out the hard facts of politics in America.'

The story of Rubio's shift not only reveals an especially bald political calculation, but also reflects broader Republican ambivalence on an issue that continues to bedevil the party. His Cuban-American heritage, his family story, and his leadership on immigration made Rubio one of the GOP's most promising political figures to appeal to a growing and influential Hispanic demographic that is increasingly key to the national electoral success.

But now that he seeks the favor of conservative primary voters, Rubio has transformed his calling-card issue into something else — a question mark in his presidential resume.

From Miami, a rising star

Rubio was born 44 years ago in Miami, and his parents' story is a key component of his own. His father was a bartender, his mother a maid — both immigrants from Cuba who fled political and economic hardships in 1956 and became naturalized US citizens nearly two decades later.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A politician who rose to speaker of the Florida House of Representatives, Rubio was elected to the Senate with Tea Party backing. He had a bilingual background. In many ways, he was the ideal political leader to help craft an ambitious immigration plan. And Republicans desperately needed one.

Party leaders who dissected the carcass of Mitt Romney's failed 2012 presidential bid determined that Romney bungled the issue of immigration, particularly when he declared in a debate that undocumented immigrants should engage in "self-deportation."

He won only 27 percent of the Hispanic vote in the general election campaign against President Obama.

It was in this climate that Illinois Senator Dick Durbin, the number-two leader in the Democratic majority, approached Rubio in the Senate gym in December 2012 and implored him to join an emerging bipartisan effort to craft a comprehensive immigration overhaul.

"I went to him and said, 'I think you should be part of this. But you have to understand that path to citizenship is part of the deal,' " Durbin recounted in an interview.

Many conservatives oppose the idea of granting citizenship to those in the country illegally, considering it amnesty. Democrats have resisted the conservative demand that beefed-up border security take priority, but were willing to make a trade.

According to Durbin, Rubio accepted the political risks: "He said, 'I'm prepared to go forward.' And he did."

With Rubio in, the lead backers of the bill became known as the "Gang of Eight" — four Democrats and four Republicans.

Rubio, in a show of his seriousness, expanded his staff, bringing in an immigration expert to help craft legislation. He spoke before groups of white evangelical pastors, quoting Scripture as a justification for the bill, inspiring them with his life story.

The way he spoke of his status as a son of immigrants resonated then, and still does.

"He is connecting the immigrant experience with the American Dream and the larger American story. He does so personally, in a way that connects well," said Russell Moore, head of the Southern Baptist Convention's Ethics and Religious Liberty Commission. "When he talks about his Cuban immigrant father working as a bartender — it takes a lot of rhetorical skill to get Southern Baptists to tear up at a bartender. But he's able to do it."

Senator Marco Rubio (left front) was among the lawmakers on hand in 2013 when Senator John McCain (center) outlined legislation proposed by the bipartisan "Gang of Eight" that would have given illegal immigrants a path to citizenship.

In a dozen interviews with those involved in crafting the Senate plan — including most members of the Gang of Eight — there is universal agreement that Rubio's intellect and charisma were crucial in both convincing skeptical Republicans and blunting the barrage of criticism.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I’ve often said he was more important than the rest of the Republicans combined,” said Senator Jeff Flake, an Arizona Republican and one of the other members of the group.

Representative Luis Gutierrez, an Illinois Democrat who has worked for years on immigration reform, recalled walking out of an hourlong meeting with Rubio and his staff, early in the push for the Senate plan, feeling as though they were about to accomplish something historic.

“I couldn’t have walked away from that meeting happier,” Gutierrez said. “I said to him, ‘We’re going to get this done. We’re absolutely going to get this done.’ ”

The Senate bill would have provided a path to citizenship for 11 million undocumented immigrants, and would also have enhanced border security, adding 20,000 Border Patrol agents and 700 miles of fencing along the southern US border. Under the terms of the bill, the security measures would be completed before any undocumented immigrants achieved legal status.

“During that period, he was engaged in using political capital for the right purpose, from my perspective. And being bipartisan in that engagement. And being willing to argue his case in the most difficult circles,” said Senator Robert Menendez, a New Jersey Democrat. “But maybe there’s a reality to how far their party can go.”

Rubio appeared to have moments of doubt that the bill struck the right balance. In public comments, he would express worry over whether border security measures were going far enough.

Other negotiators detected a rift within Rubio’s staff. His policy team was eagerly trying to reach compromise, while his political team seemed to try to derail it.

Rubio would sometimes seem to distance himself, but never for long.

“He always came back,” said one Democratic staffer. “It was kind of like Lassie.”

Rubio’s ambivalence was understandable given the beating he was taking on conservative talk radio.

Glenn Beck called him a “piece of garbage.” Laura Ingraham panned his plan and said Rubio would “rue the day he became the Gang of Eight’s poodle.” Senator David Vitter, a Republican from Louisiana, called his colleague “just amazingly naive” and “nuts.”

“The reaction was pretty harsh,” said Brent Bozell, a prominent conservative activist and founder of the Media Research Center, a conservative media watchdog organization. “It was rather surprising. I was hearing it all over the country.”

After the legislation passed, it was touted as a historic vote. The Gang of Eight had accomplished something few thought they would and, in a valedictory moment, walked off the Senate floor together and into one of the most ornate hallways in the Capitol, prepared to address reporters.

But one of the eight was missing. Rubio, who did vote for the bill, didn’t show.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“It’s hard to explain. He clearly had a change of heart on the issue,” Durbin said. “It’s an extremely controversial position for him. And as he started entertaining the thought of running [for president], I think his visibility on immigration reform diminished. And his interest in our compromise changed.”

Rubio declined requests for an interview. His spokesman declined to comment for this story.

Tempered expectations

A month after it passed, when advocates were hoping to keep pressure on the House to consider the Senate compromise bill, Rubio told Fox News the legislation he helped author wasn’t perfect and he downplayed its importance.

“Look, it’s not the most important issue facing America,” he said. For example, he said, repealing Obama’s health care plan was a higher priority.

In October 2013, he sometimes spoke as as though he and other Republicans had never been part of the bipartisan push that won Senate passage of the bill.

“The House [isn’t] just going to take up and pass whatever the Democrats in the Senate are demanding,” he said on CNN.

Rubio has also directly contradicted some of his previous statements. In June 2013, responding to constituent concerns, Rubio said one of the reasons immigration is so challenging is that all of the issues — border security and pathway to citizenship — have to be handled together.

“It is all interwoven. It’s all related to each other. It’s literally impossible to do one part without doing the other,” he said.

Four months later, he stated virtually the opposite.

“When you try to do something big in Washington, it ends up running into headwinds,” he said on CNN. “Now that’s the direction the Senate went … but I continue to believe that a series of sequential, individual bills is the best way, the ideal way, to reform our immigration system.”

Immigration advocates trying to keep up the momentum for reform were deflated by Rubio’s change in tone.

The Rev. Samuel Rodriguez, the president of the National Hispanic Christian Leadership Conference, was wowed by Rubio’s early leadership. The conviction with which he spoke about the issue could sway an entire room. Rodriguez misses that voice.

“He was Joshua leading the people into the Promised Land of immigration,” he said. “Then, right when we were on the Jordan River, he pivoted. He looked back to the desert. All of the sudden he pivoted; he took his foot out of the water.”

Now immigration is an uncomfortable conversation for Rubio, said Rodriguez, “a de facto don’t ask, don’t tell.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“The decibel level is lower. That passion is no longer there. … When you hear him speak now you see his eyes move down a bit, his voice fluctuates a tad,” he said. “It’s not the same convicted Marco Rubio that led the charge back in 2013.

“I believe he hasn’t changed at all in terms of his convictions, but he has changed in his political calculations he believes necessary to win the Republican nomination,” Rodriguez said.

“Are we sacrificing conviction and truth at the altar of political expediency? That’s the question that has to be asked.”

A group of immigrants from Honduras and El Salvador who crossed the U.S.-Mexico border illegally were stopped in Texas.

A lesson learned

Earlier this year, Rubio drove to suburban Washington and appeared before the Conservative Political Action Conference, the largest annual gathering of conservative activists.

He told them he had been wrong to pursue comprehensive immigration before first securing the border.

The lesson he’s learned from it all, he said, is that comprehensive immigration reform “just really has no realistic chance of passing.”

Outside observers doubt Rubio will make immigration a major focus of his presidential campaign.

Why fall on your sword for immigration when it can’t pass in the House, where conservatives hold even greater sway than in the Senate?

“Young Mr. Rubio is figuring out the hard facts of politics in America,” said Javier Palomarez, president of the US Hispanic Chamber of Commerce. “Could he have done more? Possibly. But the criticism that he’s changed tacks simply to run for president is overly simplistic. This change in tactic is due to congressional gridlock more than political ambition.”

Palomarez believes Rubio’s shifts on the issue show political savvy. After all, the passionate conservative opposition to Rubio has dissipated as his rhetoric has shifted, giving him better standing in the GOP primary electorate.

And immigration advocates like Palomarez still view Rubio as an ally, someone who could achieve greater gains on the issue from the White House.

“I look at him and say he’s evolving on issues that are important and realizing the landscape he’s working with and the Congress we’ve got,” Palomarez said. “It illustrates a savvy businessman who says, ‘To get from point A to point B, I have to adapt.’”

As Marco Rubio speaks to the Miami-Dade GOP tonight, a look at his Truth-O-Meter record // The Miami Herald // Amy Sherman – June 20, 2015

Sen. Marco Rubio, who speaks to the Miami-Dade Republican Party Saturday night, has kept PolitiFact Florida's Truth-O-Meter busy since 2009 when he ran for U.S. Senate.

One of our earliest fact-checks examined his claim that "Fifty-seven" of Rubio's 100 ideas "ultimately became law" in Florida related to his tenure as House Speaker. We rate that claim Half True.

We have fact-checked Rubio 93 times on a variety of claims including about climate change, Common Core, Cuba, the federal health care law, foreign affairs, guns, poverty, space and technology.

Out of Rubio's 93 ratings, he has received 17 percent True, 24 percent Mostly True, 20 percent Half True, 23 percent Mostly False, 14 percent False and 2 percent Pants on Fire. We also gave him a Half Flip for his position on whether the Iraq war was a mistake.

Here is a look at a few of our recent fact-checks related to Rubio:

Bulk metadata collection: "There is not a single documented case of abuse of this program," Rubio said. There are plenty of documented cases of misuse of the metadata collection program. It just depends whether that misuse is what you or Rubio have in mind when you think of abuse. We found no example of intentional misuse of the program. Keep reading here.

Immigration: "We have a legal immigration system in America that accepts 1 million people a year, legally," Rubio said. "No other country in the world even comes close to that." The United States accepted just under 1 million people in 2013, the most recent numbers available. As a percentage of population, though, the United States ranked 19th out of 24 countries in 2013. Still, Rubio is correct that the overall figure puts the United States ahead of other countries. Keep reading here.

Restoring felons' rights: A Facebook meme says Marco Rubio said that "felons should not have their voting rights restored" but that "convicted felons should be allowed to own guns after they have done their time." The meme was posted by a site that describes itself as satirical, and we found no evidence that Rubio actually said the words attributed to him. While Rubio has spoken critically in the past about felons regaining voting rights, he does not appear to have taken a stance on the restoration of felons' gun rights. Keep reading here.

protecting investors against sharp market drops, sometimes referred to as Black Swan events. The firm manages about $6 billion in assets, a sizable figure for the hedge fund industry.

"I am very grateful to have Mark Spitznagel serve as senior economic advisor to my campaign," Paul, now a U.S. senator from Kentucky, said in a statement.

"As I travel across the country, the top concern of the American people is our failing economy. I believe we can revitalize our economy by encouraging opportunity and entrepreneurship with lower taxes, a balanced budget, less Federal Reserve interventionism, and limited government spending," the candidate said.

"I look forward to working alongside Mark to solve our nation's economic problem and to restore the American Dream," he added.

Paul, one of the leading contenders for the Republican party nomination, was elected in the Tea Party wave of 2010. Much like his iconic father Ron Paul, Paul has become a libertarian standard-bearer.

Spitznagel is also the author of an investing book, "The Dao of Capital" and runs Idyll Farms, an organic goat farm in northern Michigan.

Universa moved its headquarters from Santa Monica, California, to Coconut Grove, Florida last March because of what Spitznagel called a "more hospitable business and tax environment."

"Rand Paul is the only candidate that really understands the destructive ramifications of current economic policy driven in large part by a reckless Federal Reserve. I lookforward to working with him on his ideas and message to change that policy," Spitznagel said in a statement about his new role.

CRUZ

Ted Cruz: It's up to South Carolina to decide on Confederate flag // WaPo // Katie Zezima – June 20, 2015

Sen. Ted Cruz says whether or not South Carolina removes the Confederate flag from a state house memorial is an issue for the state to decide and that he sees "both sides" of the debate.

In an interview with The Washington Post on Saturday, Cruz (R-Tex.) said that he understands why people equate the flag with both racial oppression and historical traditions.

"I understand the passions that this debate evokes on both sides," the GOP presidential hopeful said. "Both those who see a history of racial oppression and a history of slavery, which is the original sin of our nation, and we fought a bloody civil war to expunge that sin."

He added: "But I also understand those who want to remember the sacrifices of their ancestors and the traditions of their states, not the racial oppression, but the historical traditions, and I think often this issue is used as a wedge to try to divide people."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney, the 2012 Republican presidential nominee, said Saturday that the flag should be taken down.

Cruz noted that he is from Texas and the state is “fond of the Texas flag” because it was an independent nation for nine years, and people’s emotions run deep on the issue. He said it is up to South Carolina to decide what to do with the Confederate flag.

“I think that’s a question for South Carolina, and the last thing they need is people from outside the state coming in and dictating how they should resolve that issue,” Cruz said.

Cruz has repeatedly said he is “horrified” by the shooting deaths of nine people at a historic African-American church in Charleston, S.C., and has offered prayers for the families of the victims.

“One of the incredible things yesterday was to see the families of those who were murdered calling for forgiveness of the murderer,” Cruz said Saturday. “I have to admit, if it were my family, I don’t know that I could demonstrate that degree of forgiveness.”

Cruz said he agrees with South Carolina Gov. Nikki Haley’s assertion that the accused gunman should be subject to the death penalty. Dylann Roof, 21, has been charged with murder in the case.

In an event at an indoor shooting range and firearms training facility here, Cruz again vociferously defended the Second Amendment and said Democrats are using the Charleston shootings to try to roll back gun rights.

Cruz on Saturday said again that Democrats and Obama “cynically” used the 2012 school shootings in Newtown, Conn., to try to take away gun rights and that he fought to block that gun control legislation.

Cruz said that the Obama administration only prosecuted a fraction of the people who tried to purchase a firearm after failing a background check, and that its prosecution rates of gun felons dropped.

“In my view that’s totally unacceptable. If you have a violent felon, if you have a fugitive who is illegally trying to buy guns, we should come down on them like a ton of bricks,” he said. “If there are murders and rapists and they’re coming in trying to get guns, we ought to go and stop them.”

Cruz again laid out a laundry list of ways that he has protected the Second Amendment, including writing a pro-Second Amendment amicus brief on behalf of 31 states that he submitted to the Supreme Court when he was Texas solicitor general. The Supreme Court overturned the District of Columbia's ban on handguns in the case, District of Columbia v. Heller.

After taking questions and shaking hands, Cruz took to the shooting range, firing off rounds on a semiautomatic .223-caliber Smith and Wesson M&P15.

Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) dropped a few gun control jokes during his latest swing through Iowa, days after the shooting deaths of nine people in a Charleston, South Carolina, church.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"You know the great thing about the state of Iowa is, I'm pretty sure you all define gun control the same way we do in Texas -- hitting what you aim at," Cruz said at a town hall meeting Friday in Red Oak.

Before a crowd of nearly 70 people, Cruz recalled a recent excursion to a gun range in New Hampshire that had fully automatic machine guns.

"My wife, Heidi, who is a petite, 5'2 California blonde, she was standing at the tripod unloading the full machine gun with a pink baseball cap that said 'armed and fabulous,'" he said.

This is the second ill-timed joke the Republican presidential hopeful has made this month. Cruz made a joke about Joe Biden just days after the vice president's son died from brain cancer.

Cruz did not mention the mass shooting during the town hall meeting Friday, but when prompted by reporters later said Democrats were using the event as an excuse to take away Second Amendment rights.

"It's sad to see the Democrats take a horrific crime and try to use it as an excuse, not to go after people with serious mental illness or people who are repeat felons or criminals, but instead try to use it as an excuse to take away Second Amendment rights of law abiding citizens," he told a group of reporters.

"I'll tell you, it's reminiscent of Rahm Emanuel who said you can never let a good crisis go to waste," Cruz said, referring to the Chicago mayor and former White House Chief of Staff.

Asked why it has been difficult for some Republicans to acknowledge the racial aspect of the incident, Cruz said he didn't accept the premise of the question.

"It appears to be racially driven from what it was reported this strange man said, and a racial hate crime is horrific, any hate crime is horrific," he said. "I don't think we should be using this tragedy to try and divide people and to try and seek partisan advantage. I think we should be praying for those who lost loved ones in this horrific murder."

At an event at an indoor shooting range in Johnston Saturday, Cruz again called for defending the Second Amendment.

"There's a famous saying, praise the Lord and pass the ammunition," he said."There is a reason why the Second Amendment is right after the First."

Following his remarks, Cruz headed to the shooting range, where he fired off rounds on a semiautomatic .223-caliber Smith and Wesson M&P15.

U.S. should come together after Charleston, Cruz says // The Des Moines Register // Matthew Patane – June 20, 2015

The death penalty was made to punish crimes like the recent shooting that killed nine people in a historic black church in Charleston, U.S. Sen. Ted Cruz said Saturday at a shooting range in Johnston.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Gov. Nikki Haley in South Carolina said this individual who committed the heinous murder in South Carolina should be subject to the death penalty. I got to say the death penalty was designed for people who commit horrid crimes like this," Cruz told reporters.

At multiple Iowa stops this weekend, The Republican presidential candidate has said Obama and Democrats are trying to politicize the shooting instead of using them to bring people together.

"It's a shame that there are some in politics that want to use this to divide us. I think that's wrong," he said.

"Now is the time for mourning and for healing," Obama said. "But let's be clear: At some point, we as a country will have to reckon with the fact that this type of mass violence does not happen in other advanced countries. It doesn't happen in other places with this kind of frequency. And it is in our power to do something about it."

When asked what restrictions he would place on gun ownership, Cruz said lawmakers should focus on stopping criminals, not law-abiding citizens, from buying guns.

"If you have a violent felon, if you have a fugitive who is illegally trying to buy guns, we should come down on them like a ton of bricks," Cruz said. "I want to know if there are murderers and rapists trying to buy guns. We should stop them."

Cruz also said the shooting does not open the door to crack down on the rights of law-abiding citizens.

Upholding the Second Amendment, he said, is "altogether different and unconnected from a horrific murder committed by a sick and deranged individual."

The Republican presidential candidate spoke before a "Celebrate the 2nd Amendment" event hosted by State Rep. Ralph Watts. Cruz's visit to the event was scheduled about a week before the South Carolina shooting.

After speaking, Cruz took time to shoot a Smith & Wesson M&P 15 rifle.

Cruz has focused his campaign around the idea of abiding by the Constitution. That includes maintaining religious liberty and the Second Amendment, he has said at multiple Iowa stops.

"In Texas, there is a right answer on the Second Amendment: I support the Second Amendment. Unless you are clinically insane, that's the right answer. Heck, even Democrats say they support the Second Amendment in Texas," Cruz said during stops in Johnston and Denison this weekend.

For Ted Cruz, The Hard Part Comes Next // NPR // Jessica Taylor – June 20, 2015

Texas Sen. Ted Cruz blew away another gathering of religious conservative leaders this week, preaching about threats to religious freedom to a receptive and hungry crowd.

"I will never, ever, ever shy away from standing up and defending the religious liberty of every American," the GOP White House hopeful thundered at the Faith and Freedom Coalition's "Road to Majority" conference in Washington.

"Religious liberty has never been more threatened in America than right now today," Cruz added.

Cruz hit all the right notes and could easily be declared the winner of the three-day conference, which wraps up Saturday. But despite the good receptions at events like these, Cruz's work on stage is not translating to the campaign trail. He not only lags behind in early state polls, but also in organization. And despite being the first major presidential candidate to declare this cycle, early state activists are baffled by how little they say they have seen Cruz.

"I've always thought that Ted Cruz was kind of the perfect caucus candidate," said Craig Robinson, who runs "The Iowa Republican" website and is a former political director for the state party. "But what we haven't seen is a real commitment to the state."

Speaking their language

There's a reason Ted Cruz does well in front of these crowds. He roams the stage with the gusto of a televangelist. He does not work from a podium, and he strikes just the right tone.

At the Road to Majority confab, he slammed other Republicans for backing down on Indiana's controversial religious freedom law, warned against a potential same-sex marriage decision from the Supreme Court and bashed the Obama administration for not standing up more forcefully to the threat of Islamic extremism.

He boosted his own bona fides, too, telling the audience how he had successfully argued cases before the Supreme Court on "religious liberty," such as protecting a Ten Commandments display at the Texas Capitol.

And with the cadence of a preacher, Cruz seamlessly and empathetically weaved in the tragic Charleston, S.C., shooting that had occurred the night before that left nine dead at a historically black church.

Cruz led the audience of hundreds — they could have been congregants — in a moment of silence.

"Christians across our nation, across our world — believers across the world are lifting up the congregants at Emanuel AME," Cruz said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Other GOP rivals touched on many of the same issues, but none with perhaps the same zeal or with the same visceral reaction from the audience.

The faithful ate it up.

"I like the fact that he fights even his own party for the right issue and the right cause," said John Redell, who was attending from Wilmington, Del. "That's the kind of strength we're going to need for a president: someone who can say no — even to his friends — to do what's right for the nation."

Jessica Burnett, a student at Georgia State University: "Ted Cruz was full of energy. He spoke a lot about the issues. He really got the crowd riled up a lot, and you can tell how serious he is about this and how much he cares about America."

The importance of retail politics

It's perhaps no surprise Cruz is able to channel a preacher. His father is an ordained minister, and he went to high school in Houston on the campus of a megachurch.

The former Ivy League debate champion has always loved performance art. He has moved between stages his whole life — from high-school musicals to the high-pressure collegiate debate circuit to the floor of the U.S. Senate. The challenge, though, for Cruz is coming down from the stage.

A majority of Republican caucus-goers and primary voters in Iowa and South Carolina are white, evangelical or born-again Christians. In 2012, 57 percent of GOP voters in the Iowa caucuses described themselves that way, while 65 percent of the GOP primary electorate in South Carolina said so, according to entrance and exit polls.

The candidate who can unify them has a time-tested path to victory in those states and, with it, a springboard to the front of the presidential pack. But winning over those voters requires hand-to-hand, grip-and-grin campaigning — retail politics.

It's what former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee and former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum did in Iowa in 2008 and 2012, respectively. Former Texas Gov. Rick Perry, who built a career on this kind of campaigning, has already hit hard key sections of the state with deep pockets of religious voters.

The building blocks, the enthusiasm, are there for Cruz, but so far, observers in early states say, he has not shown the willingness to do the kind of required on-the-ground work — to the extent it's needed to win.

Craig Robinson, the former Iowa GOP political operative, noted Cruz's thin staff in the first caucus state compared to other candidates. What's more, Cruz, who is in Iowa this weekend, has held just 23 events in the state over a total of 16 days, according to the Des Moines Register's candidate tracker. That ranks seventh among Republican candidates and isn't in the top 10 overall.

By contrast, Santorum has already held 62 events over 29 days; Rick Perry 61 over 30 days; Rand Paul 41 over 16 days; and Mike Huckabee 37 events over 20 days. Even Carly Fiorina and Bobby Jindal, who is set to declare Wednesday, have done more events.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I still think Cruz has some work to do in terms of his retail campaigning in Iowa," Robinson said, "but I think he has it within himself to do it."

The battle for the evangelical vote

Some of those who have topped him in sojourns to the state are also competing for the same crucial evangelical voters, and were also well-received at the conference this week.

Santorum reminded the audience of his long track record fighting for conservative issues, while others were just talk.

"You know me, I'm probably best known for issues of faith and freedom. In some cases, I'm only known for that," he laughed.

Jindal also spoke at length about the threats to religious liberty the day after Cruz, and was also well received by the crowd. Talking of his own conversion to the Christianity from Hinduism, he bemoaned how he felt it was no longer acceptable to stand up for unpopular opinions central to much of the evangelical faith, such as opposition to abortion and same-sex marriage.

"I'm tired of the hypocrisy of the left," Jindal said. "They say they tolerate diversity, and they do, unless you disagree with them. ... The United States of America did not create religious liberty. Religious liberty created the United States of America," he added to applause.

Ben Carson, another favorite of the crowd, Iowa conservatives and Tea Party supporters, spoke of how his faith helped him in his career as a world-renowned neurosurgeon. He said he saw the healing power of prayer and attributed his surgical skill to God after a child he didn't expect to recover went on to do so.

"I thought I was doing everything," Carson said. "I realized after that, that it wasn't me, it was God. I just said, 'Lord, you be the neurosurgeon, and I'll be your hands.' "

Carson, who rose to political fame in 2013 after giving a blistering broadside of Obamacare as the president sat feet away, had another critique for the president's administration.

"I know that President Obama says we're not a Judeo-Christian nation," Carson said, "but he doesn't get to decide. We decide."

While Cruz may have blown away many in the crowd the first day, others were left impressed by many others, underlining the difficult choice Iowa and South Carolina evangelical voters will have next year.

"I'm hoping, because we have such a large field, that as the field narrows down, the candidates are seeing what the American people really are looking for," said Terri Wical of Atlanta. "You know, getting back to our roots, getting back to character and all that. They don't want someone moderate. They don't want something that's going to accommodate everybody ... They want somebody that's going to stand on a firm foundation."

Cruz: 'Liberal fascism' took away Gortz Haus livelihood // The Des Moines Register // Matthew Patane – June 20, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democrats' stance on gay marriage ruined the livelihood of the owners of Gortz Haus Gallery, Republican presidential hopeful Ted Cruz said Saturday.

"Today, the modern Democratic party has decided their devotion to mandatory gay marriage in all 50 states is so unforgiving that there is no longer room for defending religious liberty," Cruz told a group in Johnston.

Gortz Haus owners Dick and Betty Odgaard faced litigation after declining to host a same-sex marriage at the Grimes gift shop, which used to house a Lutheran church. The Mennonite couple said it would have gone against their religious beliefs.

"It was inconsistent with their faith to host a gay wedding, so they declined," Cruz said. "They found themselves enmeshed in legal proceedings and persecution. Finally, they had to write a check for $5,000 and to promise to never again host another wedding."

The Odgaards announced earlier this year that they will stop holding weddings at their Grimes' gift shop to end the litigation.

"So, the Odgaards livelihood has been taken away by this liberal fascism, this extreme view that if you hold a biblical teaching of marriage that is the union of one man and one women that the modern Democratic Party will persecute you and try to drive you out of civilized society," Cruz said.

Cruz said he will visit the Odgaards later Saturday. Cruz came back to Iowa Friday for two town halls in western Iowa and made a stop Saturday for a "Celebrate the 2nd Amendment" event.

Speaking during an event in Johnston, Cruz reiterated his position that religious liberty in the U.S. is under fire. The Texas U.S. senator has made the issue a cornerstone of his campaign as he seeks his party's presidential nomination.

Ted Cruz Introduces Bill to Drain Amnesty Slush Fund Subsidized by Legal Immigrants // Breitbart News // Katie McHugh – June 20, 2015

Texas Sen. Ted Cruz (R-TX) introduced legislation on Wednesday that would forbid the Obama administration from using fees paid by legal immigrants to fund Obama's executive amnesty for illegal aliens.

The Immigration Slush Fund Elimination Act would stop the executive branch from using fees collected from legal immigrants who obeyed U.S. immigration law to pay for the ongoing illegal alien naturalization surge. Thanks to the million or so legal aliens flocking to America every year, that's a lot of cash. Cruz notes that USCIS Chief Financial Officer Joseph Moore can lay claim to nearly $1 billion in application fees. Cruz's bill would return the pursestrings back into Congress's hands — and perhaps most importantly, stop the White House from ramping up legal immigration and issuing more and more fees in order to grant more illegal aliens amnesty.

Legal immigrants can wait up to ten years to become legalized and pay thousands of dollars in fees. Once Obama enacted his DACA executive amnesty order in 2012, wait times for legal immigrants tripled.

"America has always been a land of refuge and opportunity for those seeking freedom, and we should champion legal immigration," Cruz said in a statement. "Ronald Reagan referred to legal immigrants, immigrants like my father, as Americans by choice. The federal government should not be in the business of looting the wallets of those who followed the law and came here legally to fund the President's illegal and unconstitutional amnesty. This bill will cut off DHS's credit card and put Congress back in charge of funding the agencies responsible for immigration."

In typical Obama fashion, amnesty is funded by a wealth transfer from the law-abiding to the law-breaking. A Mexican man who applies for U.S. citizenship and goes through the normal process subsidizes his Mexican neighbor who darted across the border, maybe threw a few rocks at border patrol, and lives in a sanctuary city while waiting for amnesty.

Both are legalized; Mexican man number one is poorer than his illegal cousin thanks to the fees he paid, and both of them work for lowered wages while voting for more government spending. It's a win-win for Democrats and big business.

Perry condemns Charleston church shooting after 'accident' flub // CNN // Danielle Diaz – June 20, 2015

Rick Perry condemned the Charleston church shooting Saturday as "an absolute heinous hate crime," one day after a spokesman said the Republican presidential candidate misspoke when he called the massacre an "accident."

"I think we all come here today with heavy hearts for those individuals in Charleston -- those Charleston Christians -- who were gunned down in an absolute heinous hate crime inside of their place of worship," the former Texas governor said at the Faith and Freedom Coalition "Road to Majority" Conference in Washington Saturday morning. "That deranged individual didn't just take lives of black Americans -- he gunned down nine children of God.

"There is something more basic to our humanity than the color of our skin, our ethnic heritage, our nationality. It's that we're all made in the image of a loving God," Perry continued. "And we cannot let hatred and violence break the ties that bind us together."

After his speech at the conference, Perry told reporters that a discussion on gun control is a good thing.

"I think it is healthy for us as a nation to have conversations and defend our positions whatever they may be," he responded. "I do have an issue that the knee-jerk from the left is always, 'We're going to take people's guns away from them,' when in fact there may be a host of contributing factors here."

Perry's comments on Saturday follow an interview he did with the conservative NewsmaxTV Friday, in which he referred to the massacre as an "accident." A spokesman for the former Texas governor quickly clarified by saying Perry meant to say "incident."

In the interview, Perry, a staunch opponent of gun laws, was asked about whether President Barack Obama was too quick to blame guns after the Charleston shooting.

"Any time there is an accident like this, the President is clear," Perry said in response. "He doesn't like for Americans to have guns, and so he uses every opportunity, this being another one, to basically go parrot that message."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Despite addressing his comments and speaking openly about the shooting Saturday, many people were still outraged over his "accident" line and took to social media to criticize his comments.

Perry, who served as governor of Texas for 15 years, has an A+ rating from the National Rifle Association and has his own concealed handgun license, even though he can't carry guns after he was indicted last August on counts alleging coercion of a public servant and abuse of his official capacity.

When he was governor, he signed several bills to loosen gun control laws in the United States, including a bill that allows people to store guns in their cars and another that reduced the price to renew a concealed handgun license for veterans to $25.

Rick Perry warns Jeb Bush ' Has to be Careful' about criticizing Texas // Breitbart News // Sarah Rumpf – June 20, 2015

Breitbart News caught up with former Gov. Rick Perry (R-TX) as he took a swing through Texas in his second week back on the campaign trail since launching his presidential campaign in Addison, Texas on June 4th.

In an exclusive interview with Breitbart News, Perry shared his perspective on how this campaign differs from his 2012 attempt, why he believes that his record stacks up favorably against any of his competitors, what he believes will be a major challenge for former Gov. Jeb Bush (R-FL), his thoughts on the abuses at the VA, and a special memory he shared about time he spent with Breitbart News founder, the late Andrew Breitbart.

We met Perry at a Starbucks in San Antonio, the latest stop in a busy campaign schedule that had him in at least six cities spread across Texas in half as many days. Perry, who just wrapped up fourteen years as Texas' Governor this past January, is a well-recognized figure in his home state and was warmly greeted by many of the Starbucks patrons, including a little girl who shyly asked Perry to sign her autograph book.

The Governor drew a little heart in the girl's book and wrote "Study Hard!" before signing his name. His act was as sweet as the skinny mocha frappuccino (with whip cream!) that Perry had ordered. Perry cracked a joke about the sugary drink — "Isn't that a beautiful thing? That's calories, is what that is" — and pointed out that he likes to start the day with regular dark roast coffee.

Perry smiled in recognition and pulled out his cell phone to show me the background image. It was a target sheet from a shooting range, from a day he had gone shooting with Andrew.

"He had never shot a pistol before," said Perry, "and as a matter of fact, he did pretty well, you can see," pointing to the tight grouping. Perry's autograph on the target sheet reads, "To Andrew — Shoot Straight! Vote Conservative... Rick Perry." Andrew had taken the original back with him to the Breitbart offices in Los Angeles, and Perry had saved this photo.

"He was a good man," added Perry, smiling at the memory.

The conversation turned to the campaign, just launched two weeks ago to the day as we talked that Thursday. Perry's 2012 campaign was a roller coaster ride, shooting to the top of the polls when he first entered the race, but then plummeting back down after a series of debate missteps.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To his credit, Perry has been very forthcoming in acknowledging what went wrong in 2012, saying very frankly that he had not had adequate time to prepare on the broader list of issues and his recovery from back surgery a few months before entering the race had been longer and tougher than anticipated.

Not only is he completely healthy, Perry wants people to know, he has undertaken serious study over the past few years, and also no longer has to divide his attention between the campaign and being the Governor of Texas.

“It’s a very different time,” said Perry, explaining that the “biggest difference” was that he was “healthy and prepared” this time. “Both of those were challenges in 2011.”

“You have to take the time to go get the briefings, to go acquire the knowledge,” he explained. “That’s what I didn’t do in 2011 but what I have done for the last three and a half years,” describing trips he had taken to meet with policy experts at the Hoover Institute, Manhattan Institute, Heritage Foundation, Hay Initiative, and other conservative think tanks. “The preparation side of it is very important.”

I was actually at both of Perry’s presidential launches, in August 2011 in Charleston, South Carolina, and in Addison, Texas on June 4th. Both featured Perry confidently touting his record in Texas as his best resume line to qualify him for the White House, but there are a number of key differences this time around.

In 2012, Perry’s message was heavily focused on the Texas economic miracle, and rightfully so. During Perry’s tenure as Governor, the Lone Star State added more jobs than all the other states put together, one-third of all jobs created in the U.S. since 2000. These numbers are even more impressive considering that this happened during the Great Recession and its aftermath.

Jeb Bush “has to be careful” about criticizing Texas

This campaign has seen Perry move beyond just touting Texas’ impressive numbers, readily contrasting his record with any of his competitors, with former Gov. Jeb Bush (R-FL) in particular.

Perry noted that Bush was bragging that he had created more jobs in Florida during his time as Governor than were created in Texas. While Perry said that he respected Bush’s record — “job creation is what a governor’s supposed to be about” — but added that it was important for Americans to remember that it was “blue skies and smooth sailing” for Bush, who benefited from the surging prices during housing bubble, which burst after he was out of office.

“What happened in those states when the Great Recession occurred, the worst recession America’s had since the Great Depression?” asked Perry. “In fact, there’s only one state [that didn’t suffer]…we outperformed, nobody else is even close!”

“Jeb has to be careful about his criticism of bypassing Texas,” added Perry, “because the bulk of that, his brother was the Governor, and his brother’s probably not going to take very kindly to him saying ‘we kicked Texas’ butt,’ but, you know, I’ll let him work that out with his brother.”

Jim Tankersley at the Washington Post agreed with Perry’s assessment:

A significant amount of Florida’s economic and job growth in the Bush era was driven by a massive run-up in housing prices — which peaked in Bush’s last year in office, then plunged the state into a worse recession than the nation as a whole.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When you account for the role of housing, Bush's economic record looks a lot more mixed. Almost all of the gains he talks up today, including three-fifths of the job creation, were wiped out in the four years after he left office, once the bubble burst.

The housing bubble, of course, was not the fault of Bush or any one governor, but if Bush cannot be blamed for losses caused by the bubble, it is equally problematic to grant him credit for its gains, as blogger Ace of Spades pointed out.

Matthew Yglesias at Vox — certainly no staunch conservative or Perry apologist — wrote an article recently with a compelling summary of Perry's economic record, calling it "far and away the best and most coherent story of any candidate in the field about why his record in office should make you think he could deliver the kind of prosperity the voters crave."

Yglesias' article included the chart shown below, comparing in-state job growth with the national average rate during the tenure of several governors. "You can see that Perry's time in office largely corresponded with a not-so-hot spell of job creation for the United States of America," writes Yglesias, "but that he nonetheless has the strongest record of in-state job creation of anyone in the sample."

With his new campaign, Perry is still happily bragging about all the new jobs in Texas — "we're the most successful state in the nation" — but he is also making the effort to articulate the policies enacted during his tenure that encouraged economic development, as well as connecting that economic growth to improvements in the lives of ordinary Texans.

"We went in and really did some things that created a great positive effect on our economy," said Perry. "Passed the most sweeping tort reform in the world, we reduced spending by ten billion dollars rather than raising taxes…It was a very concerted effort to send a message that you can risk your capital and have a chance to have a return on your investment."

The results of this tort reform, according to Perry, were that over 35,000 more physicians were licensed to practice in Texas than had been a decade earlier. "That's a huge number, and the access to health care exploded. I'm a big believer that the way you judge if you're successful on the health care front is not how many people you force to buy insurance, but how many people have access to better health care, and we've done that in Texas."

Perry also rattled off several reforms to the public education system, to "make our schools more accountable," including incentive pay for good teachers, expanding charter schools, implementing testing that made it easier to intervene earlier if they were struggling.

These efforts paid off, taking Texas from "in the middle of the pack," ranked 27th in the U.S. in 2003 for high school graduation rates, to second in 2013. "That is a powerful, powerful story."

Texas didn't just improve overall graduation rates, but was ranked number one for both African-American and Hispanic graduation rates, statistics of which Perry is very proud. "You've got to remember, Texas is a very diverse state. We're the largest majority-minority state that's seen progress in their public schools…there's not a more powerful message to a family that we care about you, and we're taking care of your kids, than to graduate them from high school" and make sure they have a future," said Perry.

Failure to care for veterans "pisses me off," says Perry

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Texas' job creation is also sharing the spotlight in Perry's campaign with national security and foreign policy issues, and caring for America's veterans, an issue near and dear to Perry's heart. Other than extreme longshot Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-SC)47%

, Perry is the only Republican candidate with military experience, having flown C-130 tactical aircraft as an Air Force Captain during the 1970s in Europe and the Middle East.

"This veterans' issue is one that we've been dealing with for five or six years, so it's not new to us, but it became a national issue a year and a half ago," he said. Taking care of veterans' needs "is a really important public policy issue that needs to be addressed," said Perry, who added that he had been working with these issues for a long time, "both in a personal way and in a professional way."

The "personal way" Perry mentioned included helping former Navy SEAL Marcus Luttrell, who had appeared at his campaign launch along with his twin brother and fellow SEAL, Morgan. Luttrell, the author of the book Lone Survivor about his experiences surviving an ambush in Afghanistan, was befriended by Perry and his wife Anita after he returned to Texas after his combat service.

Suffering from PTSD and physical injuries sustained in combat, plus challenges readjusting to civilian life, Luttrell showed up unannounced on the doorstep of the Governor's Mansion one day in 2007. He had met Perry before and the Governor had told him to let him know if they could ever help him. The Perrys invited Luttrell to move into the Governor's Mansion while they worked to help him find doctors to treat his injuries, including a spinal surgeon, as well as providing him with a safe, home-like environment where his heart and mind could recover.

Perry described his frustrations dealing with "this very archaic and broken system" to get Luttrell the medical care and support he needed. "I had to literally intervene to the height of the Secretary of the Navy," he said.

"There's ten thousand kids like Marcus who didn't have a Governor, and that pisses me off," said Perry, noting that it should not require the Governor of Texas to make that kind of phone call in order for a veteran to get help.

"As the Governor, we were putting teams that were going into the VA here in Texas, to help alleviate the red tape. All these veterans will tell you that the VA was just slow, and bureaucratically archaic, it was a corrosive process for them. They can't get the benefits they need, or have to wait months to get their benefits."

"That is just not acceptable."

Perry noted that the Obama administration had the opportunity to address these problems, but no real progress could be seen. "I'm still very unhappy with how this has been addressed, we're a year plus [after] they changed Secretaries [of the VA], they got all this money from the federal government, and I'm not sure anything has changed."

"No one gives you a manual" to learn executive experience

Perry has called this campaign the "show me, don't tell me election," and has sought to emphasize that his record shows that he is the best prepared among the ever-growing field of candidates for the job of President.

"Executive experience is really important," said Perry. "You can't get executive experience but by one avenue, from my perspective…you can read all the books you want on how to deal with catastrophic events, but until you go through it and you live through it and you manage it, it's just words on paper."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“No one gives you a manual on how to deal with the space shuttle disintegrating over your state,” he continued. “No one gives you a manual on how to deal with hurricanes — Katrina, Rita, Ike — and the list goes on. Nobody can tell you how to deal with a crisis on your border, where you have literally tens of thousands of people show up, trying to penetrate through your border and the federal government’s not assisting you. Or how to deal with Ebola.”

“All of those things are executive experience that is invaluable.” However, Perry noted, “governors generally don’t deal in the arena of monetary policy, domestic policy, or foreign affairs,” or at least most governors don’t. The situation is a bit different when you’re Governor of Texas, “the twelfth largest economy in the world,” he explained, mentioning the 1200 mile border with Mexico, and trips he had been able to take, not just to visit important trading partners in Europe and Asia, but also combat zones like Iraq, Afghanistan, and Pakistan.

Read Part I of Breitbart News’ exclusive interview with Gov. Perry, in which he discusses how his lack of trust in President Obama made him unable to support the “Obamatrade” bills, despite his belief in free trade.

Stay tuned for Part III, in which Perry talks about why Texas is the model for criminal justice reform, the vital role his wife Anita will play in the campaign, why would veto the funding for the Public Integrity Unit under troubled Travis County District Attorney Rosemary Lehmberg all over again, and the message he hopes voters hear as he makes a second attempt to earn their support to elect him President.

Rick Perry calls South Carolina church shooting an 'accident' // AOL News – June 20, 2015

Former Texas governor Rick Perry went into damage control mode on Friday after calling the mass killing in South Carolina an "accident."

"Any time there is an accident like this the president is clear."

His comment came during a NewsmaxTV interview in which he was asked about President Obama's reaction to the shooting that killed nine people.

After the interview, in which Perry also refers to the shooting as a hate crime, a representative classified it as a simple slip saying Perry meant to say "incident" rather than "accident."

But, of course, the Internet didn't let it slide.

On Twitter, @michaelianblack said, "Rick Perry describing the Charleston shooting as an 'accident' is about as plausible as Rick Perry becoming president."

And @HaroldItz scolded the presidential candidate, saying, "No, Rick Perry, an accident is what your dog does on the rug. Or what you do when you speak."

@kidrauhlangels added, "Someone please take Rick Perry home and put him to bed, he's clearly drunk."

But Perry making a few flubs is nothing new.

Back in 2011 during a Republican debate, he completely blanked trying to remember the third government agency that he would eliminate if elected president.

"The third agency of government I would do away with. Education...uh...the uh... Commerce...And let's see. I can't. The third one I can't. Oops."

Rick Perry: Dylann Roof 'Gunned Down 9 Children of God' // Mediaite // Andrew Husband – June 20, 2015

Less than a day after former Texas Gov. Rick Perry accidentally referred to the Charleston church shooting as, erm, an "accident," the 2016 GOP presidential candidate addressed the terrible events on Saturday morning.

Perry was speaking at the Faith and Freedom Coalition's "Road to Majority" conference in Washington, D.C., and much of what he said concerned his condolences to the victims' families and his heartbreak at the loss of these "nine children of God":

"I think we all come here today with heavy hearts for those individuals in Charleston — those Charleston Christians — who were gunned down in an absolute heinous hate crime inside of their place of worship."

Much of Perry's remarks focused less on the event's racial implications, as he chose to highlight the anti-religious nature of the crime:

"There is something more basic to our humanity than the color of our skin, our ethnic heritage, our nationality. It's that we're all made in the image of a loving God, and we cannot let hatred and violence break the ties that bind us together."

Rather tellingly, the 2016 GOP hopeful referred to shooting suspect Dylann Roof as a "deranged individual" who "didn't just take lives of black Americans," but specifically "gunned down nine children of God."

Perry later told reporters that he thought a renewed national discussion about gun control would be "healthy." However, he cautioned against "the knee-jerk from the left" that demands all guns be banned and taken away from responsible gun owners.

GRAHAM

Sen. Lindsey Graham: there's 'No doubt' that Charleston church massacre was racially motivated // McClatchy // William Douglas – June 20, 2015

Days after several Republican presidential candidates downplayed or sidestepped the issue of race in the shooting deaths of nine people inside an historic African-American church in Charleston, S.C., Sen. Lindsey Graham acknowledged that race was the primary factor in the killings.

"There can be no doubt that the shooting on Wednesday night was racially motivated and signals to all of us that the scars of our history are still with us today," Graham, R-S.C., said in a statement Saturday. "Throughout our country, we still have much to do in the name of equality. I want to talk about those issues on the campaign trail."

He added: "I'm from South Carolina. My state, like our nation, has a difficult history of race relations. We have tried to address it through compromise and working together. There is no doubt we have made great progress, but Charleston reminds us there is still much to do."

Graham's remarks about the massacre at Charleston's Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church came after several Republican White House hopefuls struggled to deal with race and the shootings during appearances Thursday and Friday at the Faith and Freedom Coalition's conference in Washington.

The nine shooting victims were African-American. The alleged gunman, 21-year-old Dylann Roof, reportedly went on racist rants. Saturday, state and federal law enforcement officials were examining a recently-discovered hate-filled website to determine whether it belonged to Roof.

Republican presidential hopefuls at the Washington conference expressed their outrage and condolences over the shootings but largely steered clear of what role race may have played in the attack.

For example, Sen. Marco Rubio, R-Fla., didn't mention the shootings during his speech. Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush told conference attendees that he didn't know what was in the mind or heart "of the man who committed those atrocious crimes."

"I do know what was in the heart of the victims," he added. "They were meeting in brotherhood and sisterhood in that church."

However, retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson, the only African-American presidential candidate, spoke bluntly about the racial element in the shootings, telling the crowd that "If we don't pay close attention to the hatred and division going on in our nation, this is a harbinger of what we can expect."

Lindsey Graham gets to the heart of it // The Baltimore Sun // John McIntrye – June 20, 2015

A difficulty in discussing the Confederate battle flag—whether it should be honored or discarded—is that not everyone can agree on basic facts.

Yesterday, writing in the Washington Examiner, Philip Klein presented a cogent conservative argument against continuing to display the flag, in which he stated a fundamental fact: "The Confederacy was formed to preserve and expand the brutal institution of slavery, and then its proponents subsequently tried to disguise their motivations in lofty language about states' rights."

He quoted from the "cornerstone" speech of Confederate Vice President Alexander Stephens and cited the formal secession documents of Texas, Georgia, South Carolina and Mississippi, all of which emphatically and explicitly said that the Confederate states were seceding to preserve white supremacy over blacks, whom they branded an inferior race.

And, of course, it became in the 1950s and 1960s an emblem of resistance to the civil rights movement, the banner of segregation.

Commenters, predictably, refused to address the historical facts and instead resorted to ad hominem abuse of Mr. Klein.

But rather than tread that ground again, I prefer to look at an illuminating comment by Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina during an interview yesterday. Concerning public display of the Confederate battle flag, he said, "If at the end of the day, it is time for the people of South Carolina to reconsider that decision, it would be fine with me, but this is part of who we are." [Emphasis added]

Though he does not seem to be aware of it in the interview, Senator Graham has touched on a central question: Who are the we?

In fact, it is the central question. Are African-Americans Southerners as much as white Southerners are? That was the question that some thought was decided by the events of 1861-1865 and by the ratification of the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments to the Constitution. But laws establishing segregation, along with lynchings and other violence against blacks, insisted that African-Americans are not part of us.

So Senator Graham might well consider this: Are black people, born and raised in the South, for whom the Confederate battle flag is a perpetual reminder that they were treated as an inferior class of human beings, as much Southerners as white people, born and raised in the South, who see that flag as a proud symbol of their identity while ignoring the ugliness that is inextricably attached to it?

Short version: Do you want that flag to say who we are?

SANTORUM

Rick Santorum and Bobby Jindal Talk Faith and Freedom // KMBZ – June 20, 2015

At Faith and Freedom Coalition's Road to the Majority event Saturday, ABC News asked two Republican presidential players to share their thoughts on some related hot-button political issues in the news.

Here's what former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum -- who is running for president in 2016 -- and Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal -- who is considering running -- had to say about Democrats talking gun control in the wake of the tragic Charleston church shooting, flying the confederate flag, and the Supreme Court's decision on gay marriage.

ABC News: What do you think when you hear Democrats talking about gun control right now?

Santorum: "I think that's politicizing a very tragic event that has serious repercussions about who we are as a country I mean the idea that there would be this kind of racial crime in America purely hate-filled evil crime driven by race is is enough to focus on. To try to piggyback that onto something else I think is really disrespectful."

ABC News: You are against gay marriage. Would you support a Supreme Court decision legalizing it?

Santorum: "As I've said repeatedly I'll wait and see what the Supreme Court is going to decide, but I don't change my opinion . If the Supreme Court decides something is right or something is wrong -- that's the great thing about our Republic, is that civil institutions make decisions whether they're laws or whether they're executive orders or whether they're Supreme Court decisions and you, as a free person in this country, can go out and still advocate for what you believe in."

ABC News: What's your reaction when you see the politicians talking about gun control in the wake of a massacre like this?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jindal: "Look the President's remarks within the first 24 hours are still within the first 48 hours - I think it's shameful to score cheap political points. He's the commander-in-chief. He should be uniting us he needs to be bringing us together it's a time for healing if you want a great contrast look at Gov. Nikki Haley -- her tremendous leadership during this crisis this is a time to come together as one country in prayer and start the healing process."

ABC News: Should the confederate flag still flying in South Carolina or anywhere else in the United States?

Jindal: We'll let the states decide that, but again, just like the gun issue -- let's have that debate at the right time. And right now we should all be in mourning. I think flags should be at half-mast across our states across our country. Now's a time for mourning. Now's the time to tell our kids it really doesn't matter, we're all brothers and sisters ... I happen to be a Christian, and those are brothers and sisters of mine in my faith. Whether you're Christian or not -- whatever you wish -- those were our brothers and sisters, it doesn't matter if in South Carolina, it doesn't matter [if you are] Black or White, young or old -- those were our brothers and sisters killed in that church."

HUCKABEE

Fox host and Huckabee attack Obama over gun control comments — then call for more civility and less rhetoric // Raw Story // Tom Boggioni – June 20, 2015

Repeating an often heard suggestion following every mass shooting in the United States, former Arkansas Governor Mike Huckabee complained that President Barack Obama was "grandstanding" when he called for more gun control after the Charleston church shooting, saying instead more guns is the solution.

With Fox News host Todd Starnes calling the president's comments "despicable," Huckabee joined in to attack the president before pointing out that it was a shame no one attending the prayer meeting was packing a gun.

"Well it was disappointing to hear the president within virtually minutes of the news breaking, or certainly hours, for him to come to the podium and immediately say, 'Alright, this is a great opportunity for me to grandstand and jump up on the stump and talk about gun control.'" Huckabee said.

Saying that no gun control proposal could have stopped the shooting at the Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal church in Charleston or at the Sandy Hook Elementary school, Huckabee lamented the fact that no one at the prayer meeting was carrying a gun.

"The one thing that would have at least ameliorated the horrible situation in Charleston would have been that if somebody in that prayer meeting had a conceal carry or there had been either an off duty policeman or an on duty policemen, somebody with the legal authority to carry a firearm and could have stopped the shooter," Huckabee said. "

Huckabee added, "I go back to was has often been said, and it sounds crass, but frankly the best way to stop a bad person with a gun is to have a good person with a weapon that is equal or superior to the one he's using."

Fox's Starnes, notorious for his false reporting of supposed persecution of Christians in American society, then called for civility instead of rhetoric by our nation's leaders.

CARSON

Republican presidential candidate Ben Carson speaks in Birmingham // Alabama News // Adam Ganucheau – June 20, 2015

More than 6,500 attendees of a men's Christian conference packed the Legacy Arena early Saturday morning to hear Republican presidential candidate Ben Carson speak.

Carson, who formally launched his campaign in May, was a keynote speaker at the Gridiron Men's Conference, a Christian conference held at the Birmingham Jefferson Convention Complex.

"Let me make it clear to you and the press," radio evangelist Phil Waldrep, the conference's sponsor, said before introducing Carson to the stage. "This is not a political rally. (Carson is) here because he wants to speak into your life and encourage every man in this place to leave this building to make a difference."

While Carson did integrate his faith into the 49-minute address, the speech at times resembled a political speech rather than a Christian testimony, rousing applause from the audience after riffs about combatting some of America's problems.

He touched on a few of his platforms and expressed his political ideas on subjects like the government's role in distributing welfare, the importance of positively influencing youth at an early age, protecting freedom of expression and the status of the education system in America.

"Education is the great divide in our country," Carson said. "It doesn't matter what your ethnic or economic background is, if you get a good education you will succeed. That is something we must begin to emphasize again."

Carson, who is a retired Johns Hopkins neurosurgeon, is one of many candidates vying for the Republican nomination for the 2016 presidential election. He has edged his Republican counterparts in multiple straw polls and has been a very popular candidate among those who affiliate with the tea party.

Earlier this month, four of Carson's senior campaign officials quit, drawing speculation to the campaign's health.

But in Birmingham Saturday, he focused on his ideas and his faith. He quoted multiple passages from the book of Proverbs during the speech and said multiple times that his success came from his faith in God.

"I think that God gives everybody special gifts and talents," Carson said of knowing when he knew he wanted to become a surgeon.

Carson was just one of the conference's six speakers, including New Orleans Saints quarterback Drew Brees, who spoke Friday night. Attendees of the conference are in Birmingham from 15 different states.

TRUMP

Donoald Trump's resume backs his run for president // NY Post // Jonathan Trugman – June 20, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So Donald Trump — New York's charismatic multibillionaire businessman — has thrown his hat into the 2016 presidential ring.

While many question his presence in the race, 2016 may be the year in which America is in desperate need of a suave, successful businessperson like Trump — or former HP CEO Carly Fiorina — to solve what ails our economy.

Unlike most politicians, these two have plenty of experience building things, hiring people — and sometimes firing people — and both have extensive résumés and are not just spouting rhetoric.

There's no doubt that most Americans are hurting right now. The economy is much weaker than advertised and not expected to get stronger anytime soon — the Federal Reserve on Wednesday downgraded its growth forecast for this year to 1.9 percent.

If that forecast comes to fruition, it will mean seven years in a row of below-3 percent GDP growth. No president has ever had that distinction.

So the next president could use a track record of building and developing growth, since the measures by the Fed of keeping rates at zero and making $4 trillion worth of QE bond buys have done nothing for growth.

If a businessperson were to get the keys to the White House, here's what he or she would need to do.

The single most important issue is jobs, and Trump is well aware of it. Getting the job market back on its feet will not be easy, but Trump has built a global business that employs thousands of people — from contractors, plumbers and electricians to investment bankers, lawyers and accountants — whom he pays quite well. So he actually knows what it takes.

The Donald could very well live up to his claim, which was vintage Trump: "I will be the greatest jobs president that God has ever created."

While the unemployment rate is misleadingly low — folks taking two or three part-time jobs at a time skew the stats — the more accurate and encompassing labor-force participation rate remains near the all-time low of 62 percent.

That is because millions of Americans have left the labor force and have given up looking for a job.

Unfortunately, the attitude and the algebra today is, if you can't make more than the government assistance pays, then why bother going back to work?

For those fortunate who have steady work, there have been no wage gains to speak of for the last decade. Nothing says "failing economy" like working for 10 years and not seeing your buying power increase.

Both Trump and Fiorina are pragmatists, which doesn't bode well for a political career, but that quality could be refreshing. Their opponents will have a hard time trying to fit them into a box on the political grid.

By working to free up capital in corporations and motivating companies to bring work back to the US, they will back up their words.

Also, look for Trump to forge large bipartisan infrastructure deals to rebuild America's dilapidated highways, bridges and tunnels and to bring America into the 21st century technologically. After all, it can't be denied that Trump knows plenty about construction.

That the Beltway Brigade never addressed this issue is mind-boggling. You can't drive two miles without dodging potholes, losing a filling or blowing a tire.

This is a huge opportunity, and it will put people back to work, on projects that are actually necessary — unlike the "shovel-ready" infrastructure programs in the $850 billion stimulus plan President Obama, Nancy Pelosi and Harry Reid put together.

Our candidates have become more and more like a bunch of mannequins and actors reading from TelePrompTers than CEOs of a $15 trillion economy. Only a few people in the race have legitimate bodies of work and accomplishments that enable us to see how they have actually performed when in charge.

Trump and Fiorina are two that can be called all-business.

Cher trashes Donald Trump's 2016 presidential campaign // MSNBC // Adam Howard – June 20, 2015

Pop icon Cher definitely does not back Donald Trump's run for the presidency.

Although the real estate mogul's 2016 campaign launch this week was widely ridiculed across the media landscape, the "Believe" singer's social media reaction garnered some of the most attention.

In addition to saying she would relocate to the planet Jupiter if Trump was ever elected, the 69-year-old called him a "loudmouthed bigot" and an "obnoxious a–hole," in a series of tweets.

"Donald Trump can't come up with a hairstyle that looks human, how can he come up with a plan to defeat ISIS," Cher said incredulously on Twitter. "Donald Trump's ego is so inflated, he might as well be the Hindenburg," she added in another tweet.

The outspoken, Oscar-winning performer said choosing between GOP contender Sen. Ted Cruz and Trump was "like saying 'would you rather have a Migraine or Throw Up.'" And ultimately that: "Donald Trump's Punishment, Is being DONALD TRUMP."

Cher has been a longtime supporter of liberal causes and politicians. But in recent years, she has expressed dissatisfaction with President Obama, even calling into C-Span to voice her displeasure with his foreign policy.

Trump has yet to respond to Cher's remarks, but he has a long history of lashing out at his high-profile critics on social media and in various other forms. In the past he's engaged in public feuds with Rosie O'Donnell, Jerry Seinfeld, Bill Maher and countless others.

Most recently, he's aimed his ire at conservative pundit George Will, calling him "boring," "often wrong" and "a total dope!"

UNDECLARED

WALKER

Leading in polls, Scott Walker waits // The Hill // Niall Stanage – June 20, 2015

Scott Walker edged closer to a White House bid this week, but his official entry into the race is still not expected until mid-July.

The Wisconsin governor's slow-moving campaign launch could cause him to lose altitude, some observers say, since other top-tier candidates such as former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) are already in.

"The biggest risk is that, with every week, donors start to make decisions about who they want to invest in," said Julian Zelizer, a professor of public affairs at Princeton University.

"The voters who are paying attention now are shaping their perceptions of who's good and who's bad, and they are not really thinking about him as much as the others," Zelizer added.

When it comes to donors, however, Walker's Thursday announcement of a new "testing the waters" committee might help. The new committee has more leeway than an official campaign under election-finance regulations, and its formation crystallizes the sense that Walker is indeed moving toward a presidential run.

He is widely expected to join the race on July 13 in his native Wisconsin, the state where he has been governor since 2011. He won a recall battle in 2012 and reelection in 2014.

An appeal from his new committee to donors suggests that they should aim to raise $27,000 by July 12. The maximum individual contribution is $2,700, so the total would be equivalent to eliciting the biggest possible donation from 10 people.

Some GOP strategists believe that Walker is being wily in holding off from a full declaration of candidacy for as long as he possibly can. Super-PACs are playing an increasingly important role in campaigns, they note, but coordination between an official candidate and a super-PAC is prohibited.

Republican consultant Ed Rollins drew a comparison between Walker and Bush, who helped start a super-PAC that is headed by operative Mike Murphy.

"You can't talk to [the super-PAC] and you can't coordinate, so now Jeb can't talk to Mike Murphy again," he said. "Walker has a super-PAC and once you declare, you have to play by those rules."

Walker's super-PAC is called "Unintimidated," after the title of a book the governor published in 2013. Two former top aides, Keith Gilkes and Stephan Thompson, founded it.

More broadly, Walker supporters could issue a simple rebuttal to suggestions that he is putting an official declaration off for too long: It hasn't harmed him so far.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Walker is performing very well in opinion polls, especially in Iowa. In three of the four most recent polls among Republicans in the Hawkeye State, he led his nearest rival by either seven or eight percentage points. The other survey also showed him leading, but by a more modest margin of four points.

In New Hampshire, where Walker's socially conservative outlook is less of an asset, he is nonetheless running a close second to Bush in the RealClearPolitics polling average. The equivalent national polling average shows the two in a de facto dead-heat.

Walker has made such strides while neither seeking nor attracting as much national media attention as Bush, Rubio or even candidates whose poll numbers are lower, such as Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.). Walker's participation in Sen. Joni Ernst's (R-Iowa) barbecue-and-motorcycle-riding "roast and ride" event two weeks ago — he rode his own Harley-Davidson — was one of his relatively rare high-profile events of late.

Some Republicans believe that Walker's skills are being underestimated by a news media that don't recognize his blue-collar appeal.

"What Walker brings … is the white working-class voter," GOP strategist Ford O'Connell said. "He has the ability to speak to them in a way that they gravitate toward. When he talks about shopping at Kohl's, a lot of people in the media roll their eyes. But that resonates so well with voters."

O'Connell also argued that more time away from the spotlight could assist Walker, in terms of letting him bone up on issues that he is less familiar with — notably foreign policy.

He drew criticism earlier this year when he suggested that his fight against public unions in Wisconsin was relevant experience for the struggle against the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria (ISIS).

Others note that, for all of Walker's impressive poll ratings, the race is only in its earliest stage, and the Wisconsin governor has not yet had to face serious attacks from rivals.

"My question is, how does Scott Walker hold up when the campaigning begins, once a [hostile] super-PAC tries to define him?" said Craig Robinson, a former political director of the Iowa Republican Party. "I'm curious to see how he withstands that."

Others note another drawback to the Wisconsin governor's slow rollout: It could provide a window of opportunity for even more potential rivals to join a crowded field.

"The more Scott Walker waits, the more that opens the door to other governors," said Zelizer. "Somebody like [Ohio Gov.] John Kasich is getting more interested."

Kasich, he added, was exactly the kind of candidate who could "squeeze Walker's chances."

Scott Walker Pledges to Fight for Republican Ideals // Politics PA // Nick Field – June 20, 2015

One of the leading Republican candidates for the presidency visited Philadelphia today.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker gave the keynote address at the National Republican Leadership Conference.

Walker isn't officially in the race yet, but he did lay out a fundraising goal nicknamed "The Road to 270" (270 is the number of electoral votes it takes to win the White House). Therefore, it's safe to say he's in. Supporters expect him to announce on July 13th.

A new national PPP poll released Tuesday showed Walker as the GOP front-runner. On an anecdotal note, I heard two separate attendees state that they would support any candidate but Jeb Bush.

In fact, the PA GOP conducted a straw poll through the three-day weekend of perspective 2016 GOP candidates. Walker won with 25.3% of the vote followed by Chris Christie (11.3%), Marco Rubio (11%), Rick Santorum (9.6%) and Jeb Bush (9.6%).

The Governor was introduced by fellow conservative (and foe of organized labor) State Sen. Scott Wagner. His biggest applause line came when he praised Gov. Walker's ability to pass voter ID and "right-to-work" laws.

The guest of honor started off with a prayer for the victims in Charleston and a round of applause for military members.

Despite the presence of a podium, the future candidate chose to take the microphone and roam the stage as he spoke. A smart move that made it easier to connect with a crowd that constitutes men and women he'll need to be successful in his quest.

He further endeared himself to the audience when he said that as a runner, he loved being able to replicate the famous Rocky run up the Art Museum steps.

At another point, he mentioned that his Great-great grandfather emigrated to Philadelphia and worked as a blacksmith.

He even finished with a story about visiting Independence Hall.

Referring to the attempt to remove him in a June 2012 recall, he thanked all the GOP faithful who aided his retention effort.

"I appreciate the help for when we faced that recall election," Walker stated before transitioning to the future.

"We've formed a testing the process committee, which is the next big step in deciding whether you're going to run for President."

The passionate conservative then laid out his pitch as to why he is uniquely equipped to be victorious.

"To win the center, you don't always have to run to the center, you have to lead," Walker asserted.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Wisconsin native believes this mantra can play anywhere but can be especially beneficial in the Rust Belt.

“I believe the next President is going to come from the industrial part of this country and Pennsylvania will play a big part of that.”

Walker also dipped into what will surely be the accomplishments section of his future stump-speech, contending (as all Governors that run for President do) that what worked in their state can work for the country.

“If we could do that in a blue state. If those reforms can happen in a state as blue as Wisconsin, they can happen anywhere.”

Gov. Walker went on to outline the core of his speech with three distinct points: “Growth, Reform and Safety”.

Apparently, the Wisconsinan feels the nation’s leading Democrats are too focused on Washington.

“They think you grow the economy by growing Washington,” Walker said of Democrats like President Obama and Secretary Clinton.

Concerning reform, he said that Democrats measure the success of government by how many people depend on it, while Republicans measure it by how many people are no longer dependent on government.

For a man with no international experience, Walker was very passionate on national security issues.

He explained that he chose to identify national security as “safety” because overseas atrocities like beheadings had affected him so personally.

Walker also unequivocally came out against any nuclear deal with Iran.

“That is a country we should not be doing business with,” he asserted.

The biggest standing ovation of the day, in fact, came when Walker criticized the President for identifying climate change as the largest national security threat instead of radical Islamist terrorists.

“Our enemy is like a virus,” he said. “I’d rather take the fight to them rather than wait for them to take the fight to us.”

He finished but pledging to reminding the audience that he had fought the good fights and won the good fights and that the American people “want someone who is not only going to fight but win.”

It was an impressive performance that reached the crowd of Republican die-hards in the Sheraton ballroom and may be able to extend far beyond there.

Still, the spectre of the biggest fight of Walker’s life hung over the event.

Through some playlist oversight, the most unlikely tune emerged from the loudspeakers just minutes before Walker took the stage.

Walker wows social conservatives with attacks on Obama, puts GOP rivals on notice // The Washington Times // Madison Gesiotto – June 20, 2015

ust weeks away from possibly joining the 2016 race, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker thrilled a crowd of social conservatives Saturday night with a withering attack on President Obama's record while putting his potential GOP rivals on notice that he plans to run on his record as a get-it-done governor.

Mr. Walker sought to convince the Faith and Freedom Coalition's 2015 Road to the Majority Conference he may be the best choice for president, repeatedly citing his record of success in Wisconsin that includes a balanced budget, concessions from unions and pro-faith policies.

Seeking to differentiate himself from some of his potential rivals who serve in Congress or have been out of office for some time, Mr. Walker said he was a unique combination of fighter and election and policy victor,

"We fight the good fight and win those fights over and over and over again," he said.

Mr. Walker also mocked the president on national security, citing Mr. Obama's recent speech in which he said climate change was the biggest threat facing America.

"I've got a message for you, Mr. President. The number one threat to the military, the number one threat to America, the number one threat to the world is radical Islam. It's time we do something about it," he said to roaring cheers.

Mr. Walker mixed in barbs with folksy Midwest humor, drawing laughter with a tale about his trips to his favorite department store and even poking fun at fellow Wisconsin Republican Rep. Paul Ryan.

Reminiscing about their earlier years of flipping burgers at McDonalds, Mr, Walker told the crowd, that "the only difference is, his manager actually told him he has to flip hamburgers in the back because he didn't have the interpersonal skills to work the cash register."

Although Mr. Walker hasn't officially declared his candidacy for 2016, he has been "testing the waters" and is expected to make an official announcement in mid-July.

Scott Walker denounces Charleston slayings, sidesteps flag debate // Milwaukee Journal-Sentinel // Craig Gilbert – June 20, 2015

Speaking to a gathering of religious conservatives here Saturday night, Gov. Scott Walker spoke for several minutes about the shooting in Charleston, S.C., calling it a "racist" and "evil" act and asking for a moment of prayer for the "nine brothers and sisters in Christ who were taken on Wednesday."

But in talking to reporters afterward, Walker steered cleared of the debate over the Confederate flag in South Carolina that is playing out in the aftermath of the shootings.

Walker said he didn't think it was appropriate to debate that issue until the family members of victims have had a chance to bury and mourn the dead.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The GOP's 2012 nominee, Mitt Romney, said on Twitter Saturday that South Carolina should remove the Confederate flag flying above its state Capitol grounds, calling it a "symbol of racial hatred" to many. Several of Walker's potential GOP rivals have also commented on the issue in the wake of the shootings.

"I think they're going to have a good healthy debate and should have that debate in South Carolina amongst officials at the state level," Walker told reporters after his dinner speech at the "Road to Majority" conference.

"I just think before I or anyone else weighs in on anything to do with policy, whether it's this or any other policy decisions, we should honor the dead and the families by allowing them to bury their loved ones. And then you could perfectly ask me that question at some point in the next week or two when that's done."

Walker also deferred when asked by a reporter if he viewed the Confederate flag as a symbol of racism.

Walker was among numerous GOP presidential hopefuls who appeared at the four-day conference organized by the Faith and Freedom Coalition.

An evangelical Christian, the son of a preacher and a leading figure in the party's 2016 field, Walker was introduced as a politician with a strong record opposing abortion and someone whose "faith informs his beliefs and his actions."

A banquet crowd of several hundred gave him a very enthusiastic reception.

Addressing the Charleston shooting at the outset of his speech, Walker said what happened there is not just about that city, but "it's really about all of us and trying to find a way to bring this country together instead of ways to pull us apart."

The governor pointed to the expressions of forgiveness coming from family members of victims, saying, "They showed us, they showed their community, they showed their state, they showed their country, they showed the world what it means to be a Christian."

Talking to reporters a short time later, Walker said the shootings were an act of "racism" and "pure evil" and "all of us regardless of party or background need to denounce not only the act itself but the beliefs" behind it.

More broadly, he said, "I think there is a very real concern that needs to be addressed in America about race relations. And I think we need to do more, I think as Americans as a whole, we need to do more to talk about how to unite people in this country."

CHRISTIE

Jeb Bush And Chris Christie Spout Anti-Women Rhetoric At Conservative Conference // Think Progress // Kira Lerner – June 20, 2015

“It was right here in this room that we celebrated the burial of the Equal Rights Amendment,” conservative Phyllis Schlafly, who led the fight against the constitutional amendment in the 1970s, told a cheering crowd in Washington, D.C. on Friday. “We were able to celebrate a tremendous victory against all the powers that be, and of all the things we taught people by defeating the Equal Rights Amendment, it was that conservatives can win.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Since successfully defeating the ERA in 1982 — a constitutional amendment that she argued would hurt traditional gender roles — Schlafly has continued her anti-feminism, anti-women's choice messaging. She has remained in the spotlight by making incendiary remarks, like that women should be paid less than men so they can find husbands. And at the conservative conference co-hosted by the Faith & Freedom Coalition and Concerned Women for America this week, her anti-choice rhetoric was echoed by many of the Republican candidates vying for the presidency in 2016.

Many of the candidates who spoke discussed their faith and their traditional family values to justify their anti-choice, anti-equality platforms. Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, who declared his candidacy earlier this week, listed off his anti-choice credentials, including the fact that he signed into law a partial-birth abortion ban and pushed through a constitutional amendment requiring that parents be given notice when their minor daughters seek an abortion.

"When I became governor, I was shocked by the total lack of regulation of abortion clinics," he said. "Parents had no legal role in their minor daughter's abortion decisions so we put regulations on abortion clinics. And we narrowed the number of them, but we made sure there was reasonable health and safety standards to protect women."

Studies have shown that abortions are actually extremely safe and that major complications rarely occur. Nonetheless, conservatives have fought for tighter restrictions on abortions by framing the issue around the safety of the procedure. Bush also lent his support as governor to "crisis pregnancy centers," right-wing organizations often posing as women's health clinics with an explicit anti-choice agenda that use misleading information and deceptive tactics to try to dissuade women from choosing an abortion.

"At my urging, the state of Florida was the first to sustain funding, $2 million a year, to go to crisis pregnancy centers to provide counseling and therapy — state money going to crisis pregnancy centers to give moms other choices."

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, who is likely to announce his campaign within the month, also drew loud applause from the conservative audience when he discussed his cuts to Planned Parenthood funding.

"When [the Democratic legislature] sends me Planned Parenthood funding year after year after year and I am the first governor to veto Planned Parenthood funding out of the budget, there is no room for compromise there," he said.

In 2010, Christie eliminated all family planning funding in New Jersey, cutting off $7.5 million that used to support 58 clinics. The action has had drastic effects on the state and its ability to meet the need for family planning services ever since — nine health centers have been forced to close and impoverished residents have suffered. Senate Majority Leader Loretta Weinberg (D) has accused the governor, who was pro-choice until he said he heard his daughter's heartbeat on an ultrasound, of trying to drag New Jersey back to the 1950s to pander to the social conservatives who might support a 2016 presidential run.

Christie to attend memorial for Charlest on murder victims at St. Matt hew A.M.E. church in Orange // NJ News – June 20, 2015

Gov. Chris Christie will attend a memorial prayer service for the victims of the Charleston, S.C. mass shooting Sunday evening at St. Matthew African Methodist Episcopal Church in Orange.

Nine African-American parishioners were shot to death and a tenth wounded Wednesday at the Emanuel African Methodist Church in Charleston. Dylann Roof, 21, has since been charged with their murders.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Saturday, media reports noted that Roof had apparently created a website, www.thelastrhodesian.com , filled with white supremacist codewords and rants along with photos of him posing with what appears to be a .45-caliber Glock handgun – the same make and model firearm used in the church killings and the same as the one found in his car when he was arrested Thursday, according to police reports.

On Friday, President Obama called for a closer look at U.S. gun laws, noting that "every country has violent, hateful or mentally unstable people. What's different is that not every country is awash with easily accessible guns."

The President added that he refused to act as if "any mention of doing something to stop it is somehow politicizing the problem."

On Thursday evening, Christie, who had been attending a 2016 exploratory event in New Hampshire, side-stepped the question of whether the racially-motivated South Carolina church killings highlighted a need for reform of the nation's gun laws.

"We don't even really know what the facts are here," Christie told CNN in an interview, calling the murders "a depraved act" and adding that only once "all the facts" are in could policy decisions be made.

KASICH

Obamacare looms over Kasich's presidential bid // Politico // Rachana Pradhan And Kyle Cheney – June 20, 2015

The Republicans running for president have practically made careers out of skewering Obamacare — so when Ohio Gov. John Kasich makes his expected entry into the race, he's likely to have a giant Obamacare target on his back.

Kasich says he is no fan of the president's health care law. But he fought his own party to implement one of its core components and is now gearing up to face GOP primary voters who want to rip the health law to shreds. His decision two years ago to embrace Obamacare's expansion of Medicaid to provide health coverage to low-income adults — a move that offered bipartisan cover to the White House during a tumultuous period — is likely to dog him in Iowa and New Hampshire.

Kasich made both a moral and economic case for covering the poor with mostly federal dollars. Many in his party disagree.

"We were deeply disappointed at Gov. Kasich's actions on the Medicaid expansion battle in Ohio," said Tim Phillips, president of Americans for Prosperity, a conservative think tank supported by the Koch Brothers. "Obamacare is a core issue at this point for so many Americans who will most likely be participating in primaries and caucuses. The question of expanding Medicaid is arguably the most important state-level aspect of Obamacare that's in play."

Strategists and political experts say the Medicaid issue alone isn't fatal to a Kasich candidacy, but it certainly doesn't help at a time when more than a dozen Republican candidates are groping to capture voters' attention.

"When you have so many candidates to choose from, you could be for a governor with a good record that didn't do that," said New Hampshire Republican strategist David Carney. "There are 12 or 15 flavors. If you love maple walnut ice cream but there's just too much maple, you go for something else."

Other governors with 2016 aspirations have rejected Obamacare's Medicaid expansion, including Wisconsin's Scott Walker, Louisiana's Bobby Jindal, and former Texas Gov. Rick Perry. And the Republican senators running for president — Rand Paul, Ted Cruz, Marco Rubio and Lindsey Graham — have all voted for repeal of Obamacare. New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, who may still join the race, enacted Medicaid expansion in a state where he faced intense pressure to do so from a solidly Democratic Legislature.

Kasich, on the other hand, undertook an extraordinary maneuver to bypass his Republican Legislature to expand Medicaid to hundreds of thousands of people. In the fall of 2013, he lobbied an obscure state board to unilaterally increase the state's Medicaid spending levels to accommodate the Obamacare program. Republicans howled and conservatives briefly targeted Kasich in a 2014 primary, but the furor died down.

His maneuver is unlikely to go unnoticed, however, in presidential politics. Kasich is fighting for the same center-right corner of the Republican base as former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, who in 2013 actively lobbied lawmakers in his home state to reject Medicaid expansion even though the state's current Republican governor, Rick Scott, supported it at the time. He'd enter the race as a long shot — he barely registers in early polls outside of Ohio — but he's hopeful that early stumbles by Bush will give him an opening to win support in early voting states likes New Hampshire.

Critics of the expansion, which provides coverage to low-income individuals who make up to roughly $16,000 a year, say its costs will ultimately fall on the states, crowding out other priorities like education and public safety. Though Obamacare fully funds the cost of Medicaid expansion through 2016, states will gradually assume up to 10 percent of the cost.

In many states, including Ohio, Medicaid enrollment has vastly exceeded original projections, setting off alarm bells among conservatives who say the states and the federal government won't be able to afford it. Nearly 540,000 Ohioans have been covered through the expansion already.

Kasich allies point out that the governor won a resounding reelection bid last year with 64 percent of the vote and scared off his one brief primary opponent, despite his association with the Affordable Care Act. They argue that his earnest commitment to the program is actually refreshing to voters, who crave his straight talk and willingness to take unpopular stances.

"What they see is someone who is willing to do what he thinks is right from a policy perspective and put politics to the side," said spokesman Chris Schrimpf, who noted that nearly a dozen Republican governors have embraced the Medicaid expansion since Kasich did.

Kasich, however, was one of the few who supported a traditional Medicaid expansion, without the right-leaning policy elements that made the program more palatable to Republicans in other states, from Iowa to Arkansas to Indiana. His imminent candidacy comes as New Hampshire — where Kasich has been particularly aggressive — is in the midst of an intense partisan battle over the future of its own Medicaid expansion.

Kasich argues that he's only bringing back funding that Ohio sends to the federal government, and that the Medicaid expansion has led to savings elsewhere for the state. And one of Kasich's favorite defenses is that expanding Medicaid puts him in good company with the last Republican to expand Medicaid — Ronald Reagan. He's also irked Republicans by justifying his decision as a moral and religious imperative.

"Now, when you die and get to the meeting with St. Peter, he's probably not going to ask you much about what you did about keeping government small. But he is going to ask you what you did for the poor," he told reporters in Ohio in 2013.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That strategy works well in his home state and for independents, but it's not likely to be a big winner among GOP primary voters, said Robert Blendon, a professor of health policy and political analysis at the Harvard School of Public Health.

"You just have to move onto other issues," he said.

Kasich has long argued that the Medicaid expansion established by Obamacare is different than Obamacare itself. He has joined the chorus of calls for repealing the entire law while contending that it's unconnected to Medicaid.

But that unusual semantic argument elicits scoffs from conservatives, too. The right has special hatred for Obamacare, but it also has separate qualms about Medicaid, arguing that the entitlement program has outgrown its original purpose of caring for low-income parents and people with disabilities.

Nearly all of the 21 states that haven't expanded Medicaid since the Supreme Court made it an optional program in 2012 are led by Republican governors. Just this year, fights over expanding the program have roiled state politics in Alaska, Florida, Montana, Tennessee and Wyoming.

Though experts say a single issue isn't likely to sink Kasich, it could diminish his appeal among the conservatives who animate Republican presidential politics.

"It's not compassionate to take a failing program and expand it by dumping millions of Americans in it," Phillips said. "For Gov. Kasich and others who have supported expanding this program, it's going to be a difficult explanation."

Mitt Romney Calls for Removal of Confederate Flag at South Carolina Capitol // NYT // Michael Barbaro – June 20, 2015

Mitt Romney, the Republican Party's nominee for president in 2012, demanded that South Carolina remove the Confederate flag flying above the grounds of its state Capitol on Saturday, calling it a "symbol of racial hatred."

His unambiguous statement will immediately intensify pressure on Republicans seeking the White House in 2016 to confront the thorny issue, which has long divided the state and bedeviled national candidates campaigning in it.

So far, none of the party's 2016 presidential candidates has gone as far as Mr. Romney in demanding that the flag come down.

Mr. Romney's words are striking because many Republican leaders, including those now running for president, have seemed reluctant to discuss the role of race — and racism — in the killing of nine parishioners at a Charleston, S.C., church. And they stand out because Mr. Romney himself, as a candidate, struggled to connect with black voters in 2012, later blaming his loss in part on "gifts" that he said President Obama had given to minority voters.

On Saturday, Mr. Romney took to Twitter to issue a firm message about the flag and race.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

With that, Mr. Romney became the most prominent Republican to make that demand since the Charleston shooting.

The issue is not entirely new for Mr. Romney. He spoke out against flying the Confederate flag as far back as 2008, when he first ran for president. “That flag shouldn’t be flown,” he said at the time. “That’s not a flag I recognize.”

2016 GOP contenders face major political dilemma in Obamacare ruling // WaPo // Katie Zezima & Lena Sun – June 20, 2015

Around the corner from Sen. Marco Rubio’s house and a few miles from former Florida governor Jeb Bush’s, an insurance agency at a strip mall advertises the Affordable Care Act.

Banners with a logo reminiscent of the one President Obama used during his campaign hang on the exterior of the Eli Insurance Agency. An ad above a window display touting trips to Punta Cana in the Dominican Republic says in Spanish that Obamacare could be available for $0 a month. “Obamacare $0 mensual,” it reads. “Centro de aplicaciones aqui” — Application center here!

Those signs may not last much longer. Depending on how the Supreme Court rules in King v. Burwell this month, they might disappear — replaced by a major political dilemma for Eli Insurance’s presidential-contender neighbors.

The pressing problem for the 2016 Republican field falls into the “dog catches car” category: It’s one thing to call for the Affordable Care Act to be repealed or to promise an Oval Office signing ceremony for its repeal. It’s another to endorse pulling insurance subsidies used by more than 6 million people in 34 states, including at least 1.3 million Florida residents.

A ruling that subsidies provided to consumers to help them purchase health insurance are not legal could spark chaos in the insurance marketplace and help shape the electoral landscape in several key swing states. Beyond those voters directly affected, many more could see their premiums increase if the law unravels, driving up the number of uninsured.

The administration has said it has no Plan B if the court rules against it. The sitting governors and senators in the GOP presidential field would be among those who need to implement an emergency fix that helps people remain insured. The rest of the candidates would be called upon to offer policy alternatives. All of them would need to balance demands that they support an emergency restoration of benefits with the demands of a conservative base that wants to seize any opportunity to gut Obama’s signature domestic policy achievement.

“The politics of this for Republicans are extremely tricky and treacherous, and most Republicans privately would like to see the Supreme Court take a pass on this one,” said John Ullyot, a Republican strategist.

As the decision date in the case edges closer, debate within the GOP has been split between those who see a political opportunity and those who see a looming disaster. Republicans have been furiously meeting on Capitol Hill this week to hammer out proposals as a court ruling looms.

The 2016 contenders currently in Congress will be the ones “in the crucible,” he said — they will have to take votes or make proposals “that might not be as politically pure as needed during a Republican primary.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On the other side of the spectrum, the Democratic presidential contenders lie in wait. “Hillary Clinton can immediately pivot not to defending the ACA,” said Republican strategist Rich Galen, but “can immediately begin saying, ‘The Republicans won’t fix this; I will’ — and I think that’s a big, big bow that the Republicans shouldn’t hand to her.”

Most of the major plans congressional Republicans and conservative think tanks have proposed to address a hypothetical loss of subsidies would offer some temporary relief — but only in exchange for a repeal of the requirement that most Americans have insurance, the linchpin of the law.

“Republicans need to unify around a specific set of constructive, longer-term solutions and then turn the 2016 presidential election into a referendum on two competing visions of health care,” Sen. Ben Sasse (R-Neb.), who proposed one of the plans, wrote in the Wall Street Journal in February.

Although most states are considering their options, even talking about them publicly before the decision is risky.

“The Republican governors have very little reason to put themselves at political risk if they don’t have to,” said Caroline Pearson, a vice president at Avalere Health, a consulting firm.

Florida, home to Rubio and Bush, and Texas — home state of presidential candidates Rick Perry, the state’s former governor, and GOP Sen. Ted Cruz — have the largest numbers of people at risk.

Gracita Beausejour, 62, of Miramar, Fla., said she receives more than $400 a month in subsidies and pays $30 monthly for her premium. She said she lost her job at a hospital four years ago and has not been able to find work since; she receives $590 a month in Social Security.

If she loses her subsidy as a result of the court ruling, “I’m going back to having no insurance again,” she said. Referring to Republican lawmakers in Congress, she said: “People who are higher don’t care for lower people.”

The ruling would land hard in a string of general election battlegrounds, leaving next year’s GOP nominee potentially facing hundreds of thousands of voters who lost subsidies in each of these states: North Carolina, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Wisconsin, Ohio and Indiana. If the subsidies do disappear, premiums in those states are projected to more than double, at a minimum.

Cruz, who has said that his campaign is a “referendum on repealing Obamacare,” signed a brief from members of Congress supporting the challengers in the court case.

“The goal is to provide an off-ramp for our people to escape this law without losing their insurance, and all conservatives in Congress should work together toward this goal,” Rubio wrote in a Fox News op-ed in March. He called for a refundable tax credit people could use to purchase health insurance, reforming insurance regulations and putting Medicare and Medicaid on “fiscally sustainable” paths.

Cruz has a health care policy team that is gaming out possible outcomes at the Supreme Court, according to an adviser.

“I don’t think the answer is to extend the Obamacare subsidies,” Cruz said after an event in Red Oak, Iowa.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If the court rules against the government, Congress should step in and say, “This isn’t working, let’s repeal it and start over,” he said. “And at a minimum, in the wake of King v. Burwell, I believe Congress should allow states to opt out.”

The Texas Republican has said that health care reform should include being able to purchase across state lines, expanding health savings accounts and unlinking insurance from employment.

In Wisconsin, where 166,142 people are receiving subsidies, premiums could jump 252 percent, according to a Kaiser Family Foundation analysis. Gov. Scott Walker (R) has said the solution needs to come from Congress, not the states. In Ohio, where 161,011 people would lose their subsidies, Gov. John Kasich (R) said the state would “have to figure something out” and has not ruled out creating a state exchange.

Bush mentioned the Affordable Care Act during his announcement speech only in the context of a court case where an order of nuns challenged the law because of a mandate that requires employers to offer insurance plans that cover contraceptives; he did not mention repealing it.

Nowhere would a ruling against the law affect more people than in his home state of Florida, where premiums could skyrocket by an average of 359 percent, according to the Kaiser analysis. An Avalere analysis found that Florida residents would have to pay on average $3,500 more a year for their premiums.

Brian Ballard, a Republican lobbyist in Tallahassee, noted that Rubio and Bush have been steadfast in their opposition to the Affordable Care Act, something that will help them with the conservative base.

“In a Republican primary I would argue that being anywhere around supportive of Obamacare would be toxic to a candidate,” Ballard said. But he acknowledged that there would be consequences.

“We’re going to have whatever backlash there is from those people receiving the entitlement. There’s no doubt that’s going to be there,” he said. “That’s going to be built into the framework of the election.”

“The solution is not to take away the Obamacare,” said Maylin Portell, who works at the insurance agency, where photos of Cuba and a wooden carving of the island hang on bright orange and yellow walls. Portell said the agency has helped more than 300 people of all ages sign up for coverage. There have been glitches, such as paperwork that needs to be reprocessed. But it would be financially devastating if consumers lost the subsidies, she said.

How Mitt Romney’s opposition to Confederate flag just put the GOP’s current presidential candidates on the spot // WaPo // Ed O’Keefe – June 20, 2015

Mitt Romney, the Republican Party's 2012 presidential nominee, strongly condemned the flying of the Confederate flag on the grounds of the South Carolina state capitol on Saturday, putting pressure on current GOP candidates to weigh in on a controversial subject in the "First in the South" primary state.

Romney's comments repeating his longtime position came in the wake of a shooting that left nine people dead Wednesday night at a historic black church in Charleston, S.C. On Saturday, authorities were working to determine whether the man accused of killing the nine African Americans attending a church Bible study was the author of a racist manifesto targeting blacks, Jews and Hispanics that was found on a Web site as part of an ongoing investigation.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the wake of the shootings, critics have denounced South Carolina leaders for failing to lower to half staff a Confederate flag flying on State Capitol grounds -- and for its placement near the Capitol at all. The flag has flown atop or next to the Capitol in Columbia, S.C., since 1962.

In a compromise worked out after national pressure in 2000 -- when it became an issue during presidential primary season in the key early-voting state -- the flag was removed from atop the Capitol dome in 2000 and now flies at a Civil War memorial next to the Capitol.

On Saturday, Romney took to Twitter to call the flag "a symbol of racial hatred" and said it should be removed as a tribute to the victims of the shooting.

Romney first weighed in on the flag as a Republican presidential candidate in 2007, when he said "That's not a flag I recognize."

"That flag, frankly, is divisive, and it shouldn't be shown," he said during a debate sponsored by CNN.

The comments sparked outrage among some South Carolina conservatives, a key voting bloc in the Palmetto State. In protest, a group called the Americans for the Preservation of American Culture ran several radio ads attacking Romney for not supporting the state's heritage.

Ultimately, Romney placed fourth in the South Carolina primary. He restated his opposition to the flag in 2012, when he won the GOP nomination.

While Romney took a pass on running for president yet again in 2016, he remains a widely influential figure in the Republican Party. He hosted a summit for some of his former top donors two weeks ago that was attended by several presidential candidates or their representatives.

His comments Saturday came amid the struggle by several of those candidates in recent days to articulate whether or not the flag should remain in place -- and whether the motives of the church shooter were racist.

On Saturday, former Florida governor Jeb Bush said in a statement, "My position on how to address the Confederate flag is clear. In Florida we acted, moving the flag from the state grounds to a museum where it belonged."

In 2001, Bush ordered the removal of the Confederate flag from the Florida State Capitol, where it had flown since 1978.

But Bush's statement didn't explicitly call on South Carolina to do the same: "This is obviously a very sensitive time in South Carolina and our prayers are with the families, the AME church community and the entire state. Following a period of mourning there will rightly be a discussion among leaders in the state about how South Carolina should move forward, and I'm confident they will do the right thing."

Late Friday, Bush told a Tampa Republican fundraiser that "It breaks my heart that somebody, a racist, would do the things he did" in Charleston.

Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Tex.), in an interview with The Washington Post, said Saturday that decisions about the flag are for South Carolina to decide, but that he understands "both sides" of the debate.

“Both those who see a history of racial oppression and a history of slavery, which is the original sin of our nation, and we fought a bloody civil war to expunge that sin," he said.

But, he added: "I also understand those who want to remember the sacrifices of their ancestors and the traditions of their states, not the racial oppression, but the historical traditions and I think often this issue is used as a wedge to try to divide people."

On Saturday, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, who is poised to launch a GOP presidential campaign, began a speech in Philadelphia by asking for a moment of silence in memory "of those nine lives" killed in Charleston. As he watched media coverage from South Carolina, he said he was stuck by how many "family and friends were already talking about forgiveness."

But Walker left his speech at the Northeast Republican Leadership Conference without taking questions from reporters, and a spokeswoman wouldn't say whether the governor had a position on the Confederate flag.

Carly Fiorina, the former corporate executive also running for president, didn't mention the shooting during a 20-minute speech Saturday at a Faith and Freedom Coalition conference in Washington. Asked about Romney's comments after her speech, she told reporters "personally I agree with him but I believe it's up to the people of South Carolina."

Spokespeople for Sens. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) and Rand Paul (R-Ky.) didn't return requests for comment on the subject on Saturday.

On Friday, former Texas governor Rick Perry referred to the shooting as an "accident" -- with campaign aides quickly saying that he meant "incident." His slip of the tongue in an interview sparked a social media backlash and immediately invited comparisons to his so-called "oops" moment during a 2011 debate, when he couldn't remember the three federal agencies he wanted to eliminate as president.

Perry said during the interview with Newsmax that he would be open to taking down the flag in South Carolina, saying "maybe there's a good conversation that needs to be had."

But Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.), who is also a GOP presidential candidate, dismissed questions about removing the flag when asked on Friday, telling CNN that "We're not going to give this a guy an excuse about a book he might have read or a movie he watched or a song he listened to or a symbol out anywhere. It's him ... not the flag."

Why Republicans were quick to cite religion — but not racism — on Charleston // WaPo // Jannell Ross – June 20, 2015

In the days since America absorbed the fact that a man entered a historic African American church and shot and killed nine of those in attendance, politicians have lined up to express their sympathies and/or dismay. But one likely motivation was initially, conspicuously absent from some Republicans' comments.

Racism.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

First, some facts: As reported by nearly every major paper and television news outfit Thursday, witnesses -- meaning people in the room in which the gunman sat with the bible-study group for almost an hour before opening fire -- say the suspect, Dylann Roof, 21, did not operate in silence. During an intermission in the carnage, Roof reportedly explained his actions in some almost boilerplate, American racist terms:

“I have to do it," he reportedly said, according to an account the morning after the tragedy. "You rape our women and you’re taking over our country. And you have to go.”

If, for some reason, you rank among those unfamiliar with the provenance of those ideas, consider finding an American history course to audit, immediately.

Moving on.

Also on Thursday, several outlets reported on a picture of Roof wearing a jacket with the flags of apartheid-era South Africa and Rhodesia -- another flag with clear and unmistakable racist connotations. By midnight, the Associated Press was reporting on a friend who said Roof was prone to racist rants. Friday morning, CNN had Roof's friend on video saying that Roof told him that he hoped to do something that would incite a "race war." And Saturday a manifesto, possibly written by Roof, was found posted at "The Last Rhodesian." It offered a mash-up of nearly every racist, anti-Semitic, white supremacist and "white-pride" idea available for mass consumption in the past century.

Finally, the gunman on Wednesday walked into the Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church in Charleston, S.C. He did not go to any of the city's many open-air public venues in which a young, white man might not have stood out from the crowd. He did not enter one of the many other churches in Charleston in which Southerners of all races find such comfort and kinship that asking, "And where do you worship?" is often preceded only by a solicitation of a new acquaintance’s name.

With some of this information clear or widely reported, GOP presidential candidate Rick Santorum on Thursday morning described the attack as a "crime of hate" and an assault on "religious liberty." By Friday, he added that he did think it was racist.

Also Thursday morning, Fox News's Steve Doocy posited that perhaps the massacre wasn't racially motivated at all but was instead about killing Christians.

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal (R), like Santorum, emphasized the religious aspect of it all. On Thursday afternoon, he suggested it would be hard to know what the gunman was thinking. "Law enforcement will figure out what his so-called motivations were," Jindal said. "We shouldn’t try to pretend we’ll understand his mind. I’d love to tell you there's some predictable line between a and b."

And on Friday, former Florida Jeb Bush seemed to struggle with just how to characterize it all. "I don't know what was on the mind or the heart of the man who committed these atrocious crimes," Bush said at a Faith & Freedom Coalition conference. Bush's spokesman clarified the governor's position a short time later on Twitter, saying that "of course" Bush believed the attack was racially motivated.

But while all of the above were quick to talk about the massacre in terms of an assault on religion and/or perhaps-unknowable motivations, they did not so quickly allow for the most obvious and increasingly apparent reason: racism. Instead, they expressed doubt, stumbled or struggled their way awkwardly around the idea. At this point, some have clarified their position or publicly changed course to say that it was indeed racism.

So, what's going on here? Why did it take as long as it did? A few theories:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

1. They were operating out of an over-abundance of caution. We are talking about politicians, after all, and nobody wants to jump to conclusions that prove to be wrong -- especially on such a sensitive topic. Even President Obama didn't invoke the r-word -- at least directly -- in his remarks Thursday. Of course, Obama rarely uses that specific word. Instead, he referred to racism by citing "a dark part of our history" and said, "This is not the first time that black churches have been attacked, and we know the hatred across races and faiths pose a particular threat to our democracy and our ideals."

2. They know that their party is often pegged as the white party. And it is overwhelmingly white. Maybe they feared that any acknowledgement of racism -- no matter how explicit or slight -- would open some sort of invisible floodgate sending a lot of water the party's way. And since the party has aligned itself with policies such as Voter ID and bans on Affirmative Action in higher education admissions, there's a chance that whatever emerges from a more earnest discussion about racism would eventually be troublesome for their party. (And sure enough, we have now begun a full-scale discussion about how Republicans feel about the Confederate flag -- an issue that has regularly beguiled GOP candidates.)

3. Perhaps they saw the Charleston shooting as an opportunity to begin a debate about religious liberty -- an issue much more in their party's wheelhouse. If a mass shooting at an African American church is about ready access to guns, Republicans are on the defensive. If it's a moment in which talk turns to how Christians face ongoing danger -- something many Republicans believe and have persistently argued -- it's an opportunity to talk about something that appeals to many Republicans (Christianity). Jindal, in particular, has regularly talked about a "silent war" on religious liberty.

4. Maybe what we are hearing is an odd attempt to connect to the actual humanity and vulnerability of African Americans, even those murdered in a church while praying. Perhaps avoiding the r-word amounts to a kind of twisted mercy; if the black human beings who died were first and foremost Christians, perhaps this elevates them to a status beyond the race into which they were born and for which they were murdered.

As we noted, some of these Republicans have now started clearly talking about this in the racial terms that cannot be avoided. But, in this case, the facts were pretty clear from the outset.

That the gunman hates Christians has never been substantiated; that he hates black people became clear almost immediately.

Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney called for the immediate removal of the Confederate battle flag from outside the South Carolina Statehouse, scrambling the 2016 Republican presidential contenders into staking a position on a contentious cultural issue.

Some still steered clear from the sensitive debate, even after the shooting deaths of nine people in a historic African-American church in Charleston further exposed the raw emotions about the flying the flag.

Many see the Confederate flag as "a symbol of racial hatred," the GOP's 2012 presidential nominee tweeted on Saturday. "Remove it now to honor #Charleston victims."

Romney joins President Barack Obama and civil rights leaders in calling for the flag to come down as the nation grapples with Wednesday's murders. The man charged with the crimes, Dylann Storm Roof, held the Confederate flag in a photograph on a website and displayed the flags of defeated white-supremacist governments in Africa on his Facebook page.

So far, most of the Republican Party's leading 2016 presidential contenders have been silent on flying the Stars and Bars.

South Carolina was the last state to fly the Confederate battle flag from its Capitol dome. A compromise in 2000 moved the flag to a 30-foot flagpole elsewhere on Statehouse grounds, where it has been flying at full staff.

The debate holds political risks for Republicans eager to win over South Carolina conservatives who support the display of the battle flag on public grounds. The state will host the nation's third presidential primary contest in February, a critical step in the 2016 race.

Former technology executive Carly Fiorina said Saturday she agrees the flag is a "symbol of racial hatred" yet declined to call for its removal, saying her "personal opinion is not what's relevant here."

Texas Sen. Ted Cruz said the last thing the people of South Carolina need is "people from outside of the state coming in and dictating how they should resolve it," Cruz said in a statement provided to The Associated Press.

He said he understands both sides of the debate — including those who see the flag as a symbol of "racial oppression and a history of slavery" and "those who want to remember the sacrifices of their ancestors and the traditions of their states — not the racial oppression, but the historical traditions."

A spokesman for Jeb Bush had no immediate comment on Saturday, although Bush ordered the Confederate flag removed from over the Florida Statehouse in his first term as governor.

Both Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker and Ohio Gov. John Kasich ignored questions about the flag posed by reporters over the last 24 hours. Spokesmen for most of the other Republican presidential contenders also either ignored such questions or formally declined to comment. They include Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal, former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, businessman Donald Trump and Sens. Rand Paul and Marco Rubio.

Democrats have been more willing to offer their opinions.

A White House spokesman said Friday that Obama continues to believe the flag belongs in a museum. Democratic presidential contender Hillary Rodham Clinton has yet to address the issue this week, but in 2007 called for the flag's removal, in part because the nation should unite under one banner while at war.

Romney: Take down the Confederate flag; 2016 GOP field: Leave it to South Carolina // Politico // Marc Caputo and Ali Breland – June 20, 2015

Mitt Romney showed his enduring influence on the Republican presidential field on Saturday when he weighed in on the national debate over the Confederate battle flag, calling bluntly for South Carolina to remove it from the state capitol in the wake of the shootings in Charleston.

“Take down the #ConfederateFlag at the SC Capitol,” the 2012 Republican nominee tweeted. “To many, it is a symbol of racial hatred. Remove it now to honor #Charleston victims.”

It was hours before the GOP's 2016 contenders followed with statements of their own, illustrating their reluctance to wade into a conversation that could put them at odds with the base of a party with deep roots in the South and a complicated racial legacy.

Jeb Bush was the first candidate to issue a statement, noting that as governor of Florida, "we acted, moving the flag from the state grounds to a museum where it belonged." But even Bush declined to demand that South Carolina remove the controversial flag, which alleged Charleston shooter Dylann Roof was shown brandishing in photos that emerged Saturday on a website reportedly linked to him.

"This is obviously a very sensitive time in South Carolina and our prayers are with the families, the AME church community and the entire state," Bush wrote in a Facebook post. "Following a period of mourning, there will rightly be a discussion among leaders in the state about how South Carolina should move forward and I'm confident they will do the right thing."

Florida Sen. Marco Rubio approvingly pointed to Bush's decision, in 2001, to quietly move Florida's confederate flag from the state Capitol to a museum. Like Bush, Rubio said today's decision is in South Carolina's hands.

"In Florida it's not up to our — it was moved to a museum. I support that decision," Rubio said. "And I think ultimately the people of South Carolina will make the right decision for South Carolina. And I believe in their capacity to make that decision." Asked if moving the flag was an example of the "right decision," Rubio wouldn't say.

However, Rubio didn't mention that he signed on to what became a failed bill in the 2001 Florida Legislature that would have prevented the further removal of Confederate and other war memorabilia by executive action. The bill was drafted in opposition to Bush's unilateral removal of the Confederate flag at Florida's Capitol.

Rubio's comments to reporters, somewhat ironically, came during the Miami-Dade Republican Party's Lincoln Day Dinner, named after the president who crushed the South's rebellion, which began when South Carolinians attacked Fort Sumter in Charleston harbor.

Other Republican contenders were likewise cautious, to varying degrees.

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker said in a statement, "The placement of a Confederate flag on the Capitol grounds is a state issue and I fully expect the leaders of South Carolina to debate this but the conversation should wait until after the families have had a chance to bury and mourn their loved ones."

Rand Paul declined to comment.

Ohio Gov. John Kasich said, "This is up to the people of South Carolina to decide, but if I were a citizen of South Carolina I'd be for taking it down."

Carly Fiorina was the only other Republican to agree with Romney, but she, too the state should make the decision. Sen. Ted Cruz told the Washington Post that South Carolina should make the decision, though he understood both sides of the debate.

South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham, also a GOP candidate for president, told CNN: "It works here. That's what the statehouse agreed to do. You could probably visit other places in the country near some symbol that doesn't quite strike you right …We're not going to give this a guy an excuse about a book he might have read or a movie he watched or a song he listened to or a symbol out anywhere. It's him ... not the flag."

Democrat Hillary Clinton called for the flag's removal from South Carolina's statehouse grounds years ago, but critics have pointed out that she and her husband were silent about Confederate Flag Day and other rebel reminders in Arkansas when Bill Clinton was governor there. In an emotional speech Saturday, Clinton called for renewed efforts pass gun-control laws and decried America's enduring racial divides.

"So many of us hoped that by electing our first black president, we had turned the page on this chapter in our history," she said.

President Barack Obama later Saturday tweeted "Good point, Mitt," linking to Romney's 8 a.m. tweet.

The debate over the Confederate flag came as Roof's purported manifesto was uncovered Saturday.

The nearly 2,500-word document lays out the alleged shooter's motivation and leaves little question that he harbored deep racial resentment toward African Americans and saw himself as a defender of white supremacy. It was published, on a website called the Last Rhodesian, along with dozens of pictures of Roof appearing with various Confederate monuments and symbols, including the flag.

For some conservatives, the issue of South Carolina's rebel flag has become an unwelcome distraction. Writing in Hot Air, Ed Morrisey noted that the issue puts GOP candidates in a theoretically tough position of either pandering to fans of the flag or writing off South Carolina in the primaries. "It puts Republicans at a stark disadvantage, all over a flag which stood for rebellion and disunity, whose purpose ended 150 years ago — and the attachment to it should have ended at the same time."

Morrisey's solution: Make South Carolina decide between keeping the rebel flag on state house grounds or keeping its early-state status in the primaries, where the flag issue becomes of outsized importance.

"If South Carolina wants to keep flying this flag at its capitol, that's their decision," Morrisey wrote. "But if that's their decision, then Republicans should push South Carolina to the end of the primary season and end this quadrennial embarrassment for Republicans in most other parts of the country. Enough is enough."

GOP Presidential Candidates: The More the Scarier // Real Clear Politics // Jonathan Riehl & David B. Frisk – June 20, 2015

Hillary Clinton apparently doesn't scare the Republican Party, since a candidate roster of unprecedented size is amassing in search of the party's presidential nomination. But the very size of that overcrowded field is diminishing GOP chances of retaking the White House in 2016.

For centrist voters, the chaotic array of candidates will reinforce an impression that except for criticizing the incumbent president, the GOP lacks focus. Meanwhile the Democrats will, perhaps fitfully, draw toward their center of gravity. The challenge Clinton faces in maximizing unity and enthusiasm before her coronation as nominee is not trivial, as Bernie Sanders' unexpected strength in the recent Wisconsin Democratic convention straw poll reveals. But Clinton's intra-party difficulties look trivial compared with those a ridiculously crowded field presents to the GOP.

This is all the truer because base Republican voters are juggling a complicated set of criteria that makes it hard for them to settle on what "best nominee" actually means. With no clear leader, the conservative ship of state is truly adrift – notwithstanding any half-hearted protestations about the embarrassment of riches.

An important factor in lengthening the candidate roster and also making a quick winnowing unlikely is a long decline in political discipline among conservatives, who for many decades have dominated the Republican electorate. One notable result of this indiscipline is trouble judging who is most worth backing in a presidential race – the proliferation of fuzzy thinking about who is most likely to win a general election, remain true to conservative principles, and deliver for conservatives as president. This situation results from at least two causes. One is conservatives' and libertarians' ambivalent attitude toward power and therefore toward practical, as distinct from merely expressive, politics. The other is their long record of frustration with presidential power and federal authority.

Despite their substantial success within the GOP, some of these voters have felt increasingly alienated from a political system that has produced such limited policy victories for them in the half century since conservatives flouted the party's moderate establishment to nominate the unabashedly ideological Barry Goldwater. In addition, the famous “Buckley Rule” from that era, accurately attributed to the founding editor of National Review — that the party should nominate the rightmost viable candidate — has been widely preached but little fulfilled.

What William F. Buckley Jr. meant was that the party should focus on someone who would clearly advance the conservative cause even if he didn't win. Even by that modest standard, it would be hard to choose from among the current crop of contenders on the Republican right. How has Ted Cruz, for example, demonstrated any ability to nudge large swaths of voters in his direction, even in a losing cause? As for winning a national election while advancing conservatism’s broader agenda, Ronald Reagan may be the only nominee who ever pulled off that trick. In that sense Reagan succeeded where Goldwater did not. But in the 2016 field, the Republicans don’t appear to have a Reagan or a Goldwater. They do have a Bush, but that’s part of the problem, not the solution.

To cite one result of the dysfunctional criteria many conservatives now apply to nomination contests: Organizers of the early debates will probably feel compelled to include Carly Fiorina and Ben Carson even if their poll numbers are statistically nonexistent — lest conservatives accuse them of favoring insiders. Symbolic politics are too much at work. Conservatism and its postwar legacy of intellectual seriousness are in real peril.

The crowded debate stages will prevent any one or two candidates from making a strong enough impression to actually begin shaping the Republican field. Worse, the teeming cast will allow far too little time for viewers to learn much about candidates or issues — a problem not just for democratic citizenship, but for the GOP's morale and sense of identity as well. The overcrowding will also tend to dangerously delay the emergence of strong motivation for any particular candidate among volunteers and donors, even if they have early inclinations toward one or another. (Each candidate of any prominence will have some deeply, durably committed backers. But not, we think, a very significant number.) The existence and likely continuance of a plethora of campaigns will also multiply occasions for resentment among the supporters of various candidates, or types of candidates, as the looming battle is joined. And finally, all of this proceduralism will waste even more Republican money in the primary phase than would be the case anyway.

Furthermore, even if conservatives did promptly zero in on the questions that actually matter most to their cause, this candidate field would be hard to judge. A thumbnail sketch of the higher-profile Republican hopefuls' key assets and liabilities suggests the trouble that primary voters will have in deciding who is most electable and politically trustworthy — and therefore ending, reasonably soon, what promises to be a dangerously long primary season for the GOP.

Jeb Bush would insure the GOP against the risks of relative inexperience, can be expected to show strong command of many issues, and wouldn't offend centrist independents. But his name and the dynastic factor are backward-looking minuses — and he isn’t likely to win the hearts of social conservatives or immigration restrictionists, two constituencies that exert significant pressure on the nominating process, or the many Republicans who distrust the politics of compromise and incrementalism.

Ben Carson breaks the party's supposedly damaging “white male” image — and does so as an outspoken conservative. His combination of geniality, superior achievement in a profession far more popular than the corporate world, and fearless denunciation of the left could be formidable, but he’s never held or run for office, and is given to the kind of impolitic gaffes that invariably bedevil political amateurs.

Ted Cruz has a strong aura of self-promotion, and something rings hollow in his rhetoric, (and his thin Senate record) especially if he is standing next to someone like fellow freshman Sen. Rand Paul. But he can motivate conservatives, and with his public speaking skills might be able to get others to listen.

Carly Fiorina is the Hillary Clinton antidote, at least as far as gender demographics are concerned, but her resume stands in stark contrast to the Democrats' frontrunner. Clinton is a former first lady, U.S. senator, and secretary of state—though not without critics of her role as the nation's top diplomat. Fiorina is a corporate CEO with a mixed record of success and a failed Senate candidate.

Mike Huckabee has, like Jeb Bush, "run" a state. Uniquely among the candidates, he also has experience dealing with the Clinton machine back home in Arkansas. More than most in the field, he understands the economic plight of working and middle-class Americans. And his commitment to social conservatism is genuine and appreciated by the GOP base, but may have limited appeal. Those traits might make him a more formidable primary season candidate than his current poll numbers suggest, but his social conservatism could render him unelectable in November 2016.

Rand Paul capitalizes credibly on the anti-Washington mood —giving the impression of an honest, committed, independent thinker who would rather be right than president. But his tendency toward isolationism — even if he pref ers it to be called non-interventionism — is simply not in sync with most Republicans' foreign policy views.

Marco Rubio, the third of the GOP's troika of freshmen senators, is a fresh face, projects inclusiveness and optimism, and is especially quick and articulate. Like Cruz, he is Hispanic and speaks evocatively of the immigrant experience. But many conservatives also want a candidate who can speak convincingly of the great danger they believe the country is in — and who is comfortable "going negative." He may not be able to.

Scott Walker has an impressive gubernatorial and electoral record, beating back the twin bogeymen of public-employee unions and MSNBC (in the person of Ed Schultz) for good measure. But does he have the charisma the role demands? His network of think tank leaders, opinion leaders, and donors is impressive to insiders, but does he come across as presidential? Will his lack of gravitas give voters pause?

Why Can't Republicans Admit Dylann Roof Was Racist? // NY Mag // Jonathan Chait – June 20, 2015

The mysteriousness of Dylann Roof's motivations for allegedly murdering a room full of African-Americans, rated on a scale of 1 through 10, is zero. Roof has been described by people who knew him as obsessed with racial hatred, has been photographed with racist symbolism, told his victims he planned to murder them because of their race, and even let one live specifically so that she could let the world know the reason for his crime. It is entirely possible that some form of mental illness or adverse life event caused Roof to embrace violent racism, but there is zero doubt that racism directly motivated his actions.

Bizarrely, a number of conservative figures have treated Roof's motives as unknowable. South Carolina Governor Nikki Haley wrote, "we do know that we'll never understand what motivates anyone to enter one of our places of worship and take the life of another." The Wall Street Journal editorializes today, "What causes young men such as Dylann Roof to erupt in homicidal rage, whatever their motivation, is a problem that defies explanation beyond the reality that evil still stalks humanity."

Jeb Bush, appearing at the Faith & Freedom Coalition Conference, said, "I don't know what was on the mind or the heart of the man who committed these atrocious crimes." When pressed for a follow-up by the Huffington Post, Bush continued to equivocate:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"It was a horrific act and I don't know what the background of it is, but it was an act of hatred," Bush said.

Asked again whether the shooting was because of race, Bush added, "I don't know. Looks like to me it was, but we'll find out all the information. It's clear it was an act of raw hatred, for sure. Nine people lost their lives, and they were African-American. You can judge what it is."

What's genuinely mysterious is not just why conservatives believe such nonsense but why they feel obliged to say it. After all, the Republican Party may be in general denial about the persistence of racism as a continuing force in American life, and openly racist whites may be a part of their constituency (just as they have long been part of the Democratic Party's constituency).

In 2000, George W. Bush gave a speech at Bob Jones University, which banned interracial dating. But Bush was competing in a Republican primary in South Carolina and really needed the votes of whites who opposed interracial dating. Neither Jeb Bush nor other Republicans need the votes of racist murderers to win an election. It would be very easy to identify a confessed white-supremacist murderer without doing violence to the overall conservative worldview. It is not like admitting the persistence of racial discrimination by police or employers or school administrators or courts, all of which put pressure on conservative policies. Just say there are still a small number of racist murderers in America!

Roof's actions are a completely sensible expression of his twisted worldview. It's the failure to admit it that's senseless.

Religion and politics: GOP hopefuls' new insight on faith // AP // Steve Peoples – June 20, 2015

Republican presidential contenders railed against abortion rights on Saturday as they courted religious conservatives, promising Christian values would guide their personal decisions and public policies should they win the presidency.

"My faith has guided me for my entire life, and I don't suspect that's going to change," former Texas Gov. Rick Perry said after ticking off a list of abortion restrictions enacted while he led Texas. "No candidate's done more to protect unborn life."

Perry was among nearly a dozen presidential hopefuls in Washington this week for one of the nation's premier gatherings of Christian activists.

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush called his Catholic faith "an organizing part of my architecture." Ohio Gov. John Kasich said religion gives him more empathy toward the poor. And Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas cited his Christian values in lashing out at the Supreme Court.

The Faith and Freedom Coalition's annual conference began the day after nine African-Americans were shot to death inside a historic South Carolina church, offering a grim backdrop to the three-day meeting designed to give religious activists a closer look at the large class of GOP candidates and others considering bids.

Beyond decrying the shootings in South Carolina, presidential prospects offered religious conservatives an intimate look at the role of faith in their public lives.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Speaking on Friday, Bush noted that he converted to Catholicism after marrying his Mexican-born wife. The religion, he said, has been "an organizing part of my architecture, if you will, as a person and certainly as an elected official."

He highlighted his work to institute new abortion restrictions during his administration, which included strict parental notification laws and a ban on "partial-birth" abortion. He also cited his fight for the life of Terry Schiavo, a Florida woman kept in a vegetative state for 15 years on life support. While her husband wanted her feeding tubes removed, Bush ordered the tubes reinserted only to be overruled by a federal court.

"I insisted that we build a culture of life," Bush said of his eight years as Florida governor.

Asserting that "people of sincere faith make better leaders," former technology executive Carly Fiorina criticized Democrats for being weak on social issues. "I do not think progressives share our belief in gifts and the dignity of each and every human life," she said.

Kasich, who is expected to launch a presidential bid in the coming weeks, said his Catholic background pushed him to run for governor.

"I got a calling, folks," he said Friday in a speech referring to Bible verses from memory more than once.

"What my faith does for me, I hope, is gives me strength, it allows me to have patience, it helps me to love my enemies, it helps me to care more about other people," Kasich told reporters after leaving the stage.

The Republican Party's evangelical wing wields great influence in the selection of the GOP's presidential nominee, particularly in Iowa and many of the southern states scheduled to host primary contests early in the voting calendar — South Carolina prominent among them.

Exit polls taken during the 2014 midterm elections found that 4 in 10 Republican voters were white evangelical Christians, and nearly half attended religious services weekly. Among Democrats, a third attend services weekly, while 11 percent are white born-again Christians.

While this week's conference drew almost the entire Republican presidential field, some contenders will do better with Christian conservatives than others.

Both Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal and Perry have hosted daylong prayer events in their states. Cruz had a strong religious upbringing. Former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum is a devoted social conservative. Former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee is also a Baptist minister.

Conference organizers were largely pleased with the Republicans' focus on faith, although some said talk is cheap. A real test, they suggested, would come after the Supreme Court weighs in on gay marriage. The court may strike down state laws that ban the practice.

"We'll see who's offering political sound bites and who shows up when the going gets tough," said Timothy Head, executive director of the Faith and Freedom Coalition.

Wait Lists Grow as Many More Veterans Seek Care and Funding Falls Far Short // NYT // Richard Oppel – June 20, 2015

One year after outrage about long waiting lists for health care shook the Department of Veterans Affairs, the agency is facing a new crisis: The number of veterans on waiting lists of one month or more is now 50 percent higher than it was during the height of last year's problems, department officials say. The department is also facing a nearly $3 billion budget shortfall, which could affect care for many veterans.

The agency is considering furloughs, hiring freezes and other significant moves to reduce the gap. A proposal to address a shortage of funds for one drug — a new, more effective but more costly hepatitis C treatment — by possibly rationing new treatments among veterans and excluding certain patients who have advanced terminal diseases or suffer from a "persistent vegetative state or advanced dementia" is stirring bitter debate inside the department.

The Veterans Affairs medical center in Phoenix, where 1,700 patients were not placed on the official waiting list for doctors' appointments, a report by the agency's inspector general found.Severe Report Finds V.A. Hid Waiting Lists at HospitalsMAY 28, 2014

Agency officials expect to petition Congress this week to allow them to shift money into programs running short of cash. But that may place them at odds with Republican lawmakers who object to removing funds from a new program intended to allow certain veterans on waiting lists and in rural areas to choose taxpayer-paid care from private doctors outside the department's health system.

"Something has to give," the department's deputy secretary, Sloan D. Gibson, said in an interview. "We can't leave this as the status quo. We are not meeting the needs of veterans, and veterans are signaling that to us by coming in for additional care, and we can't deliver it as timely as we want to."

Since the waiting-list scandal broke last year, the department has broadly expanded access to care. Its doctors and nurses have handled 2.7 million more appointments than in any previous year, while authorizing 900,000 additional patients to see outside physicians. In all, agency officials say, they have increased capacity by more than seven million patient visits per year — double what they originally thought they needed to fix shortcomings.

But what was not foreseen, department leaders say, was just how much physician workloads and demand from veterans would continue to soar — by one-fifth, in fact, at some major veterans hospitals over just the past year.

According to internal department budget documents obtained by The New York Times, physician workloads — as measured by an internal metric known as "relative value units" — grew by 21 percent at hospitals and clinics in the region that includes Alabama, Georgia and South Carolina; by 20 percent in the Southern California and southern Nevada regions; and by 18 percent in North Carolina and Virginia. And by the same measure, physician care purchased for patients treated outside the department grew by 50 percent in the region encompassing Pennsylvania and by 36 percent in the region that includes Michigan and Indiana.

Those data include multiple appointments by individual patients and reflect the fact that patients typically now schedule more appointments than they did in the past. But even measured by the number of individuals being treated, the figures are soaring in many places: From 2012 to 2014, for example, the number of patients receiving treatment grew by 18 percent at the Las Vegas medical center; by 16 percent in Hampton, Va.; and by 13 percent in Fayetteville, N.C., and Portland, Ore.

Mr. Gibson said in the interview that officials had been stunned by the number of new patients seeking treatment even as the V.A. had increased its capacity. He said he was frustrated that the agency was running short of funds. “We have been pushing to accelerate access to care for veterans, but where we now find ourselves is that if we don’t do something different we’re going to be $2.7 billion short,” he said.

He said he planned to tell Congress this week that the agency needed to be able to shift funds around to avoid a crisis this fiscal year. That includes using funds from a new program that was a priority for congressional Republicans called the “Choice Card,” which allows certain veterans to obtain taxpayer-funded care from private doctors. That money would be used to pay for hepatitis C treatments and other care from outside doctors.

In future years, Mr. Gibson said, more money will also be needed. He said he intended to tell lawmakers, “Veterans are going to respond with increased demand, so get your checkbooks out.”

The largest driver of costs has been programs designed to send patients to outside doctors, either because of delays seeing V.A. clinicians or because patients need treatments outside the system. Other major factors include the demand for new prosthetic limbs and for the new hepatitis C treatment.

The “daily obligation rate in medical services” inside the Veterans Health Administration — the part of the department that handles medical care — is $166 million, or 9.2 percent higher than last fiscal year, according to a presentation last week for senior department leaders. Costs for drugs and medications have risen by nearly 17 percent, with much of the increase because of the new hepatitis C treatment, according to the document. An agency memo from last month stated that the need for the new hepatitis C treatment “has greatly outpaced V.A.’s ability to internally provide all aspects of this care.”

The crisis may come to a head when Mr. Gibson testifies on Thursday on Capitol Hill, where Republicans have already criticized what they see as foot-dragging by the department on starting the Choice Card program. One congressional official briefed on the budget problems also said the agency had been slow to recognize how much demand and costs would soar for hepatitis C treatments. The budding crisis may reopen a partisan debate about veterans’ health care that has paralleled a larger philosophical debate about the size of government.

Last year’s waiting-list crisis led to complaints that the department was divided by an acrimonious and retaliatory culture, where whistle-blowers were punished and constructive criticism was stifled. But many experts say the principal problems were a shortage of doctors and nurses in the system, the nation’s largest integrated health care organization, and a lack of office space for patient care — while demand rose sharply from aging Vietnam War veterans and service members from Iraq and Afghanistan.

The department’s inspector general eventually concluded that “the systemic underreporting of wait times resulted from many causes, to include the lack of available staff and appointments, increased patient demand for services, and an antiquated scheduling system.”

Dylann Roof Photos and a Manifesto Are Posted on Website // NYT // Frances Robles – June 20, 2015

Dylann Roof spat on and burned the American flag, but waved the Confederate.

He posed for pictures wearing a No. 88 T-shirt, had 88 Facebook friends and wrote that number — white supremacist code for “Heil Hitler”— in the South Carolina sand.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A website discovered Saturday appears to offer the first serious look at Mr. Roof's thinking, including how the case of Trayvon Martin, the black Florida teenager shot to death in 2012 by George Zimmerman, a neighborhood watch volunteer, triggered his racist rage. The site shows a stash of 60 photographs, many of them of Mr. Roof at Confederate heritage sites or slavery museums, and includes a nearly 2,500-word manifesto in which the author criticized blacks as being inferior while lamenting the cowardice of white flight.

"I have no choice," it reads. "I am not in the position to, alone, go into the ghetto and fight. I chose Charleston because it is most historic city in my state, and at one time had the highest ratio of blacks to Whites in the country. We have no skinheads, no real KKK, no one doing anything but talking on the internet. Well someone has to have the bravery to take it to the real world, and I guess that has to be me."

The website was first registered on Feb. 9 in the name of Dylann Roof, the 21-year-old man charged with entering the historically black Emanuel A.M.E. Church in Charleston on Wednesday night, attending a prayer meeting for an hour and then murdering nine parishioners. The day after the site was registered, the registration information was intentionally masked.

It is not clear whether the manifesto was written by Mr. Roof or if he had control of it. Nor is it clear whether he took the pictures with a timer, or if someone else took them. In a joint statement Saturday night, the Charleston Police Department and the F.B.I. said they were aware of the website and were "taking steps to verify the authenticity of these postings."

If it is genuine, as his friends seem to think, the tourist sites he visited, the pictures that were posted and the hate-filled words on the site offered a chilling glimpse into the interests of an unemployed former landscaper said to have a fixation on race.

The racial makeup of Charleston shifted drastically over the last three decades. In 1980, blacks made up nearly half of the city's population. Today the city is two-thirds white. The Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal church is located in a predominantly white area of the city's downtown peninsula.

"This whole racist thing came into him within the past five years," said Caleb Brown, a childhood friend of Mr. Roof's who is half black. "He was never really popular; he accepted that. He wasn't like: 'When I grow up I am going to show all these kids.' He accepted who he was, and who he was changed, obviously."

Mr. Roof has been charged with nine counts of murder in the killings. Victims included the Rev. Clementa C. Pinckney, who was both the church pastor and a state senator.

Mr. Roof's friends say that he only spoke of his murderous plans once — when he recently warned that he planned to do something crazy with the gun he had purchased with the money he got from his parents for his 21st birthday. But they say his sense of racial grievance began with the Trayvon Martin case.

The website, the lastrhodesian.com , which was not working by Saturday afternoon, featured a photo of a bloodied dead white man on the floor. The picture appears to be an image from "Romper Stomper," an Australian movie about neo-Nazis. The domain name is a reference to the white minority of what is now Zimbabwe, where whites fought blacks for 15 years and enlisted white supremacists as mercenaries.

The site was first discovered by a blogger who goes by the pen name Emma Quangel, who paid $49 for a reverse domain search that turned up the site.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

According to web server logs, the manifesto was last modified at 4:44 p.m. Eastern time on Wednesday, the day of the Charleston shootings, and the essay notes, “at the time of writing I am in a great hurry.”

In the manifesto, Mr. Roof writes: “The event that truly awakened me was the Trayvon Martin case. I kept hearing and seeing his name, and eventually I decided to look him up. I read the Wikipedia article and right away I was unable to understand what the big deal was. It was obvious that Zimmerman was in the right. But more importantly this prompted me to type in the words ‘black on White crime’ into Google, and I have never been the same since that day.”

The manifesto also says he learned from the website of the far-right Council of Conservative Citizens. The council is an off-shoot of a 1950s era-organization that fought school desegregation. A message on its website says the group is “deeply saddened by the Charleston killing spree.”

A friend of Mr. Roof’s, Jacob Meek, 15, said the references to the Trayvon Martin case made it clear that Mr. Roof had written the essay. “That’s his website,” he said. “He wrote it, and I just can tell.”

Watchdog groups that track right-wing extremism say the manifesto reflects the language found in white supremacist forums online and dovetails with what has been said about Mr. Roof thus far — that he had self-radicalized, and that he did not belong to a particular hate group. “It’s clear that he was extremely receptive to those ideas,” said Mark Pitcavage, the director of the Anti-Defamation League’s Center on Extremism. “At the same time, he does not have a sophisticated knowledge of white supremacy.”

The icon for the browser tab on Mr. Roof’s website is an Othala rune, an ancient symbol appropriated by the Nazis that remains common among neo-Nazi groups.

Mr. Roof was the latest in what watchdog groups say is a growing group of lone-wolf extremists. According to a study released in February by the Southern Poverty Law Center, about 70 percent of the 60 recent domestic terrorism attacks reviewed were conducted by people acting alone.

The writings on Mr. Roof’s website show a fixation with black-on-white crime, which is common on white supremacy sites, said Heidi Beirich, the director of the Southern Poverty Law Center’s Intelligence Project.

“They demonize blacks to position themselves as victims, and offer that as proof of why they need their own state,” she said.

In one photograph posted on the website, Mr. Roof is shown posing with wax figures of slaves. In others, he posed with a handgun that appears to be a .45-caliber Glock. He had a .45-caliber Glock in his car when he was arrested Thursday, the police said.

The website’s links contain several passages of long racist rants, in which he said Hispanics are enemies, and “Negroes” have lower I.Q.s and low impulse control. The manifesto praises segregation and says the author’s reading of “hundreds” of slave narratives indicates that almost all slaves gave positive accounts of their lives. The manifesto uses defamatory terms for blacks, whom he accused of being “stupid and violent” with “the capacity to be very slick.” It laments white flight, and suggested that the whites should instead stay behind in cities and fight.

Criticisms are also levied at Jews, but Asians are praised for being racists and potential allies. Mr. Brown said his friend’s transformation appeared to have occurred after he left Columbia, S.C., for nearby Lexington. Records show he switched schools in 2007. “He wasn’t putting on Facebook ‘I hate black people. I am going to shoot up a church,’ ” Mr. Brown said.

Anthem Raises Offer for Cigna to $47.5 Billion // WSJ // Jonathan D. Rockoff, Dana Cimilluca, Dana Mattioli And Liz Hoffman – June 20, 2015

Anthem Inc. boosted its takeover offer for Cigna Corp. and is going public with the bid after the two sides failed to reach agreement, the latest move in a frenzy of attempted mergers among health insurers.

Anthem in a statement said it has offered $184 a share for Cigna. That equates to about $47.5 billion for all the company's stock that was recently outstanding. Anthem is making the cash-and-stock offer public in an effort to put pressure on Cigna through its shareholders, according to a person familiar with the matter.

Cigna had no comment Saturday afternoon.

Anthem's pursuit of Cigna comes as Cigna and others are eyeing Humana Inc., which has put itself up for sale. Aetna Inc. in the last few days made a takeover proposal to Humana. It isn't clear how much Aetna indicated it would pay.

UnitedHealth Group Inc., meanwhile, recently made a takeover approach to Aetna.

It isn't clear what, if any, Aetna's response was.

The five big managed-care companies are jockeying for deals that will enable them to get more efficient and better respond to changes in the health care landscape in the U.S. brought on by the Affordable Care Act and other developments.

Analysts says it is likely regulators will only allow one or two such combinations.

Anthem, which is based in Indianapolis and until last year was known as WellPoint, made a number of bids for Cigna privately in June, according to a letter Anthem Chief Executive Joseph Swedish sent to Cigna's board Saturday. The letter was released by Anthem. Among other things, it details disagreement the two sides have over the role Cigna CEO David Cordani would play in a combined company. He wants to be CEO, if not immediately then after a period of time, which Anthem refuses to guarantee.

Anthem's bid consists of about 31% of its own shares and the rest in cash. About 76% of the combined company would be owned by Anthem shareholders, while Cigna investors would own the rest, according to the latest proposal.

Cigna is seeking a nearly 50-50 split of directors on a combined company's board, Anthem said. Cigna also pushed for an offer price split evenly between cash and stock, according to Anthem.

Anthem, which said it has been in negotiations with Cigna since Aug. 2014, bemoaned what it called its rival's refusal to "reasonably negotiate." It said the governance demands Cigna is making are excessive, given the rich premium Anthem says it is offering.

"We were stunned that the Cigna board continues to insist on a guaranteed CEO position for Mr. Cordani over choosing to allow its stockholders to realize the significant premium being offered," the Anthem letter reads.

Anthem said it submitted four bids in June, the most recent, of $184 a share, on Thursday.

Shares of Cigna, which is based in Bloomfield, Conn., closed Friday at $155.30, giving the company a market value of $40 billion.

A combination would create a big player in the commercial health-insurance business, with strong positions among individual, small-business and big-employer clients. It would vault Anthem, the nation's second-largest health insurer, closer to UnitedHealth in size. Cigna's revenue last year totaled $34.9 billion, while Anthem's was $73.9 billion. UnitedHealth had revenue of $130.5 billion, including its health-services arm, Optum, while Aetna's was $58 billion and Humana's was $48.5 billion.

Anthem is a huge player in the individual and small-group markets in the 14 states where it holds the rights to be the Blue Cross and Blue Shield insurer. It also has a strong role among national employers. Cigna, meantime, focuses closely on self-insured commercial business and has a significant and growing position overseas.

A merged company would have a bigger presence in the fast-growing Medicare Advantage market, an area where both companies have lagged behind competitors. Together, Anthem and Cigna would have more than a million Medicare members. Anthem also has a major presence in Medicaid.

An attempt to seal an Anthem-Cigna merger could be complicated by Anthem's role as a Blue Cross and Blue Shield insurer, however.

The Blue Cross and Blue Shield plans hold geographic rights to use the Blue brand only in a particular area, and they also agree to certain limits on their non-Blue business. It is unclear how Anthem would manage the legacy Cigna business in states where another insurer is the local Blue. In its letter, Anthem said it was "confident in its ability to obtain regulatory approvals" and this "includes matters related to the Blue Cross Blue Shield Association."

Humana has held sale talks with companies including Cigna and Aetna, people familiar with the matter have said. Humana, based in Louisville, Ky., gets the bulk of its revenue from its business administering the private version of the federal Medicare program.

The company is seen as a prize because of its powerful Medicare franchise, which is growing rapidly as baby boomers age into eligibility and opt for these plans, known as Medicare Advantage.

Aetna has been viewed by some industry analysts as the most likely acquirer of Humana, and executives at Aetna have spoken publicly about their interest in acquisitions.

Attack Gave Chinese Hackers Privileged Access to U.S. Systems // NYT // David E. Sanger , Nicole Perlroth And Michael D. Shear – June 20, 2015

For more than five years, American intelligence agencies followed several groups of Chinese hackers who were systematically draining information from defense contractors, energy firms and electronics makers, their targets shifting to fit Beijing's latest economic priorities.

But last summer, officials lost the trail as some of the hackers changed focus again, burrowing deep into United States government computer systems that contain vast troves of personnel data, according to American officials briefed on a federal investigation into the attack and private security experts.

Undetected for nearly a year, the Chinese intruders executed a sophisticated attack that gave them "administrator privileges" into the computer networks at the Office of Personnel Management, mimicking the credentials of people who run the agency's systems, two senior administration officials said. The hackers began siphoning out a rush of data after constructing what amounted to an electronic pipeline that led back to China, investigators told Congress last week in classified briefings.

Much of the personnel data had been stored in the lightly protected systems of the Department of the Interior, because it had cheap, available space for digital data storage. The hackers' ultimate target: the one million or so federal employees and contractors who have filled out a form known as SF-86, which is stored in a different computer bank and details personal, financial and medical histories for anyone seeking a security clearance.

"This was classic espionage, just on a scale we've never seen before from a traditional adversary," one senior administration official said. "And it's not a satisfactory answer to say, 'We found it and stopped it,' when we should have seen it coming years ago."

The administration is urgently working to determine what other agencies are storing similarly sensitive information with weak protections. Officials would not identify their top concerns, but an audit issued early last year, before the Chinese attacks, harshly criticized lax security at the Internal Revenue Service, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, the Energy Department, the Securities and Exchange Commission — and the Department of Homeland Security, which has responsibility for securing the nation's critical networks.

At the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, which regulates nuclear facilities, information about crucial components was left on unsecured network drives, and the agency lost track of laptops with critical data.

Computers at the I.R.S. allowed employees to use weak passwords like "password." One report detailed 7,329 "potential vulnerabilities" because software patches had not been installed. Auditors at the Department of Education, which stores information from millions of student loan applicants, were able to connect "rogue" computers and hardware to the network without being noticed. And at the Securities and Exchange Commission, part of the network had no firewall or intrusion protection for months.

"We are not where we need to be in terms of federal cybersecurity," said Lisa Monaco, President Obama's homeland security adviser. At an Aspen Institute conference in Washington on Tuesday, she blamed out-of-date "legacy systems" that have not been updated for a modern, networked world where remote access is routine. The systems are not continuously monitored to know who is online, and what kind of data they are shipping out.

In congressional testimony and in interviews, officials investigating the breach at the personnel office have struggled to explain why the defenses were so poor for so long. Last week, the office's director, Katherine Archuleta, stumbled through a two-hour congressional hearing. She was unable to say why the agency did not follow through on inspector general reports, dating back to 2010, that found severe security lapses and recommended shutting down systems with security clearance data.

When she failed to explain why much of the information in the system was not encrypted — something that is standard today on iPhones, for example — Representative Stephen F. Lynch, a Massachusetts Democrat who usually supports Mr. Obama's initiatives, snapped at her. "I wish that you were as strenuous and hardworking at keeping information out of the hands of hackers," he said, "as you are keeping information out of the hands of Congress and federal employees."

Her performance in classified briefings also frustrated several lawmakers. "I don't get the sense at all they understand the problem," said Representative Jim Langevin, a Rhode Island Democrat, who called for Ms. Archuleta's resignation. "They seem like deer in the headlights."

Josh Earnest, the White House spokesman, said on Wednesday that Mr. Obama remained confident that Ms. Archuleta "is the right person for the job." Ms. Archuleta, who took office in November 2013, did not respond to a request for an interview.

But even some White House aides say a lack of focus by managers contributed to the security problems. It was not until early last year, as computer attacks began on United States Investigations Services, a private contractor that conducts security clearance interviews for the personnel office, that serious efforts to develop a strategic plan to seal up the agency's many vulnerabilities started.

The attacks on the contractor "should have been a huge red flag," said one senior military official who has reviewed the evidence of China's involvement. "But it didn't set off the alarms it should have."

Federal and private investigators piecing together the attacks now say they believe the same groups responsible for the attacks on the personnel office and the contractor had previously intruded on computer networks at health insurance companies, notably Anthem Inc. and Premera Blue Cross.

What those attacks had in common was the theft of millions of pieces of valuable personal data — including Social Security numbers — that have never shown up on black markets, where such information can fetch a high price. That could be an indicator of state sponsorship, according to James A. Lewis, a cybersecurity expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

But federal investigators, who like other officials would not speak on the record about a continuing inquiry, said the exact affiliation between the hackers and the Chinese government was not fully understood. Their tools and techniques, though, were easily identifiable to intelligence analysts and the security researchers who have been analyzing the breaches at the insurers and the Office of Personnel Management. Federal officials believe several groups were involved, though some security experts only detected one.

"Since mid-2014, we have observed a threat group target valuable 'personally identifiable information' from multiple organizations in the health care insurance and travel industries," said Mike Oppenheim, the manager of threat intelligence at FireEye, a cybersecurity company. "We believe this group is behind the O.P.M. breach and have tracked this group's activities since early 2013."

But he argued that "unlike other actors operating from China who conduct industrial espionage, take intellectual property or steal defense technology, this group has primarily targeted information that would enable it to build a database of Americans, with a likely focus on diplomats, intelligence operatives and those with business in China."

While Mr. Obama publicly named North Korea as the country that attacked Sony Pictures Entertainment last year, he and his aides have described the Chinese hackers in the government records case only to members of Congress in classified hearings. Blaming the Chinese in public could affect cooperation on limiting the Iranian nuclear program and tensions with China's Asian neighbors. But the subject is bound to come up this week when senior Chinese officials meet in Washington for an annual strategic and economic dialogue.

Though their targets have changed over time, the hackers' digital fingerprints stayed much the same. That allowed analysts at the National Security Agency and the F.B.I. to periodically catch glimpses of their movements as they breached an ever more diverse array of computer networks.

Yet there is no indication that the personnel office realized that it had become a Chinese target for almost a year. Donna K. Seymour, the chief information officer, said the agency put together last year "a very progressive, proactive plan that allowed us to see the adversarial activity," and argued that "had we not been on that path, we may never have seen anything" this spring. She cautioned, "There is no one security tool that is a panacea."

A congressional report issued in February 2014 by the Republican staff of the Senate Homeland Security Committee, concluded that multiple federal agencies with responsibility for critical infrastructure and holding vast amounts of information "continue to leave themselves vulnerable, often by failing to take the most basic steps towards securing their systems and information."

The report reserves its harshest criticism for the repeated failures of agency officials to take steps — some of them very basic — that would help thwart cyberattacks.

Computers at the Department of Homeland Security, which is charged with protecting the nation's public infrastructure, contained hundreds of vulnerabilities as recently as 2010, according to authors of the report. They said computer security failures remained across agencies even though the government has spent "at least $65 billion" since 2006 on protective measures.

At the personnel office, a set of new intrusion tools used on the system set off an alarm in March, Ms. Seymour said. The F.B.I. and the United States Computer Emergency Response Team, which works on network intrusions, found evidence that the hackers had obtained the credentials used by people who run the computer systems. Ms. Seymour would say only that the hackers got "privileged user access." The administration is still trying to determine how many of the SF-86 national security forms — which include information that could be useful for anyone seeking to identify or recruit an American intelligence agent, nuclear weapons engineer or vulnerable diplomat — had been stolen.

"They are casting a very wide net," John Hultquist, a senior manager of cyberespionage threat intelligence at iSight Partners, said of the hackers targeting of Americans' personal data. "We're in a new space here and we don't entirely know what they're trying to do with it."

Greece Considers Last-Ditch Proposals to Avoid Collision With Bailout Creditors // WSJ // Marcus Walker & Nektaria Stamouli – June 20, 2015

Greece's government is considering new fiscal proposals to avoid a collision with its creditors on Monday, in what could be a last-ditch effort to avert capital controls and a debt default, according to two Athens officials.

Government members are putting together a plan they hope would achieve budget targets that bailout creditors want, while relying more on eliminating tax breaks and less on pension cuts than the lenders' own proposal, the officials said.

The Greek cabinet is due to discuss the proposal on Sunday morning. It isn't clear whether the cabinet under Prime Minister Alexis Tsipras will endorse the plan, which was being prepared on the weekend by Deputy Prime Minister Yannis Dragasakis and others who are considered among the more pragmatic members of the leftist Syriza-led government.

Greece is under heavy pressure to convince its creditors it can hit ambitious fiscal targets ahead of scheduled meetings on Monday of eurozone finance ministers and, later in the day, of eurozone heads of government.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

European leaders have said Monday's high-level meetings won't reach any agreements unless Greece first presents convincing policy measures to inspectors from the International Monetary Fund, the European Union Commission and the European Central Bank, which oversee Greece's bailout program.

Finding measures to reach the fiscal targets creditors want has become crucial for unlocking fresh bailout financing for Greece, without which the country would have to default on its debts in coming weeks, including on loan repayments to the IMF on June 30 and on bonds held by the European Central Bank in July and August.

Failure to agree on Monday could quickly lead to capital controls in Greece, European officials said. The officials said a majority of members on the ECB's governing council is increasingly impatient with what it sees as Mr. Tsipras's stonewalling and anti-creditor rhetoric at a time when deposits are fleeing from Greek banks at a rate of around €1 billion a day. Greece's central bank, which is a member of the ECB, is having to cover that deposit flight.

A summit failure on Monday could well prompt the ECB's governing council to curb the provision of central-bank liquidity to Greek banks as early as this coming week, the officials said. Such a move would force Greece to impose capital controls that limit bank withdrawals, money transfers abroad and other financial transactions, likely plunging Greece's economy deeper into recession.

The new Greek proposals include elimination of many tax breaks, including scrapping exemptions on taxes on income from labor and capital, as well as levies on fuel, retail sales and other items. The extra revenues that this move could achieve, some officials hope, would allow shallower cuts in government pension spending, which could make the overall package less politically painful for the Athens.

Under one version of the proposal, pension spending would be lowered by 0.5% of gross domestic product a year, compared with 1% of GDP under a proposed package of policy measures put forward by the IMF, the EU Commission and ECB in early June. That policy package was compiled after a summit of key European leaders in Berlin on June 2, where German Chancellor Angela Merkel and others decided to present Mr. Tsipras with the outlines of their final offer.

The Greek premier was told he could only change measures in that proposed package if he offers alternative measures that achieve the same fiscal effect. Mr. Tsipras has repeatedly denounced measures demanded by the creditors.

Meanwhile, his government's proposed alternative measures up to now have been dismissed by lenders as falling a long way short of what is needed to put Greece's public finances on a sustainable footing. In particular, the IMF, with German backing, has insisted that major cuts in pension spending are unavoidable.

A cull of tax exemptions that Greece's cabinet will consider on Sunday would not only allow for smaller pension cuts, supporters of the idea hope, but would also allow Greece to avoid imposing a hefty increase in value-added tax on electricity—another measure the IMF and EU have proposed but which is politically hard to sell for Syriza.

It wasn't clear late on Saturday whether Mr. Tsipras had thrown his support behind the proposal from the pragmatic members of his government. Mr. Tsipras, in recent weeks, has shown defiance toward Greece's main creditors—other eurozone governments and the IMF,—rejecting their demands and insisting creditors, not Athens, produce more-acceptable proposals.

Some members of Syriza and of the cabinet, including Finance Minister Yanis Varoufakis, have continued to press Mr. Tsipras to stand firm. The hard-line camp in Athens argues that creditors, led by German Chancellor Angela Merkel, will offer Greece a more-lenient deal at the last minute rather than countenance a Greek debt default and exit from the eurozone.

Eliminating all tax exemptions in Greece's complicated tax code could raise around €3 billion a year in extra revenue, the Bank of Greece estimated in its recent annual report.

Greek governments of all political persuasions have so far shied away from scrapping tax exemptions en masse for fear of angering various interest groups that benefit from the breaks, ranging from farmers to hoteliers on Greek islands. Mr. Tsipras's left-wing Syriza party has also shunned this option so far.

Nor was it clear late Saturday whether the latest Greek proposals, if endorsed by the cabinet, would convince officials from the IMF, EU Commission and ECB. Those three institutions have complained for weeks that Athens hasn't put forward sufficiently concrete or comprehensive policy overhauls.

In the past, those institutions have signaled to Greece that they were open to scrapping tax exemptions, but they have also warned that Greece's economy is already heavily taxed and that spending cuts, including to pensions, are also unavoidable.

Trade Winds Blow Ill for Hillary // NYT // Maureen Dowd - June 20, 2015

WASHINGTON — IT'S hard being Elizabeth Warren.

Especially when you're not Elizabeth Warren.

Hillary Clinton had an awkward collision last week juggling her past role as President Obama's secretary of state, her current role as Democratic front-runner and her coveted future role as president.

As secretary of state, she helped Obama push the Trans-Pacific Partnership that is at the center of the current trade fight. In Australia in 2012, she was effusive, saying that the trade pact "sets the gold standard in trade agreements to open free, transparent, fair trade, the kind of environment that has the rule of law and a level playing field. And when negotiated, this agreement will cover 40 percent of the world's total trade and build in strong protections for workers and the environment."

Now Hillary says she is unsure about the pact and would likely oppose giving President Obama the special authority to negotiate trade deals for an up-or-down vote in Congress. As a future president, of course, she would want the same authority to negotiate trade deals that Obama is seeking in the messy Capitol Hill donnybrook.

But as a candidate pressured by progressives like Warren and Bernie Sanders and by labor unions, she turned to Jell-O, shimmying around an issue she had once owned and offering an unpleasant reminder of why "Clintonian" became a synonym for skirting the truth.

It depends on what your definition of trade is — and trade-off.

Hillary has vowed to be more straightforward this time about running as a woman, her position on immigration and her relations with the press (which are still imperious). The heartbreaking mass shooting in a black church in Charleston, S.C., Hillary said, should force the country to face up to “hard truths” about race, violence and guns.

But even after all her seasoning as a senator and secretary of state, even after all her enthusiastic suasion on the president’s trade bill, she can’t face up to hard truths on trade.

And we have to play this silly game with her, as she dances and ducks, undermining President Obama by siding with Nancy Pelosi after Pelosi filleted the trade deal on the House floor.

“The president should listen to and work with his allies in Congress, starting with Nancy Pelosi,” Hillary said in Iowa last weekend, torpedoing White House efforts to lure Democrats back on board.

In an interview with the Nevada journalist Jon Ralston on Thursday, Hillary slid around her previous support of the Pacific trade pact and said that if she were still in the Senate, she would “probably” vote no on the trade promotion authority bill.

Obama loyalists were quick to note the irony that Hillary did not help Obama, even though he is working to combat the deep Democratic resistance spawned by the North American Free Trade Agreement that President Bill Clinton signed.

The White House is certainly irritated with Hillary. Perhaps it will spur Obama to wonder why he pulled the rug out from under poor old Joe, his own vice president, to lay out the red carpet for his former rival.

As David Axelrod told The Times’s Michael Shear and Amy Chozick: “The fact is, she was there when this thing was launched and she was extolling it when she left. She’s in an obvious vise, between the work that she endorsed and was part of and the exigencies of a campaign. Obviously, her comments plainly weren’t helpful to moving this forward.”

CNN reported that Hillary had enthusiastically promoted the trade pact 45 times as secretary of state.

Aside from the fact that Hillary should be able to take a deep breath and stick with something she’s already argued for, it plays into voters’ doubts about her trustworthiness.

If you want to be president and you shape your principles to suit the shifting winds — as Hillary did when she voted to authorize W.’s Iraq invasion — then how can people on either side of an issue trust you?

Since she hasn’t sparked much passion herself yet, she may be frightened by the passionate acolytes of Warren and Sanders — whose uncombed authenticity is buoying him in New Hampshire.

And, given her own unseemly money grabs, she may not be willing to push back on primal forces swirling around the trade issue about unbridled corporatism in an era of stagnant wages.

But the greater danger for her is in looking disingenuous.

At the end of the day, leaders have to sometimes step up on some issues that are not 80 percent issues. Unfortunately for her, Hillary is not as artful a dodger as her husband.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Trade is a sticky wicket for her. But the path to the presidency is full of sticky wickets. And being president is full of sticky wickets. So you have to try to say what's true and what you actually believe, not just what's tactical.

Surprisingly, I received a fund-raising letter recently. Hillary Rodham Clinton was in large letters on the upper lefthand side of the envelope and above my address was the typed message: "Maureen, this is our moment . . . are you with me?"

Not at the moment.

Jeb Bush Has Hit a New Low // HuffPo // Lev Raphael – June 20, 2015

In case you missed it, the race-hatred massacre in Charleston has left Jeb Bush clueless. He's not sure if race is actually a factor in this horrific episode of domestic terrorism.

Every major news outlet in the country -- well, maybe not Fox? -- reported that a survivor recounted the killer "had said that African-Americans have 'raped our [white] women, and you are taking over the country."

Could it be any clearer that this is a hate crime directed at African-Americans in a historically important Black church? But when asked point blank if the crime was motivated by race, Jeb said, "I don't know." Despite the mountain of evidence that's already there, he doesn't know.

There's a hell of a lot Bush doesn't know. Back in February at a Chicago Council on Global Affairs luncheon he was asked about NATO's stance in the Baltic region. He said, "I don't know what the effect has been, because, you know, it's really kind of hard to be out on the road, and I'm just a gladiator these days, so I don't follow every little detail."

Asked about failed states in the Middle East, he came out with this gem: "I don't have a solution. I mean, I -- I -- I've read articles, you know, about whether the 1915 kind of breakout of the Middle East and how that no longer is a viable deal."

He admitted he was no foreign policy expert, in a bizarre way: "Look, the more I get into this stuff, there are some things [where] you just go, you know, 'Holy schnikes.' "

He's clearly not ready for prime time and is a lousy decision maker, too. Why did he show off his ignorance of foreign affairs at that foreign affairs luncheon? Unless he thought his Bush name absolved him of having to do research or prepare with consultants. Which means he's got as scary a sense of entitlement as his brother did.

But he continues to display his ignorance (or vacillation or unpreparedness) pretty much everywhere he goes. And this Bush is supposed to be the smarter brother. Well, I guess the bar is pretty low in that family.

Clinton calls Graham to offer condolences after Charleston shooting // The Hill // Kyle Balluck – June 21, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton called Sen. Lindsey Graham (S.C.), a GOP presidential candidate, on Saturday afternoon to offer condolences in the wake of the church massacre in his home state, CNN is reporting.

"She said she was calling to see how I was doing, and wanted to let me know that she was thinking about me and about everyone in South Carolina," Graham told CNN.

Graham said he was “pleasantly surprised” to get the call, according to the cable network.

"She is a nice person," Graham told CNN.

"I told her that the call meant a lot to me, and would mean a lot to the people of South Carolina," he added.

Clinton on Saturday called for new restrictions on firearms after nine people were killed last week Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church, a predominantly black church in Charleston, S.C.

"How is it that we as a nation still allow guns to fall into the hands of people whose hearts are filled with hate?" she asked in San Francisco. "You can't watch massacre after massacre and not come to the conclusion that as President Obama said, we must tackle this challenge with urgency and conviction."

- After event, mccain gives thumbs up, waves, and both candidates walk off stage (palin seeming to relish more in applause, hand-shaking)

Speech Highlights

Palin speaks

- TY-- you've got it all in this area, and a great sports town too. and your first NHL game soon- i think im looking at a whole new set of hockey moms here
- so glad to be here- standing next to the next POTUS
- and say hello to my husband, Todd
- MO is going to be a battleground state
- we're going to take our case for reform to every party of every background or no party at all - and with your help, we'll take it to DC
- McCain has been through tough fights, served america in good times and bad
- he's the only man who's got what it takes to lead our country
- about a yr ago, the war in Iraq looking bad- defeat would've left millions to a violent fate and us with a left secure nation - some in DC said there was no hope in war, and no hope fro candidate who said he'd rather lose an election than see his country lose a war -- but the pollsters and pundits forgot the determination, resolve and sheer guts of McCain (feistier delivery than previous)
- you all understand there's a time for politics vs. leadership, to campaign vs. put country first. JM wore country's uniform for 22 yrs and refused to break faith with the troops who have now brought victory within sight-- as mother of 1 of those troops, thats exactly the man as i want for commander in chief
- for his part, our opponent in an interview still cant admit. even yesterday said he's for change, but in iraq, change has happened and that's a great thing for America, Sen!
- in politics, there are some who use change to promote their careers vs. those like mccian who use their careers to promote change. this is a moment when principles and political independence mean more than the party line. he doesnt run with the washington herd - send the
- mccain has called the 2 of us a 'team of mavericks' -- as mayor, i reminded ppl that govt is not always the answer, in fact too often its the problem
    - i put govt back on side of the ppl. i eliminated taxes on personal property, i eliminated taxes that were hurting sm businesses; i cut property taxes every yr i was in office - these reforms worked, and we took off
- as governor, i took the same fight to the states - we broke the monopoly that controlled the state, and that was special interests and lobbyists surrounding big oil
- promised then passed ethics reform
- as mayor and gov, i tried to lead by example. as mayor, i took a voluntary paycut (husband not thrilled), cut the personal chef, put the state's checkbook online for all to see (bureaucrats not thrilleD),
- today budget under control-- we have a surplus-- i cut 1/2 billion in wasteful spending -- now that we have surplus, i gave it back to hardworking alaskans to spend themselves, and in htese tough times i want to bring tax relief to you
- i championed earmark reform to stop congress, told the congress thanks but no thx on bridge to nowhere
- just the other day, opponent brought up earmarks- i was surprised he wanted to go there- in 3 yrs, he's requested $1b in earmarks, $1M/ working day
- i'm ready to help mccain end practice once and for all
- i oversaw pipeline that will help us get off foreign oil once and for all
- drill now
- (drill baby drill! sarah! sarah!)
- as a matter of natl security and for prosperity, we need american energy produced by american workers
- our opponents going on about how they always fight for you- since mccain wont say this on his behalf, ill say it: there's only 1 man in this election who has ever really fought for you. (audience roars) he is the only great man in this race and the only ready to serve as 44th potus- so glad to intro my runningmate, my friend, sen. john mccain

McCain speaks

- TY missouri! we must win this state and we will to win presidency - im so encouraged by your enthusiasm
- im happy to be introd by gov. palin today but i cant wait to intro her to dc
- an advanced warning to Washington crowd: change is coming! (repeats 3x)
- as sarah mentioned, ive been called a maverick- now we have a team of mavericks- and we understand who we work for: not a party, a speical interest, not ourselves-- we'll work for you and we're going to drain the swamp in DC and take on special interests

- we fought corruption- i fought bigspenders in both parties
- an interesting fact: Gov. Palin vetoed 1/2 billion in earmark spending and Obama asked for almost $1B in earmark spending
- i will veto every porkbarrel earmark spending bill that comes across my desk-- we'll stop it!
- we'll stop it b/c it breeds corruption and we wont stand for it anyomre- we need a govt that stands for you not themselves. we'll take them on and defeat them. USA knows its time for change, right change
- Gov. Palin took on her own party and ran against an incumbent governor, ive taken on ppl in my party. Obama has never taken on anyone in his party. Americans want someone who will stand up for them, and that's what well do
- Gov. Palin mentioned $40B to bring natural gas to lower 48. and someone who's almost as popular as Gov. Palin, and that's Todd Palin, who snowmobiled across AK, a commerical fisherman, proud member of Steelworkers Unions, great man, great father-- we'll bring those values back to nation's capital
- Americans arent like Obama said they only cherish 2nd Am and religion b/c they dont like the economic conditions-- they do it b/c they love America, like in MO ("USA! USA!")
- we must stop spending $700B/yr to countries that dont like us very much. and we need wind, tide, solar, natural gas. Also, nuclear pwr, and also we need to drill offshore and drill now! (Drill baby drill!)
- and can i mention- nuclear power is safe, it's clean. other nations store or reprocess nuclear fuel and we can do that. it's got to be part of our plan.
- im always honored when i come to these gatherings, and see these ppl, old and young, with the hats on. can i ask them to stand so we can thank you for your service. TY for your honorable service
    - some of our navy vets will tell you they've sailed navy ships around the world and we've never had an accident
    - obama doesnt want nuclear or offshore drilling
    - we can build hydrogen-powered cars, and flex fuels, etc
    - we can create millions of jobs and get our economy going again and we will
- straight talk ("Straight talk! Straight talk!") : these are tough times- (McCain: "that sounded rehearsed") you're worried about jobs, struggling to put food on table, stay in home. we're looking at restructuring mortgage firms but we cant have govt bailout of Wall st
- ill keep taxes low vs. increase, open mkts vs. close-- Obama has the most liberal record in Senate. Create jobs vs. eliminate; health care choice vs. govt-run. we have to cut business taxes to keep businesses here. We have to double credit to $7500 for every dependent child. we have to help middle-income americans find and keep jobs and we can
- this weekend, obama was asked for ex. of when he bucked his party, and he said defense spending. he said now he wants to increase, but during primary, he told a liberal advocacy grp that he wants to cut it and slow development of future combat systems (boos)-- we've found out in recent times
- that's not bucking his party, that's telling them what they want to hear
    - you might not always agree with me, but youll always know where i stand
- obama was wrong about iraq, iran, and about russia-- he's wrong for america and Gov. Palin is right for america! (sarah! sarah!)
- the strategy has succeeded in iraq, we are winning, troops will come home in honor and victory not defeat like if obama had had his way
- there was a lot at stake when i said id rather lose a campaign than lose the war
- when Senate was debating Iraq, MoveOn ran an ad: Petraeus or Betray-Us-- can you believe something as disgraceful as that? -- in Senate, one of my GOP colleagues proposed resolution-- OBama refused to vote-- 130 times he voted present--i'll vote against those who want to harm this nation every time
- every once in a while, you have an experience that puts everything in perspective-- a yr ago last aug in Wolfboro, NH -- [Matthew Stanley story-- mom of KIA gives mccain bracelet, promise son didnt die in vain] -- we will win in iraq so those brave soldiers' sacrifice will not be in vain
- i want to be potus b/c i believe i can inspire a generation to serve a cause greater than self (john mccain! john mccain!)
- we may disagree from time to time, but i will always put my country first
- we need to win here-- we need you to spend the next 57 days GOTV, ill be counting on you. Sarah--Gov. Palin will be counting on you! we can win this election. and our best days are ahead of us!

Subject: Iran Deal: from my perspective as an Iraq veteran

VoteVets.org
Country. Service. Action.

Read my story and contribute $3 to VoteVets to elevate the voices of veterans like me who support a diplomacy-first approach with Iran.

John -

The last time the U.S. Military was called on in the name of stopping Weapons of Mass Destruction, I was stationed in the Diyala Province in Iraq as a Sniper in the U.S. Army 1st Infantry Division.

I participated in combat missions while the infrastructure of the country was destroyed, sectarian violence divided communities, millions were displaced from their homes, countless Iraqis were killed and injured, and our fellow service members were caught in the middle.

After helping to secure the scene of a HEMTT Tactical Truck that was destroyed by a roadside bomb in Iraq, and watching two female soldiers medivaced knowing they would likely not survive their injuries, I started to wonder what could have prevented the conflict I found myself deployed to.

Aside from the many American troops killed in action during Operation Iraqi Freedom, the burden of war continues to impact our veterans. Substance abuse, traumatic brain injuries, incarceration, homelessness, and suicide are just some of the issues veterans face coming home from war. Although these sacrifices are high, our military members take pride in risking their lives for our homes, families, and country.

That is why we need to ensure we do everything we can to prevent future war unless it is absolutely necessary. Our country needs to exhaust all diplomatic efforts before the possibility of military action is warranted. We owe it to the men and women that choose to serve this country.

The deal our State Department, and the other permanent members of the UN Security Council, has negotiated with Iran is the best diplomatic effort we can agree upon. It has great potential to stop Iran from obtaining nuclear weapons and prevent the future deployment of our Armed Forces.

VoteVets is elevating the voices of veterans like me who support this deal - contribute $3 to help ensure we are heard before Congress votes in September.

Before we see more of my brothers and sisters in uniform medivaced away from the combat zone let's support diplomacy and support the Iran Deal.

We have a very unique and important voice in this debate.

Thank for helping to ensure that it's heard.

Subject: [big campaign] ALERT: Anti-Obama Author Jerome Corsi on Larry King Tonight!

Tonight on Larry King Live…
The Obama Nation's Jerome Corsi VS Media Matters' Paul Waldman

Just an FYI for those following anti-Obama book author Jerome Corsi's appearances to promote The Obama Nation.

He will be appearing on Larry King Live Tonight opposite Media Matters' own Paul Waldman.

If you feel moved to pick up the phone and call in to challenge Corsi on the problems with his past and his book I'm sure that could prove useful.

Tune in tonight for the phone number which is usually shown on screen and read on-air by King. Remember that you may want to present yourself as a Corsi fan to get on the air if too many well-informed Corsi critics call in.

Larry King Live tonight 9pm ET, 6pm PT

You can arm yourself with the facts on Jerome Corsi and his book with the following talking points/research:

Top Line Message/Talking Points

On Corsi and The Obama Nation

- Jerome Corsi's book, as Media Matters has documented, is riddled with smears, distortions, and wild accusations against Sen. Barack Obama.
- The fact that anyone in the media would consider hosting this man without grilling him on the serious errors he passes off as legitimate criticism is recklessly irresponsible.
- This is the same man who helped launch the equally distortion-filled Swift Boat attacks against John Kerry in 2004 – attacks that many in the media, in retrospect, have said they should have done a better job of exposing.
- That the media is once again giving Corsi air-time to promote his bogus accusations is a serious problem.

On the Swift Boating of Obama

- Corsi's latest tome is eerily reminiscent of the baseless Swift Boat attacks he helped lead in 2004 against Kerry.
- What started with Unfit for Command, an error riddled screed co-authored by Corsi, lead to media coverage, tens of millions of dollars in television ads that distorted Kerry's war record and still more media coverage.
- Its time for the media to nip this in the bud and do what many now admit they should have done four years ago – expose Corsi for who he is

On the Right-Wing Noise Machine

- Conservative authors like Corsi have an echo chamber of right-wing talk radio programs, print publications and cable news broadcasts to rely on when it comes to promoting their work – however disingenuous.
- They are no long confined to the likes of Rush Limbaugh, The Washington Times and Fox News to sell their books.
- Willingly or not, mainstream media outlets the American people rely for important news have become cogs in the right-wing echo chamber.
- For forty years conservatives have been working the refs with mythical allegations of liberal media bias resulting in a press corps that bends over backwards lest they be tarred with the same tired complaints.
- So, instead of balance and accuracy what we all too often end up with is a structural advantage for conservatives in the media.

Other Background on Jerome Corsi

- A frequent poster on the right-wing website FreeRepublic.com in the past, Media Matters exposed the bigoted nature of many of his postings in 2004 including:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

    - Corsi on Islam: “a worthless, dangerous Satanic religion”
    - Corsi on Catholicism: “Boy buggering in both Islam and Catholicism is okay with the Pope as long as it isn't reported by the liberal press”
    - Corsi on Muslims: “RAGHEADS are Boy-Bumpers as clearly as they are Women-Haters -- it all goes together”
    - Corsi on “John F*ing Commie Kerry”: “After he married TerRAHsa, didn't John Kerry begin practicing Judiasm? He also has paternal grandparents that were Jewish. What religion is John Kerry?”
    - Corsi on Senator “FAT HOG” Clinton: “Anybody ask why HELLary couldn't keep BJ Bill satisfied? Not lesbo or anything, is she?”
- In January 2005, Corsi told the Boston Herald that he planned to run for Kerry's Senate seat in 2008 as a Republican or Independent. In May 2005, while on C-SPAN's Washington Journal, Corsi said his wife had “vetoed” this plan.
- In 2006, Corsi stated “Howard Phillips of the Constitution Party asked me to consider seriously running for president in 2008 and I am doing so.”

Background Simon & Schuster Imprint Threshold Editions, Corsi’s Publisher

- Threshold Editions is a conservative imprint of Simon & Schuster run by editor-in-chief Mary Matalin, a former advisor to many powerful establishment conservatives including most notably Vice President Dick Cheney.
- Threshold Editions has published works by Mary Cheney, Karl Rove, John Bolton and Glen Beck.
    - It has been reported that Mary Cheney was paid an advance in the “million-dollar range” for her book.
    - It has also been reported that Rove will be receiving $1.5 million for his forthcoming book published by Threshold.
    - Threshold published Beck’s last book and has reportedly signed him to a $3 million two book deal.

Summary of Media Matters Research Corsi’s The Obama Nation

In the preface of his recently released book, Corsi writes: “My intent in writing this book, as was the case in coauthoring Unfit for Command, is to fully document all arguments and contentions I make, extensively footnoting all references, so readers can determine for themselves the truth and validity of the factual claims.” Indeed, Corsi's comparison of the two books seems quite apt: Just as Unfit for Command contains false and baseless attacks on Sen. Kerry's military service, a Media Matters review finds that Obama Nation similarly contains numerous falsehoods about Sen. Obama on wide range of issues:

- Obama's position on abortion: On Fox News' Hannity's America, Jerome Corsi falsely claimed of Obama's time in the Illinois state legislature: “Even if a child was born, he said the woman still had the right to kill the child in an abortion.” Similarly, on Fox News' Hannity & Colmes, Corsi falsely claimed that “[a]fter a child's born, Obama ... in the [Illinois] state Senate, wanted the child killed if the mother desired an abortion.” And on ABC Radio Network's The Sean Hannity Show, Corsi claimed that Obama “support[ed] even late term, induced abortions where the baby lives. Obama's on record as let's kill the baby if that's what the mother wants.” In making the false assertion about Obama's position -- Obama has of course never supported giving people the right to kill their children -- Corsi was also misrepresenting the legislation to which he was referring, a bill amending the Illinois Abortion Law of 1975. Opponents of the bill said the legislation was unnecessary as the Illinois criminal code unequivocally prohibits killing children, and said that it posed a threat to abortion rights.
- Global Poverty & Nuclear Weapons: Global Poverty Act of 2007 “would commit the U.S. to spending 0.7 percent of Gross Domestic Product on foreign aid,” and basely describes Obama's views on nuclear weapons as an “antiwar, antimilitary posture that places him even further left than Senator George McGovern.”
- The divorce of Obama’s mother and father: Corsi baselessly suggests that Obama's father may have divorced his mother “following the prescripts of Islamic sharia law.” Corsi's sole source for this statement is a blogger who made the claim in a March 20 post, which featured the false headline, “BARACK HUSSEIN OBAMA WAS MUSLIM FOR 31 YEARS” and misstated Obama's mother's name. The blogger Corsi cited, “Majalah Bulanan Kumunitas Indonesia Di Edmonton,” provided no substantiation for the claim that “the senior Obama divorced Dunham according to Sharia law.”
- The dedication of Dreams of My Father: Corsi falsely claims that Obama did not dedicate Dreams from My Father to his mother or his grandparents. In fact he did.
- The birth of Obama's half-sister: Corsi falsely claims that Obama does not mention the birth of his half-sister, Maya Soetoro-Ng, during the chapter in Dreams in which he discusses his time living in Indonesia. She is in fact mentioned.
- Obama’s “childhood friend” Zulfin Adi: Corsi writes that in a March 16, 2007, Los Angeles Times article, “The newspaper quoted Zulfan Adi, who described himself as one of Obama's closest childhood friends” during his time in Indonesia. In fact, as Media Matters has noted, key aspects of the March 16 Los Angeles Times article were later challenged by the Chicago Tribune, which reported that Adi said he “was not certain” about his statements regarding Obama's childhood and that he “only knew Obama for a few months.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Drug use: Corsi falsely claims that Obama "has yet to answer questions" concerning whether "he stopped using marijuana and cocaine completely in college, or whether his drug use extended into his law school days or beyond." In fact, Obama wrote in Dreams that he "stopped getting high" shortly after moving to New York City to attend Columbia University as an undergraduate.
- Obama and City College of New York: Corsi falsely claims that Obama "does not mention in his autobiography" that after graduating from Columbia, he "was working as a community organizer out of the Harlem campus of the City College of New York." Again, Obama discusses this work in Dreams.
- Rezko and the Obamas' house: Discussing the house Barack and Michelle Obama bought in 2005, Corsi falsely cites a February 1 Salon.com article for the claim that convicted Chicago businessman Antoin Rezko "found the house for Obama. Salon.com reported that Donna Schwan of Metro Pro Realty, the real estate agent who listed the property, recalled the deal starting when Rezko expressed interest in the listing" [Page 165]. In fact, in the Salon.com article Corsi cites, Edward McClelland reported: "Asked who approached her about the house, Schwan told Salon, 'I honestly don't remember. Tony Rezko lived across the street, so he'd been interested in the lot.' " In an interview with the staff of the Chicago Sun-Times, Obama asserted that it was his wife who found the house.
- NewsMax, Obama, and Trinity Church: Corsi falsely claims that "NewsMax's Ronald Kessler reported that Obama had been in Trinity United Church of Christ on July 22 [2007], when Kessler was present," during which Obama's then-pastor, Rev. Jeremiah Wright, gave a sermon in which he "blamed the 'white arrogance' of America's Caucasian majority for the world's suffering, especially the oppression of blacks." In fact, Kessler did not report that he had been at Trinity United on that date. Kessler's March 16 Newsmax report cited an August 9, 2007, Newsmax.com article by "freelance reporter" Jim Davis and stated: "On July 22nd [2007] he [Davis] sat next to Barack Obama as Barack Obama heard some of these same statements from that very preacher [Wright] and was nodding along." While Corsi he did not note that, as reported by several media outlets, Obama was in Miami on July 22, 2007, speaking at the National Council of La Raza's (NCLR) annual convention.
- Capital Gains: Corsi writes that in a September 19, 2007, blog post, U.S. News & World Report money and politics blogger James Pethokoukis "pointed to the result of most Democratic plans to increase corporate taxes: the government ends up collecting less capital gains tax revenue, not more." However, as Media Matters has documented, numerous economists have challenged the assertion that cuts in the capital gains tax raise revenue in the long term. Additionally, Congress' Joint Committee on Taxation estimated in June 2006 that the 2006 extension of the 2003 cuts on capital gains taxes would result in decreased revenues of $20 billion over 10 years.
- Size of the military: Corsi falsely claims that Obama "has pledged to reduce the size of the military." Similarly, Corsi writes that "Obama will undoubtedly campaign in the general election saying he wants to maintain a strong military, just as he will say he is fully committed to the survival of Israel. Obama's problem is that neither position may be credible in the face of video clips that show him saying he wants to reduce the military, cut nuclear weapons, and pull out of Iraq" In fact, during the Democratic primary, Obama repeatedly asserted that he would "increase our ground forces by 65,000 soldiers and 27,000 Marines."
- Obama and Afghanistan: Discussing Obama's "antiwar ... foreign policy," Corsi conflates Iraq and Afghanistan to falsely suggest that Obama supports "de-escalat[ing]" troops from Afghanistan. But Obama's January 2007 bill -- the Iraq War De-escalation Act of 2007 -- establishes a timetable for the withdrawal of most troops from Iraq, and calls for "appropriate units of the Armed Forces" to be redeployed to Afghanistan and elsewhere in the region, as well as "elsewhere, to meet urgent United States security needs."

Subject: How we keep the momentum going

"So months and months ago, ProgressNow and its state affiliate started building grassroots networks, laying the groundwork for a Democratic campaign. Republicans don't have any counterpart to this, so far that is."

-- Peter Overby, NPR News, 10/30/2008

Dear Board, Investors and Progressive Partners,

The Obama campaign showed the world how to combine online activism with old-style community organizing.

Now it's up to progressives to put these tactics--and the millions of people who implemented them--to work at the local level, where activism has its most powerful and sustained impact.

We need to show what Obama's tactics can accomplish if they're deployed not to promote a candidate but on behalf of progressive values and issues.

As the only national organization with a focus on applying online organizing to local progressive campaigns, ProgressNow is in a unique position to capture and re-direct the passion of Obama's supporters and to show the world what progressives can get done using a mix of online and offline organizing. Below are updates from each of our states and their initial plans for the year ahead. Or click the following link for a multi-media overview of our success across the country, and support our efforts:

http://progressnow.org/network

We must act now. If we do not engage Obama supporters immediately, many will lose interest. The lesson from 2004 is that you must keep people vested. That we don't have a candidate horse-race or a looming election day makes issue-based advocacy all-the-more important.

We know the success of ProgressNow and netroots activism spawned by our members has caught the attention of the right-wing who have fallen behind in its use. And we know the right-wing is looking to modernize their tactics so they can attain similar success as our state partner organizations.

But in ProgressNow states we also know that we have built a network of year-round activists who grow, engage and set a progressive table for candidates in future years through new technologies.

When would be good time to follow up with you to discuss?

Until then all the best for a safe holiday and a happy, healthy New Year.

Michael

Here are updates and success stories in each of our states:

In the immediate aftermath of the passage of Prop 8 in California, the Courage Campaign launched a robust campaign to repeal Prop 8, joined by MoveOn.org, CREDO Mobile and Join the Impact. To date, over 300,000 people have signed our "Repeal Prop 8" pledge, increasing our total list size to nearly 400,000. In the last two weeks, we have hired three organizers to empower the marriage equality movement that has emerged in California since November 4. Right now, we are developing a training program to deploy these activists in a field campaign to restore marriage equality to California.

In 2009, the Courage Campaign will build a campaign to gather 1 million signatures to the "Repeal Prop 8" pledge, laying the foundation for an unpaid signature gathering campaign to place a new initiative on the ballot to restore marriage equality to California. The Courage Campaign is also working on implementing various planks of what we call "CPR for California" - a comprehensive group of reforms designed to fix California's dysfunctional government. At the top of the CPR agenda is the campaign to repeal the "2/3rds requirement" to pass a budget in the California state legislature - a rule that allows right-wing extremist Republicans to hold the state budget hostage year after year.

Time magazine reported in its post election coverage described how Senator-elect Mark Udall beat Bob Schaffer by exposing his record as "Big Oil Bob". Ironically, Udall never went after Schaffer as "Big Oil Bob". But we did. We started this narrative, through online videos, www.bigoilbob.com, and internet organizing throughout Colorado over a year before the elections. By exposing Schaffer's record and personalizing it to voters in each community we were able to develop a narrative that he never escaped. Just as exciting is our online and earned media efforts, working our progressive partners at Defenders of Wildlife, in holding Rep. Marilyn Musgrave accountable which ultimately help lead to her defeat and the victory of Congresswoman-elect Betsy Markey. Finally, out online ballot guide was a huge success as it was downloaded by over 35,000 thousand people. In addition we provided the ballot guide via text messaging for cellphone users, many of whom were young voters ages 18-24.

Our priorities for the year ahead are to help our progressive partners organizations online and with earned media to advocate for progressive legislation at the state and federal level. We are building off of Obamas's momentum by developing a model "Progress Team" program to keep Obama's "neighborhood teams" engaged, community by community, so we don't lose the energy of volunteers statewide. We are especially focused on getting members more engaged as our testing how shown that the more we can focus on populist pocket book issues and the less political our action appear the more new members engage. For a copy of our draft plan for the year ahead please email michael@progressnowaction.org We would love to discuss and get your feeback.

Progress Florida helped win Florida for President Elect Obama with an earned media and internet organizing strategy targeting independent voters. A highlight of the earned media strategy was the successful placement of a series of op-eds published in four of the state's largest papers. The series of op-eds included one by a war veteran taking McCain's voting record on veteran's issue to task, one by a nuclear security expert exposing McCain's flawed policies on nuclear power and for the Pièce de résistance - an op-ed authored by McCain's Florida cousin published in the Sunday St. Petersburg Times (Florida largest circulation paper.)

McCain's cousin's op-ed told a compelling story about how even members of McCain's own family could not recognize the McCain of old, and was reportedly one of the most e-mailed articles in St. Petersburg Times opinion page history. Progress Florida then worked with John McCain's Florida cousin to distribute a similar piece via the internet to tens of thousands of Floridians, in particular "fence sitters" the week before the election.

Progress Florida has identified three programmatic priorities for the first half of 2009 and beyond. First, work closely with our progressive allies to pass good laws and defeat bad ones during the upcoming Florida Legislative session. Expected hot issues include class size and education funding, election protection, and tax reform. Second, we plan to work closely with the HCAN coalition to pass meaningful health care reform this session of Congress. And finally, the work begins now on the 2010 elections. From the open U.S. Senate seat up for grabs to the effort pass a Constitutional amendment for redistricting reform (Fair Districts Florida,) success in 2010 will largely depend on laying the groundwork in 2009.

Progress Michigan had three major successes at the close of 2008. First we ran a robust anti-McCain effort that resulted in major national stories surrounding the GOP efforts to use foreclosure lists to suppress voter participation. Second, we played a major role in passing a Stem Cell ballot proposal by elevating its earned and new media efforts. Third Progress Michigan coordinated press work for major collaborative Health Care and Energy campaigns in the state involving over 50 organizations.

With redistricting looming in 2010, the next two years are critical. Progress Michigan is positioning itself as the progressive communication hub around populist issues that will help us control the issue environment in 2009 - 2010. Without control of the issue environment, progressives risk loosing all they gained this past year through redistricting. Progress Michigan will also expand its role in collaborative communications around Energy, Health Care and Election Reform.

Alliance for a Better Minnesota was in dozens of news stories and blog postings in November after it filed letters with the U.S. Senate Select Committee on Ethics and the Minneapolis office of the FBI asking both entities to investigate claims made in lawsuits filed that Senator Norm Coleman (R) was the recipient of money funneled by a rich businessman and friend through fake contracts.

Minnesota Governor Tim Pawlenty (R) was national co-chair of John McCain's presidential team and viewed by many as the future of the Republican party. Most observers expect him to run in 2010 for a third term before moving into the national spotlight again as a presidential candidate. Alliance for a Better Minnesota and its partners at the America Votes table are already planning for the best way to stop his rise into power, and keep Minnesota progressive for the future.

Sometimes what your enemies say about you speaks the most truth. In the days after the election in November, conservative Republicans were reeling as progressives in New Hampshire won all major Federal races including President, US Senate and both congressional; maintained majorities in all state offices - including becoming the first legislative body in the country with a female majority! - and beat back municipal tax caps in all towns save one, undermining the conservative get-out-the-vote tool in critical electoral areas. As conservatives in the state tried to understand the shift, the state's leading conservative blog highlighted the new progressive model that made victory possible: a model that focuses on state-based infrastructure, invests in capacity, builds outside the Democratic Party to empower issue-based advocacy, and cares more about results than credit. "We see parts of this here in NH," the blog wrote, " - one only has to look at Granite State Progress headed by Zandra Rice-Hawkins ...". This was not the only reference to GSP in the days following November 4th. In less than 5 months, Granite State Progress launched and played its role so well that it is being discussed as a model by NH conservatives. If imitation is the sincerest form of flattery, this ranks as Granite State Progress' crowning achievement of the year - oh, that and all of those progressive election results!

The successes in November only increase the urgency to set progressive policy that works for real people. Health care reform, clean energy policy and protecting the right of workers to form unions will be among Granite State Progress' strongest federal priorities in 2009. At the state level, Granite State Progress is helping cull a progressive communications strategy to tackle the upcoming State House session that will need to address solving the state's multi-million dollar deficit without endangering community priorities, improving the state retirement system, and adequately funding education in the state. And locally, we're already hard at work again, helping lead opposition to disastrous tax cap gimmicks that would reduce police and fire emergency response, and do real damage to our public schools.

Granite State Progress will also be launching two ongoing, aggressive campaigns to help improve public support for progressive policies. One, we'll be leading an effort to challenge conservative propaganda in our local media, thru research, persistence and - at times - campaign actions. Two, we'll start laying the groundwork now to expose the real record of Sen. Judd Gregg, with an aggressive media campaign that will run for nearly two years and involve multiple issue-based campaign partners.

New Mexico's biggest success was featuring real people, talking about real issues, on clearlynewmexico.com. We interviewed teachers, housing advocates, young people on the street and others on issues like the economy and health care. We then provided these names to other blogs and mainstream reporters and will continue to do so, building a bank of trustworthy surrogates to put out into the media.

ClearlyNewMexico.com has 3 big items for 2009. First, we are going to launch the "Pundit Project" to train 10 new pundits each year to enter New Mexico's thin pundit world. These 10 recruits will become the next generation of mainstream opinion columnists, talk show hosts and radio guests. Second, we are launching "ClearlyTV," which will be based loosely on the Veracifier on Talking Points Memo. We will air short, 2-4 minute news briefs several times a week through ClearlyTV. And third, we are ramping up our investigative research and journalism program to research and produce our own hard-hitting stories in New Mexico.

In two short years, Ohio has moved from red to purple to blue. As Ohio's premier communications Hub, ProgressOhio partnered with US Action in over 700,000 mail contacts with blue collar Ohio men; knocked on over 13,000 young voter doors with the League of Young Voters; provided public relations and online support to over 260 progressive groups; sent over 500,000 GOTV emails to registered Ohio voters; ranked in the top 2 among all Ohio political blogs (including newspapers); and reached over 7.8 million pages of progressive material read online.

ProgressOhio is focused for 2009 on continued list growth; increasing membership involvement offline; renewing the Progressive Legislative agenda with a new progressive Ohio House majority; and pushing for Health Care reform and economic assistance at the national level.

Keystone Progress opened its doors in August of 2008 and hit the ground running. KP was the driving force in the national stories around the racism and vitriol at McCain and Palin rallies. Our videos of McCain/Palin supporters were used by major network and cable news organizations around the country and around the world, exposing the racism at the core of much of the base of support for the GOP. Our videos also got incredible online exposure, being seen by over 2.5 million viewers. KPalso organized rallies at more than a dozen McCain/Palin events in Pennsylvania. Over 5,000 people came to those events, which generated dozens of local news stories in Pennsylvania.

Keystone Progress plans to expand its organizing in 2009 so that it is a known and respected organization across Pennsylvania. We currently have around 35,000 people on our email base. We hope to expand that to 100,000 in the coming year by organizing local committees in 40 of Pennsylvania's 67 counties. These local committees will be ad hoc grassroots organizations made up of our local activists and leaders in other local progressive organizations such as labor unions locals, and local chapters of our statewide partners. We will also build our statewide issue advisory committee into a functioning body to guide our issue-based organizing.

Fuse Washington executed an extensive earned media campaign that broke and continued the story of the Republican candidate for governor's involvement in a fundraising scandal. Our campaign generated more than 550 stories, including over 300 TV news clips; 5 front page, above the fold stories; more than 175 articles and extensive radio and blog coverage.

Fuse also produced the Progressive Voters Guide, compiling the endorsements of and distributed by 18 of Washington's leading progressive political organizations. The Guide covered 190 races, providing one-stop shopping for a highly informed recommendation about the entire ballot. The Guide was distributed to more than 200,000 voters.

In 2009, Fuse will continue to strengthen its organizing and communications capacity while focusing on strategic advocacy campaigns targeting critical progressive issues before the legislature and the voters. Our top priority issues for the Legislative session will be managing the budget crisis, adopting global warming reforms, and campaign finance reforms aimed at preventing business trade associations from skimming workers compensation funds to finance political campaigns. In the fall we will be active in important local races, and expect several high profile ballot measures (including a vote on new revenue sources aimed at helping mitigate the budget crisis).
Our organizing priorities include working to help keep the new activists created by the Obama campaign engaged in politics, and to develop stronger offline performance and volunteer leadership in our activist base.

Our communications priorities - in addition to executing effective communications plans for our priority campaigns -- include developing a clearer and more defined brand for Fuse, expanding our use of new media tools, and developing a broader and richer range of services for the people on our list.

One Wisconsin Now helped lead a collective research and innovative earned media strategy which included staving off efforts by the Republican Attorney General and John McCain campaign cochair to disenfranchise as many as 1 million legal voters. In WI, Obama won by 422,000 votes, a vulnerable congressiona freshman won reelection a conservative district and Democrats took control of the full control of the state legislature and hold that and the governor's office for the first time in a generation.

OWN is focusing on judicial ethics, the state budget and growing communication capacity in progressive non-profits. In addition to proving coalition partners with news, information and talking points during the state budget process, OWN's c3 partner will be spearheading a comprensive Communciations Capacity Building Project, including extensive communication and on-line analysis and personalized training to ensure progressive groups can effectively communicate with membersm donors, the media and the public. While this. Will be an expensive project, the CCBP will be provided to groups for free. In just one year, OWN grew its online member list by 1,000 percent and is launching the Wisconsin Research Project - a first of its kind instate, continuous progressive research program for use with issue polling and earned and paid issue advocacy.

Moreover, my impression is she wants a much stronger response. Which means engaging more on details that we have to date not found in our interest to do so.

Just wanted to update folks.

Main Topics: Unqualified to be CEO, fundamentals are strong, troopergate, McCain's homes

Summary of Shift: Carly Fiorina's declaration that neither of the candidates for whom she is spokeswoman are qualified for CEO positions was a major subject of roundtables and political coverage tonight. Two pundits on MSNBC's Hardball suggested she would be 'under the bus' as soon as the end of the night. McCain's suggestion that a commission, in lieu of specific action, would be necessary for the economic meltdown received some degree of mockery and scrutiny, as did Holtz-Eakin's suggestion that McCain is, in some way, responsible for the PDA or Blackberry.

Workers continue to clean up after Ike. FDA bans several generic drugs. A chemical, BPA found in plastic bottles and elsewhere has been linked to severe health problems.

She took Hewlett-Packard's stock price down […] something like 60%, fired 18,000 people, she said, 'I only regret I hadn't fired more people faster,' she sold computers to the Iranian regime, the terrorists in Iran and she says that even McCain or Barack or Biden or Palin are unqualified to do her job? She was unqualified to do her job! She's a disaster for the republicans. […] idiot's the wrong word, Tucker. She's an incompetent.'

Highlight #1
Fiorina Explains Herself (FNC 09/16/08 3:30pm)
SHEP SMITH: Can you confirm the Palin meeting at the UN with heads of state?

CARLY FIORINA: No I cannot. I don't have anything to announce and I am not aware of what her particular schedule is.

SMITH: Well the Wall St. Journal's reporting it and if we get more on it we'll let our viewers know. Did make sense that you would know that, but you're more of an economic person and these are heady economic times.

FIORINA: Yes they are.

SMITH: On the table night right now, the collapse of AIG, the largest insurer of all the world, that house on a lot of loans and house on a lot of insurance agencies and insurance policies for Americans, it could collapse Wall St, according to many in the know. […] Would you advise Senator McCain to support a government bridge loan to support AIG or would you advise against such a thing?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

FIORINA: Well he's been clear this morning that he does not support taxpayer money used to bail out AIG. I think its clear there's a lot of discussion going on on Wall St. right now to try to find the right set of loans to help AIG and we'll have to see how that turns out.

SMITH: I think they'd argue that a bailout is one thing and a bridge loan is another. It seems to be a bridge loan that seems to be on the table, a short-term loan of about $75 billion dollars. Would you advise for or against that?

FIORINA: Well I think a bridge loan is certainly important. What's not clear is whether that ought to be government and tax payer money. You know there are a lot of Wall St. firms that depend very much on their relationships with AIG.

SMITH: But that private money is off the table now we're told and its up to the government or nothing. Would you advise that the government do it or nobody do it.

FIORINA: Well I'm not sure private money is off the table. You know if you listen to a lot of these Wall St. organizations, they don't talk about the failure of AIG would be so terrible for the markets, if they believe its so terrible, they ought to put some money up to prevent it from happening.

SMITH: And if they do not is it up to the government to do it?

FIORINA: You know what, I think we need to see how this plays out for a little bit before I start making pronouncements on television. What I think John McCain's been very clear about is that this whole situation demonstrates the requirement, the absolute requirement for reform of regulation, for more transparency on Wall St, for the ultimate reform of Fannie and Freddie, and that's what he's going to be focused on when he becomes President of the United States.

SMITH: You were with Andrea Mitchell on NBC a little earlier and you said Barack Obama […].

FIORINA: […] Look different experiences prepare you for different jobs. Sarah Palin and John McCain are uniquely experienced to be the President and Vice President of the United States, Barack Obama is the least qualified candidate running today in terms of his executive experience, in terms of his time in public office, so I think the Obama campaign would do very well to stop hurling the experience argument around because their candidate for President has less than anyone else running for office right now on these two tickets. […] I'm sure that John McCain and Sarah Palin, who are very fast learners, could gain enough business experience quickly to run a major corporation. But that's not the point. The point is it's a fallacy to compare a corporation to the country. This is after all America, where our leaders make a number of incredibly important decisions but are not focused on the profitability of products and are not focused on a balance sheet, they are totally different responsibilities.

Romney Answers to CEO Qualification and Fundamentals (MSNBC 09/15/08 5:02pm)
CHRIS MATTHEWS: Governor, people vote their pocketbooks, why should they vote republican this year?

MITT ROMNEY: Well, I don't think they're going to vote republican or democrat. I think they're going to vote McCain or Obama and these guys have their own views about how to strengthen the economy. The economy is the number one issue.

Barack Obama is going to have to back off of his pledge to start spending more money on service projects and health care and raising taxes that would kill the economy. John McCain is right to get the tax rate down. He's right to it try to stimulate growth of our economic sector; he's also right to drill for more oil, use nuclear power so we send less money outside of the economy. McCain is right on the economy, Barack Obama is wrong.

MATTHEWS: Is he right when he says 'the fundamentals of our economy are strong' and what do you mean by that when you hear that?

ROMNEY: What he's referring to, of course, is the underlying productivity of the American work force, the innovative spirit of perk. Those tinges are of course the envy of the world. Right now our economy is in real trouble, and a lot of people are really suffering. John McCain is very concerned about foreclosures and, of course, the fact that a lot of people's 401ks lost a lot of value today. fort noolt, an uptick today. John McCain wants to make sure we stop the bleeding in investment accounts and in homes and turn this economy around, biltd more jobs and see the kind of growth that people in this country expect.

MATTHEWS: But, if you look at the word "fundamentals," I'm looking at the jobless rate at 6.1, it was 4.2 five years ago. It's going up this season, this cycle. You've got 400,000 people in foreclosure. You look at housing sector, the jobs sector. Where is it healthy? Where is the fundamentals good in this economy? What part of the economy is doing well?

ROMNEY: Well, right now the economy is really suffering. That's what John McCain indicated. He's pointing out that the long-term prospects for our economy can be more positive if we build on pt productivity, the innovative spirit and the capacity of the American worker.

MATTHEWS: Sure, but that's not a meaningful statement. You can always say that about the American people. You can always say our workers are the best in the world. The problem is, you can say the people at Lehman Brothers are the best in the world. The problem is we have a financial crisis on our hands. Do you have confidence of in this administration, the republican administration, right now in power to fix this problem?

ROMNEY: Well, right now let's make sure we talk about fixing problems on a bipartisan basis. I think people in America are tired of the finger pointing and assessing blame. I look at this financial crisis. I see the fed made mistakes. I see the administration did, congress did, the market did. a lot of people did. Let's stop worrying about republican or democrat.

Let's fix it and the administration is doing its very best to shore up enterprises that, if they failed, could have a systemic effect but say, hey, we'll let the bubble bursting play out in other places where we don't want to step in and help shareholders out and John McCain has a plan, frankly, to get this economy going again by holding down taxes, by trading with other nations and by stopping this insane use of so much foreign oil.

MATTHEWS: […] Let me ask you about Carly Fiorina, the former CEO of Hewlett-Packard. She said none of the candidates for president or vice president are capable of being a CEO of any major American company. […] Did she just step if a puddle? I mean, what did she mean by that?

The government of the United States is 1.the 8 million workers. you have to run war policy, fiscal policy being you have appoint the supreme court, oversee all the cabinet agencies of the federal government, all the agencies independent and other under your report. how can she say being CEO of the United States is not up to the level of running a business? What does she mean?

ROMNEY: You know I'm not quite sure to tell you the truth. Having been a governor and the CEO of a state, I know it's real tough to run a state effectively, and I know it's tough to also be a CEO. Both are very tough jobs, and I believe that John McCain, with 25 years of experience in the senate, and Sarah Palin actually having run a city and a state have the experience it takes to run the government and they have the experience it takes to run a company. I'd be happy to hire them.

Pfotenhauer Slams Obama, Praises McCain (MSNBC 09/16/08 6:45pm)
DAVID GREGORY: Let me start with something you heard earlier on the program from former treasury secretary, Larry Summers who said rather pointedly that John McCain is a Johnny-come-lately when it comes to understanding some of the real problems both in the economy and specifically what's been happening on Wall Street.

NANCY PFOTENHAUER: Well, I just fundamentally disagree with Larry Summers—not the first time, probably not the last time but definitely disagree with him and whether you talk about the Freddie and Fannie mess, whether you talk about basic anti-corruption and whether you talk about pursuing what the free market needs, and what we need right now to bring jobs and economic growth, John McCain has been out there. That's why his economic plan is designed to be a job creation plan, not a redistribution approach, which is more Obama's and unfortunately, that's a job killer.

So it's a bad path for the economy to follow. So I think Senator McCain has been a leader on these issues and he's got the record to prove it.

GREGORY: There are obviously, problems about—questions about the policy of deregulation is the current, what is behind the financial crisis right now [sic]. Here's what The New York Times wrote about McCain's record of Wall Street Regulation. […] Can you cite an example where, since the sub prime lending came on the scene, that John McCain actually advocated specific regulation on the invest many banks?

PFOTENHAUER: […] I don't know if they've applied that same lens to Senator Obama. We obviously frequently disagree with The New York Times, but Senator McCain has very consistently called for strong, consistent, stable regulation and not the patchwork quilt that we've got and that's just the problem, as you're aware, David. There's this—I can name, at least, five off the top of my head. There are probably seven different government agencies that are supposed to have oversight and actually there's overlapping in some areas and gaps in others and that's just the problem.

GREGORY: But you say you disagree The New York Times. Are there specific areas where Senator McCain has taken issue with that patchwork of regulation on this particular issue, regulating investment banks and how overleveraged they were with some of these sub prime products and lending products.

PFOTENHAUER: Well, I can't go back mentally right now through every speech he's ever given, but, for example, I can remember once in 2002 where he talked about problems like this and he laid out a whole protocol. It was actually a very—it showed a tremendous foresight where he said, 'Look. We've got to have careful regulation balance. We don't want bureaucracy but careful regulation,' but he specifically pointed out the potential problems and the pit falls that we were facing, particularly with corporate abuse and the fact that, without oversight, these things occur and that oversight is an important part of making sure the consumers are protected.

GREGORY: […] Should there be specific capital requirements for the investment banks like there are for commercial institutions?

PFOTENHAUER: I think that's a natural place to start. There is a whole list of them. […] obviously, you've got the problem that really nobody has been minding the store on investment banks and there just has to be certain basic things that make sense, put in place. Then needs to be consistency. So that similar financial instruments, […] institutions, things that perform virtually the same role, should be treated the same from a regulatory perspective and all of that should be very transparent and there should be increased accountable.

GREGORY: Let me switch gears and talk about Governor Sarah Palin. There are now numerous conservative columnists who are making the argument that she is simply not prepared to be vice president, to be a heartbeat away from the presidency. Today conservative columnist, David Brooks of the Times argues that experience matters, and that Sarah Palin may not have it. […] Does she have the required preparedness for office?

PFOTENHAUER: I think without question. In fact, as I've said before, Governor Palin—the bottom of our ticket is more experienced, has more executive ability, and has a better record of reform than the top of the democratic ticket. So any type of comparison like that—Sarah Palin is more qualified than Barack Obama. which is why I think, it's a huge mistake for their campaign to push the experience line because the American people, when they look at the accomplishments of Sarah Palin, compared to the tissue paper thin resume of Barack Obama […].

GREGORY: Beyond the rhetoric, Nancy […] her views and her record, her record of preparedness, her views of the government, view of the world, those have not been tested on the campaign trail, as has Senator Obama's. That's a true statement.

PFOTENHAUER: Oh my goodness. Senator Obama's basically, all we've got is a bunch of speeches with senator Obama and, David you know that. He's been in the senate for what? like three years. He's been running for president for two.

I'm sorry. Running for president doesn't make you qualified for being president. The guy has never shown a willingness to buck his party leadership. His list of achievements, his bipartisan achievements are voice votes and things that passed 96-2. He never took on the entrenched interests and his own party in order to get the right thing done. Senator McCain's done that and so has Governor Palin.

Pfotenhauer Touts McCain's Economic Aptitude (FNC 09/16/08 5:23pm)
HEATHER NAUERT: What would Senator McCain do to turn the economy around?

NANCY PFOTENHAUER: Well, first of all, he's going to lower taxes on capital formation, which is job creation. Every time you hear that you should think about job creation. He's going to keep our taxes low, and he's also going to offer middle class tax relief. So he's going to lower the burden of government if you will, and he's going to decrease and limit the tax payer funded party that's been going on here in DC for so many years. So he's going to keep taxes low, spending low, open-forcefully open exports markets so that we have places to sell our goods. 95% of our customers live outside our borders. So it's a recipe for success and it's been proven to be so when we tried it in the 80's or the 90's or even its been tried in other countries like Ireland or New Zealand about ten years ago. So this is the way you get prosperity, this is the way you create jobs, and that's what John McCain's going to do.

NAUERT: Okay one thing Senator McCain talked about today is naming a commission, put together a commission to figure out how we got to this place in the first place. And the Obama camp is saying that's just passing the buck, that's what Washington does.

PFOTENHAUER: I find it ironic that Obama's talking about passing the buck. This is a guy who voted present over 130 times in the Illinois State Senate because he didn't want to take a stand on controversial issues and has done virtually nothing that involved ever challenging his own leadership here in Washington. What Senator McCain recognized is that the only way we're going to get real change here is if we have a bipartisan independent group look at what's gone on and make those recommendations to Congress in a thumbs up, thumbs down situation. That's what its going to take.

And Barack Obama I noticed was criticizing the 9-11 commission today when it wasn't his idea. He certainly approved of the 9-11 commission in the past and almost in the same breath, within the same speech, he called for an advisory group. So I thought that was pretty ironic- especially since there's what you called for already exists, the President has an advisory group. It's called the Working Group and it has the CFTC, the SEC, the Fed, Treasury, and private advisers. So that, what he called for, his solutions, already exists and didn't prevent the crisis from occurring.

NAUERT: How would simplifying mortgages work? John McCain has talked about that, explain that.

PFOTENHAUER: Well first of all your earlier question was absolutely on the money if you will, in that one of the problems that happened here is that instru-loans developed. There were loan products developed that dissociated risk from return, so you had people being offered zero interest loans, no money down. It just totally divorced the people taking out the loans from the lending risk and that's a real problem that should not happen and Senator McCain called that one months ago. In fact, years ago when he asked for Freddie and Fannie in 2003 and 2005.

Giuliani and McCain's 9/11 Commission for the Economy (FNC 09/16/08 7:15pm)
RUDY GIULIANI: The reality is we have a – the strongest economy in the world – there are a lot of problems with it.

SHEP SMITH: He said yesterday the economy's in crisis.

GIULIANI: And it is in crisis. But you can - we've got a world problem that we have to deal with and we have significant problems in our economy. I think the best way to describe our economy, you have to have a single word answer rather than fundamentally strong or whatever, is we have a resilient economy. But, having said that, I mean this is still the world's leading economy, under a lot of stress, with a lot of problems. Seems to me you attack it in a positive way, not a negative way. You don't run it down, which is what I think Senator McCain was trying to convey. I also think today he put out a far more specific approach to what do about the economy than Senator Biden did. All Senator Biden did was spend the entire day attacking him.

SMITH: You prosecuted Michael Milken back in the day. Would it be your advise that there's somebody to prosecute here and now?

GIULIANI: I can't say that. I think the idea of a commission is a very good idea though.

SMITH: But calling it a 9/11 commission seemed to get away with him this morning.

GIULIANI: Well I think the Obama campaign has descended into criticize everything that John McCain says. Even if you said it yourself. Senator Obama was in favor a commission to work out his health care plan, to work on the Democratic primary; he's recommended commissions for very big issues, very small issues. All of the sudden Senator McCain recommends a commission, which makes a lot of sense, I mean one of the things Senator said I said myself today, which is a lot of these transactions were transactions people didn't really understand. We've got to get to the bottom of what happened in order to fix it. That includes to find out whether people are criminally responsible for this. There may be there may not be. It should be done in a deliberate way.

Romney Defends McCain's Economic Credentials; Says McCain Has Plan But Won't State It (CNN 09/16/08)
MITT ROMNEY: Yeah it's a bubble's bust, and they always bust, and the housing market got way too overheated with very low interest rates and then mortgages handed out like they were candy and housing prices got up and up and up and speculators moved in and that's finally now readjusting and it's doing so with a lot of pain for a lot of people. […] There's so much blame that could be assessed, you could say Wall St. made mistakes, the S&P they oversea, the rating agencies made mistakes, Congress made mistakes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

They have oversight committees that look at these various areas and also on the administration […] the question is what's the right thing to strengthen the economy – John McCain has the answer, Barack Obama doesn't. […] Well of course we're going to have to study the regulatory structure on Wall St. to make sure these kinds of bubbles are identified before they become a crisis proportion and that's going to take study. But the immediate action that has to be taken is to keep taxes down to allowed our trade with other nations to continue and to get ourselves off our dependence on foreign oil by drilling for more oil, using nuclear and also using coal, and on those issues, Barack Obama's going to have to reverse course. He can't raise taxes now. He can't add more spending programs. He can't cut off trade. And he just can't say we're not going to be able to use nuclear and offshore drilling. […] Look I campaigned with-against John McCain on the issue of the economy and with regards to the fundamentals of America's economy, what he's referring to is the innovative capacity of America, the ability of our American workers, and the productivity levels in this country. Those fundamental elements. But John McCain has been saying for a long time the economy's in real trouble […]

Romney Discourages Blame Game; Let Capitalism 'Work its Magic' Instead (FNC 09/16/08 4:20pm)
NEIL CAVUTO: Governor, what do you make of this rhetoric? It's pretty tough on almost all capitalists, it sounds like.

MITT ROMNEY: […] I think, at a time like this, people are really concerned about what will happen to the future of our economic system and a lot of people pointing in different directions […]. There was blame in congress. There was blame in the administration. Look, there's blame at the fed. There is blame at the rating agencies. There's blame for the investors.

Nobody could escape blame in a setting like this, but you know we can stop the discussion about who's to blame and talk about how we're going to make things better and, in this case, I think it's time for Barack Obama to say he's gonna put a hold on any proposals for massive new programs and he's also gonna put a hold on the idea of raising taxes. Raising taxes and increasing federal spending right now is exactly the wrong way to go. He has got to say no to the tax hike. A tax hike right now would be devastating.

CAVUTO: Governor, do you worry, though—I know it's campaign season; I know it's rhetoric and I know it's populist-sounding and maybe someone has figured, in a focus group, that's the way to resonate with voters, but there has been more bashing [of] the fat cats, more bashing of the corporations, more bashing of profits—this is on the part of the republican team. I am just wondering what is going on, here.

ROMNEY: Well, the free enterprise system in capitalism is one of the things that propelled our economy to be the powerhouse that it is globally despite the enormous troubles it's going through right now and our long-term outlook can be positive but certainly we're going to rely on the entrepreneurship of the American people, the risk-taking and capitalism, to work its magic and to employ people and to make things the way we would like it to be for kids and grandkids. I know it's tempting to point fingers, but I would rather point in a direction we would like to go and get this economy going again, like—

CAVUTO: At least you are pointing in a direction and not just an arbitrary finger in the air, but let me ask you, governor: Wall Street was up today on a day the Federal Reserve kinda said 'No' to a lot of stock-traders' demands for a rate cut. 48 hours after the treasury said no to a bailout of Lehman Brothers we're getting sort of twin acts of tough love on the part of Uncle Sam. What do you make of that?

ROMNEY: Well, I think what's happening is the Federal Reserve and the Treasury; they're making a careful assessment of what kind of systemic action might occur or consequences might occur based on the failure of a company like Lehman and where they see massive consequences they're going to step in and try to protect the American public with shareholder support or, excuse me, with taxpayer support, but where they see limited consequence or limited systemic effect they are probably not going to step in and that's—that kind of measured approach I think is being well received by people who are making an informed assessment of the—

CAVUTO: Yeah, but you know what I wonder, governor, why they didn't do this before, if they were so afraid about appearing to have a ring around their nose and being led by the markets and not ticking 'em off, and you know this from your Bank Capital days, obviously when you came in to fix up a company and some of the medicine might be tough […], but they would look favorably if it turned out okay […] is the message now that—maybe that is the message, that tough love ultimately earns you more tough respect than easy money.

ROMNEY: Well, if people are acting out of the interest of the economy and the American people, I think you're gonna find that Wall Street generally recognizes and appreciates that, but, if you see instead people bailing companies out to try and help shareholders, they're gonna find that negative—even if they are in the marketplace 'cause they they want to make sure that the people leading our country economically are doing what is right for the economy, long-term.

O'Callaghan Vouches for Palin's Honesty (CNN 09/16/08 3:15pm)

RICK SANCHEZ: Welcome back. I'm Rick Sanchez here in the World Headquarters of CNN. "Newsweek" investigator Michael Isikoff just broke down for us the probe in Alaska, which he's been looking into, Alaska Governor Sarah Palin's dismissal of a state public safety commissioner for reasons having to do with her ex-brother-in-law. So say some of the investigators in this case, has not been proven. Now we are going to get on a McCain/Palin's take on this. Campaign spokesman Ed O'Callaghan is joining us from Anchorage, Alaska. Hey, Ed, thanks so much for being with us. We certainly appreciate it.

ED O'CALLAGHAN: All right.

SANCHEZ: Let me read to you something that is coming to us right now. This is from somebody on our Facebook that we put out. We asked them to start a discussion on this, as we are doing the newscast. This one says that -- it's from Curtis Ross (ph). He says: "Look, I really feel like she should not be allowed not to cooperate and not be harassed about this. It just does not need -- help her too much in the whole truth-telling thing." So, basically, here you have somebody saying, if an American doesn't want to cooperate, they don't have to. Is that your take?

O'CALLAGHAN: No. Governor Palin very much wants to cooperate. She wants to cooperate with an investigation, however, that is fair and impartial, and not directed by Obama supporters here in Anchorage. And that place for that inquiry to happen is before the personnel board. There is a personnel board inquiry that was initiated in August. And, under Alaska law, personnel board is the appropriate forum to inquire about any allegations of ethical breaches. And so there is an investigation pending there. It is an impartial, independent investigation. And Governor Palin is very much interested in allowing that investigation to go forward and cooperating with fully with it. She wants to be an open book in that investigation, so that there is a serious search for the truth as to what happened with the replacement of Commissioner Monegan. That is really the question here.

SANCHEZ: Let me ask you...

O'CALLAGHAN: So, the question is -- yes, sir, Rick.

SANCHEZ: I just have to ask you a question, because you just raised a very important point. You said that it is the Obama camp that is actually directing this. What proof do you have that the Obama camp is in any way directing this? What contact has there been between the Obama camp and the folks in Alaska who are directing this investigation? Please share it with us.

O'CALLAGHAN: Well, yes, Rick. Thank you. In the legislative council investigation, that investigation is actually being run by, as was revealed in a committee hearing on Friday, two senators that are well-known Obama supporters here. In fact, they are pictured on the Obama Web site as campaign spokes -- not spokesmen, but campaign supporters of Obama. That is Senator Elton and Senator French. That's the investigative council that is going on. Those were the gentlemen that chose the special investigator, Steven Branchflower. There are a number of conflicts between Steven Branchflower and Senator Elton. And all of that has led to a partisan inquiry that has already had a prejudgment as to the conclusion. The public statements of these gentlemen have said that the Republicans could expect an October surprise at the end of this inquiry. That implicates the national election. And, once that happens, this is no longer an independent inquiry, which is what was originally allowed, but a partisan affair with a predetermined judgment. The appropriate method to do here is to bring it to the personnel board, impartial. There is an investigator already appointed. There's a filing made yesterday which shows through e-mails from the governor's own office that what really is at the bottom of this affair is Commissioner Monegan's budgetary disputes during a time he was the commissioner of public safety here in Alaska. He challenged the governor at every turn. And the governor exercised her executive authority to replace him with someone who she thought would be more in line with her budgetary priorities.

SANCHEZ: What would be the harm in just going ahead? If she really does have absolutely nothing to hide in an investigation, what would be the harm in going ahead and answering their questions? Even if they are people who don't like her, but like Obama, as you stated is the case with Senators Elton and Senator French, how could they possibly harm her if there is no -- if there is nothing that has been done wrong?

O'CALLAGHAN: The concern is that they -- Senator French has already stated publicly that they have already reached their conclusion. And their conclusion is that it will not be good for the governor, is what he said. So, the concern there is that they have already reached their conclusion. Here, we have a personnel board inquiry that is going on. No judgments have been made. They have maintained the integrity of the investigation, which, as a former prosecutors, I can say, is the most important thing that an independent investigator wants to do, is to maintain the integrity of the investigation. Through the public statements of Senator French and what was revealed at the hearing on Friday, which was that Senator French was actually directing which witnesses the investigator, Branchflower, was going to try to interview, that shows that it is no longer an independent investigation, that is a partisan affair that is being directed by Democrats that are on record as being ardent supporters of Obama.

O'CALLAGHAN: That is not the appropriate forum. I'm sorry. There is a little bit of feedback out here in lovely Anchorage.

SANCHEZ: I know it is always difficult when we do these satellite transmissions, so I will try and just ask the question and then hear you out on it. Do you have any information that would lead any reasonable people to believe that there is direct contact between either Barack Obama, himself, or Barack Obama's campaign and Senators Elton and French?

O'CALLAGHAN: Well, actually, CNN reported several weeks ago that the Obama campaign contacted a gentleman that is the head of the police union here. That is important, because that gentleman, John Cyr, also represents Commissioner Monegan in a personnel board filing that he made against the governor, implicitly recognizing that the personnel board is the appropriate jurisdiction for this inquiry. I don't mean to get too technical...

O'CALLAGHAN: ... on you, but that is what they have done.

SANCHEZ: Yes, but that's not the senator's, though, right?

SANCHEZ: But you mentioned French and Elton. Is there anything that ties Obama's people to French and Elton, though, since you said they're the ones...

SANCHEZ: Go ahead.

O'CALLAGHAN: Go ahead, Rick. John Cyr, as CNN reported, was contacted by the Obama campaign. And John Cyr is associated with Senator French, because they have shared some budgetary priorities together. I would say, actually, a good question would be to ask Senator Elton whether -- and Senator French whether the Obama campaign has contacted them.

SANCHEZ: I guarantee you that we will do just that after this conversation.

Let me ask you a question. Can you say for -- can you explain to us, if this thing were resolved and let's say that they got an independent prosecutor in this case, and you felt that they were more fair, would she then likely cooperate with this investigation?

O'CALLAGHAN: Governor Palin has said that she will cooperate with a fair, just investigation. That is in the personnel board. They, in fact, made filings before the personnel board yesterday indicating her full intent to cooperate. She wants to cooperate with an investigation that going to have a search for the truth here, because we know she is an open book here, and, at the end of the day, what a fair and impartial investigator will find, Rick, is that the governor did nothing wrong here.

SANCHEZ: But are Elton and French the fly in the ointment here for you? Is that what you are saying, get rid of them, and you cooperate with the investigation? Are you saying that?

O'CALLAGHAN: We are cooperating with the investigation that has the appropriate jurisdiction, the personnel board.

SANCHEZ: OK.

O'CALLAGHAN: We certainly agree that Elton and French are no longer impartial and are not interested in conducting a fair and impartial investigation.

SANCHEZ: So, just one more time, for the record, as it stands right now, and as this investigation stands, Sarah Palin is likely not to cooperate? Is that correct?

O'CALLAGHAN: Sarah Palin is 100 percent going to cooperate with the personnel board inquiry that is the appropriate jurisdiction and where this inquiry should lie.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SANCHEZ: But not the legislative inquiry?

O'CALLAGHAN: Well, we have to see how that transpires. The legislative inquiry, they have certain moves that they can make, too, I believe. And what we want to do is make sure it is fair and impartial. We have had absolutely no indication over the last several weeks that this is going to be a fair and impartial inquiry in the legislative council.

SANCHEZ: But, one more time, as it stands right now, she will not cooperate with the legislative inquiry? Is that correct?

O'CALLAGHAN: If the legislative inquiry asks Governor Palin of certain things, I am sure that Governor Palin's attorney would consider those requests. However, the personnel board is the appropriate inquiry. And Governor Palin is an open book with respect to that fair and impartial hearing.

Do the McCain Camp's Recent Claims Pass the Honesty Test? (CNN 09/16/08 2:45pm)
RICK SANCHEZ: OK. We look into this and we asked, what is Joe Biden actually talking about? What is he complaining about? Here is CNN's Randi Kaye now taking a look at that.

RANDI KAYE: Call it what you will, mistruths, half-truths, stretching the truth, telling the truth. Whatever it is, it has Democrats and Republicans questioning what is going on inside of the McCain campaign. Their opponents have gone so far as to say that John McCain and Sarah Palin are lying their way into the White House, claims that the campaign brushes off.

TUCKER BOUNDS: I think that those who say that John McCain and Governor Palin are lying about anything in this campaign need to pay closer attention to our advertisements and the record of the candidate that we are running against.

KAYE: Make no mistake, the Obama campaign has also been accused of mistruths along the way, like telling voters that McCain wanted to spend 100 years in Iraq. McCain actually said troops should stay in noncombat roles for as long as it takes, not that he wanted 100 years of war.

NARRATOR: He is running the sleaziest ads ever, truly vile, dishonest sneers...

KAYE: McCain stands by his ads, he told the ladies from "The View."

JOY BEHAR: We know that those two ads are untrue. They are lies. And yet you, at the end of it, say I approve these messages. Do you really approve them?

KAYE: Did Obama want to teach sex education to kindergartners? Not really. The program in question was intended to teach kids how to avoid sexual predators, says the non-partisan group, factcheck.org .

VIVECA NOVAK: What he wanted to do was increase the range of some sex form of education, K-12. But the kind of thing he was interested in having kids at a young age learn about was inappropriate sexual advances that might be made against them.

KAYE: The campaign's response?

BOUNDS: Our ads are based on honesty and truth and a true reflection of Barack Obama's record.

KAYE: But what about Sarah Palin? On the campaign trail she keeps hammering home one point, I told Congress, thanks, but no thanks to that infamous Bridge to Nowhere. But that's not true. Congress had already killed the project.

NOVAL: She never said no thanks, Congress.

KAYE (on camera): Opposing the bridge plays into a bigger theme of the McCain campaign, that Sarah Palin is the perfect crusader to help McCain rid Washington of its addiction earmarks and wasteful pork barrel spending.

KAYE: The truth -- Governor Palin has cut Alaska's earmark requests in half. But this year alone, the state asked for $197 million.

NOVAK: She says that she vetoed a lot of legislation that would have called for earmarks. But that doesn't get rid of the fact that she actually did ask for earmarks for the state of Alaska.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

KAYE: On energy policy, Palin said Alaska provides 20 percent of the energy produced in the U.S. Is that true? No. The U.S. Energy Information Administration says it's 3.35 percent.

NOVAK: It's a big deal because Sarah Palin and John McCain have been claiming that Palin is an expert on energy in the United States, because Alaska has a good bit of oil. But the figures she's citing are simply wrong.

KAYE: And what about Palin's international credentials? The extent of her travels abroad?

BOUNDS: The Alaska National Guard has confirmed, just like we had confirmed at the campaign, that she has traveled abroad. She went to Kuwait, she entered Iraq. She underwent and presided over a ceremony. So here we are trying to bat down something that was completely true, 100 percent accurate.

KAYE: Apparently not. We checked with the Army National Guard and they told us that they are 100 percent sure Palin never made it past the Iraq/Kuwait checkpoint, that she never entered Iraq. And her trip to Ireland, originally billed by the campaign as visit to a foreign country, campaign spokeswoman Maria Comella says, it was a refueling stop. Some Republicans are uneasy. Bush White House strategist Karl Rove on Fox News Sunday, criticized both the McCain and Obama campaigns.

KARL ROVE,: McCain has gone in some of his ads, similarly gone one step too far and sort of attributing to Obama, things that are, you know, beyond the 100 percent truth test. Both campaigns ought to be careful about that.

KAYE: Still, political expert Larry Sabato, says mistruths can work well with the party base, which is conditioned to believe the campaign.

LARRY SABATO: A smear campaign can succeed. If it's completely outrageous and it's completely contrary to the facts, then probably the truth will catch up with it before the end of the campaign. But if the unfairnesses or the mischaracterizations are subtle enough, then the campaign will probably succeed.

KAYE: Randi Kaye, CNN, Anchorage, Alaska.

Liberals Defend Protesters at One of McCain's Many Properties (FNC 09/16/08 4:25pm)
NEIL CAVUTO: These people today protesting outside McCain's condo in northern Virginia. They're asking McCain to take folks in who are losing their homes to foreclosure. McCain's place is a few miles from the district. Tons of other politicians and a lot of Democrats live nearby as well, so why pick on McCain? Let's ask two of those demonstrators. Chris Chaith and Christy Huntaman are with Change2Win (Change to win) Um, jump all here but Chris to you first, why McCain's place?

CHRISTY HUNTAMAN: To be honest, it just made sense. He's got extra homes. We have people who have none.

CAVUTO: A lot of folks seem to have extra homes, in fact, big homes. So I just want to know and just to get a sense, Chris Chaif, why this one? Why not Biden, I mean he has a compound down in Delaware, couple of homes on the compound – I think we have that – why didn't you go down there?

CHRIS CHAIF: Well I think because Joe Biden has a record that stands strong with America's working families and the middle class, and he has a record that he's proven that he's standing with us. I think for John McCain, we wanted to make this issue personal and very real and very direct.

CAVUTO: So John McCain's done nothing in his past that's for working folks?

CHAIF: Well let's just look at this record, 26 years he's voted against the minimum wage 19 times, today he defined the soundness of the American economy around his support for American workers, where was he over those 26 years voting against the minimum wage? […] Look I think at the end of the day we have a candidate running for President who in March blamed homeowners for the foreclosure crisis, then claimed he was for deregulation, now he's saying that he believes we need to have a commission to look into the problem.

CAVUTO: Christy, do you think there is some culpability on Barack Obama's part too, that he envisioned an aggressive lending policy to reach out to minorities and those who couldn't qualify and shouldn't qualify for loans, getting loans backfire. And that he had a hand in that? […] Whatever happened to personal responsibility?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CHRISTY HUNTAMAN: You know I can speak for where I'm from in Ohio, I can tell you that people got into these mortgages with the best intentions. They wanted the American dream And what they got was very different, they got screwed. Gas prices went up, everything else went up, and so when everything went up… […]

Begala Attacks McCain on Fundamentals of Economy Issue (CNN 09/16/08 5:00pm)
PAUL BEGAL: A lot of Democrats have their panties in a wad, we're all nervous, they need to stop whining and start fighting – the way that Obama and Biden are doing. And I have to say, the key to this has been John McCain and I want to publicly thank him. Senator McCain, thank you again for being so clueless on the economy. I'm trying to think of a bigger Presidential gaffe – Carville and I were just talking on the phone – than John McCain, in the midst of an economic melt down, saying the economy is fundamentally strong.

No, John McCain is fundamentally wrong. And this is the biggest gift he could have given Barack Obama. Obama to his credit is pouncing on it. […] And you know what McCain said today – I hope the viewers at home are sitting down – he called for a commission. Whew! There's change. A blue ribbon panel? Maybe a task force, ooh maybe a study? How clueless can you get? […]

In point of fact, Barack Obama's proposed tax cuts for 95% of Americans and small businesses he placed that to generate economic growth. But this is not what McCain says – when he wants to look at for example Terry talks about deregulation, one of the reasons we're in this mess is that Phil Gramm, a banking lobbyist who used to be a Senator, who's very close to Barack- John McCain put a loophole in the law that deregulated these Wall St. instruments that have caused so much of the problem. […] But if you want change, not commissions, chump change, then you gotta be for Obama, he's the only hope for change, he's put out quite a specific program.

Ministers Hold Marathon Meetings on Possibility of PA Collapse

The diplomatic-security cabinet held marathon discussions over the last two days about the possibility that the Palestinian Authority will collapse and how Israel would deal with such a development, according to three sources who either attended the meetings or were briefed on them. Several ministers argued that the PA's collapse could serve Israel's interests, so Israel shouldn't try to prevent it.

Ya'alon: I Don't Know When the Terror Will Stop

Defense Minister Moshe Ya'alon (Likud) spoke on Friday morning and said he can't anticipate when the Arab terror wave plaguing Israel will end. "We have a wave of terror that will accompany us in the coming days and apparently in the coming weeks, and we don't know if it will end soon or when," said Ya'alon of the terror wave, which has already left 22 Israelis murdered and hundreds others wounded in two months.

Netanyahu: No Plans to Arm PA Security Forces

Israel is not planning to approve arms for the Palestinian Authority's (PA) security forces or any other "gesture" to the PA, including the release of terrorists, sources close to Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu told Arutz Sheva on Wednesday evening. The clarification came following reports that the IDF had issued a recommendation to the political echelon that the PA security forces be given armored vehicles, weapons and ammunition so as to let them enter terror hotbeds that they are more familiar with than the IDF.

Six Soldiers Hurt in Car-Ramming During West Bank Protest

Six IDF soldiers were wounded in a second car-ramming attack Friday in the West Bank. The attack took place during an altercation between IDF forces and Palestinian demonstrators at the entrance to the village of Beit Ummar in the southern West Bank, north of Hebron. While soldiers held back the demonstrators to protect Route 60, the main north-south road that passes nearby, they were caught by surprise by a Palestinian vehicle that raced toward them and slammed into them. Four of the wounded were lightly hurt with wounds to their extremities. One was moderately hurt. A sixth was lightly hurt and refused to be evacuated to hospital. Two of the wounded were officers.

IDF Chief of Staff Flies Secretly to Brussels to Meet US General

IDF Chief of Staff Lt. Gen. Gadi Eisenkot flew secretly to Brussels this week for talks on the Continent's security situation, according to a security source. Eisenkot met with America's top general in Europe, Gen. Philip M. Breedlove, to discuss the current situation in the Middle East, the source said. Detailed information on what was discussed in Eisenkot's meetings has been withheld. However, as Breedlove functions as both the head of America's military presence in Europe, as well as the head of NATO, it is safe to assume that both the ongoing threats of terror in Europe and the conflicts in the Middle East, including the developing Russia-Turkey feud, were discussed.

Israel to Establish Formal Presence in Abu Dhabi

The Foreign Ministry confirmed a Ha'aretz report Friday that Israel will in the coming weeks open an office in Abu Dhabi accredited to the International Renewable Energy Agency (IRENA). According to the report, also confirmed by the ministry, Foreign Ministry Director-General Dore Gold was in the United Arab Emirates capital this week taking part in IRENA's biannual meeting and also discussing the opening of the Israeli mission. While in the past Israel has had trade delegations in Qatar, Oman, Morocco and Tunisia, this would be the first time Israel would have any formal presence in the UAE.

IAF Official: Israel Won't Down Russian Warplane In Its Airspace

Israel will not take action against Russian fighter jets that encroach into its air space, a senior air force official said on Thursday. The issue of Russian sorties in Syria was magnified in recent days after Turkey downed a Su-24 fighter jet that it claims entered its air space near the border. According to Israeli military officials, such a scenario is not in danger of repeating itself in the skies over the Golan Heights. "The Russian military is a new, key player which we are not ignoring," a senior military official told reporters on Thursday. "There is a clear boundary here, and they are busy with their matters, and we are busy with ours."

Israel Holds First Successful Test for Barak 8 Missile

Israel held the first operational test for the Barak 8 missile defense system on Thursday afternoon, successfully destroying an enemy target. The system is to serve as protection against sophisticated missiles held by Hezbollah, like the Russian-built Yakhont (P-800 Oniks) - an advanced cruise missile system that Russia sold Syria. Such missiles, the defense establishment believes, can paralyze Israel's coast by targeting not only Israeli ships, but also its natural gas fields. The Barak 8 system can be deployed on at sea or on land and was designed to destroy threats from the air such as drones, fighter jets, missiles, and rockets, including in the event of multiple simultaneous launches.

Ma'ariv – November 26, 2015

Resistance Movement

By Ben Caspit

In the past few weeks, a powerful collision has been taking place behind the scenes of our political-security-diplomatic theater between two conflicting worldviews. Two opposing forces are vying for leadership. The old, traditional, pragmatic and non-inflammatory force against the new, reactionary, feisty and battle-hungry force. This is a complex and volatile story, with significant political, social and security aspects. It reflects the radicalization process that is taking place in the world, the region, Israeli society, and consequently, on the political map as well. We can also see it as a reflection of the general fulmination that is washing over all of us. The balance of power still leans towards the old world, but the new forces are fresh, kicking and threatening. This battle has not been decided.

The levelheaded and responsible approach is embodied most accurately by Defense Minister Moshe (Bugi) Yaalon. He receives halfhearted and erratic backing from Prime Minister Netanyahu. The third and surprising minister who stands with the two of them like a brick wall is Shas Chairman Aryeh Deri. Anyone who remembers how Deri helped Yitzhak Shamir rein in the eagerness of then-defense minister Moshe Arens, deputy chief of staff Ehud Barak and IAF commander Avihu Ben-Nun to bomb Iraq in the first Gulf War against the American urging, is not surprised. Twenty five years have passed, and Deri has not changed.

This Bibi-Bugi-Deri triumvirate is on the same side of the fence as the security establishment, and especially the IDF. On the other side, the rebels stand defiantly: They are the security cabinet ministers of the Jewish Home, Naftali Bennett and Ayelet Shaked, Minister Gilad Erdan and other security cabinet ministers from the Likud such as Zeev Elkin. They wink to their activists, wink to their registered members and wink to the hardline right wing Likud grassroots, for whom life is simple: We have to hit the Arabs with full force, and then everything will be fine.

There was a hint of this battle in the past few weeks. This week it came to light, following a briefing to military affairs correspondents from OC Central Command Maj. Gen. Roni Numa. OC Central Command Numa, the sovereign in the territories, spoke candidly and from the heart. Between the lines, it was possible to discern the outline of the differences of opinion between the opposing worldviews. It was also possible to get a sense of the heavy pressure being brought to bear on the IDF by political figures, pressure that is currently being fended off bodily by top army and security officials.

The IDF refers to the current wave of terrorism as a "limited uprising" and realizes that dealing forcibly with despairing young people will not provide a solution. The army believes that [Israel] should act in the opposite manner: it should increase the number of work permits, not apply a heavy hand to the population, and try not to add the massive majority of the Palestinian public to the extremist minority that has declared a rebellion.

Anyone who remembers the second Intifada can see that the IDF is currently learning its lessons. In 2001 it was revealed in this column, for the first time, that the IDF fired over 1 million bullets in October 2000 in order to eradicate the violence that broke out after Ariel Sharon's visit to the Temple Mount. These million bullets had the opposite effect. The Palestinians were routed by the trained army, and then they attacked our cities and neighborhoods in a great mass of suicide bombers.

It seems to me that Defense Minister Yaalon knows this story best, because he was the deputy chief of staff when the second Intifada broke out. Before that, he was OC Central Command and prepared the IDF for the Intifada. The IDF was never as prepared as it was then, in 2000. The first months of the Intifada ended in a resounding Israeli knockout. The problem was that instead of the Palestinians calming down and backing down, they became even more extreme and crazy, until Israel was forced to retake the West Bank and clean out terrorism from one house to the next. This took years and cost a great many fatalities on both sides.

Now, mainly in light of the fact that the current uprising is not yet a popular uprising and has not swept the great majority of the Palestinian public, the army believes that [Israel] should be cautious, handle the situation with a sensitive hand, reward quiet areas, not push the civilians into the arms of terror, carefully safeguard the security cooperation with the PA security services, hold a large stick in one hand and an equally large carrot in the other.

IDF officials are emphatically opposed to the measures proposed by the right wing branch of the political echelon, such as expelling families, mass arrests, imposing wholesale closures and blockades and collective punishment. The IDF's position is a result of a careful study of the current events, in-depth research and experience that has accumulated in the field. To cool, not to heat, IDF officials say. Pour cold water, not gasoline. To be bad to the bad guys, and good to the good guys. That is the whole story.

The knock-out blow gang

The other side is also not a bunch of suckers. The right wing camp, led by Bennett, Shaked, Erdan, Elkin and others, is not certain that the IDF's security doctrine is delivering the goods. Their claim is not without merit.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The "pilot" they are talking about is what happened in East Jerusalem. Since the city is not under the control of the IDF, but rather handled by the police, a firm hand and a strong arm were applied there. This is the approach led by Erdan, with the precise implementation of Cmdr. Bentzi Sao, who will go down in history as the almost sole survivor of the generation of police commanders who dissipated into the offices of the Police Internal Investigations Department within two years. These ministers say that the firm hand that was employed in East Jerusalem achieved its goal. The fact is that the Temple Mount became calm and the city is gradually calming.

The police went in with full force, say the members of this camp, it restricted the population's actions, it set up dozens of roadblocks, it employed Ruger fire, it carried out arrests on a vast scale, it exacted a high tangible price, and the situation on the ground became calm. This, as far as the right wing camp is concerned, is empirical proof.

We can add to this the outlawing of the northern chapter of the Islamic Movement, an historic event in which a police intelligence assessment overrode a GSS recommendation, under the leadership of Gilad Erdan. The jury is still out on this initiative. It's too soon to tell.

Conversely, some people say that signs of unbalance are evident in the right wing branch of the Israeli leadership. That the security cabinet has lost its brakes. That a group of young, borderline infantile ministers sits there, who are behaving childishly and seeking a "knock-out blow." There is no knock-out blow in this story, say the people leading the pragmatic approach. That would be playing with fire. Force has its limitations. There is no reason to get into a second Operation Defensive Shield, there is no one to attack in such an operation, because the results of the first Operation Defensive Shield are still in effect. The IDF controls the entire territory and does what it wants in any casbah at any given moment.

Mistake, reply the opponents, if the IDF employs in Judea and Samaria the same scale of incursions into villages, arrests, restrictions on movement and firm action that was employed in East Jerusalem, there will be results. The policy of containment and weakness must end. There is a boss on the ground, and he has to go crazy. This wave of terrorism is evolving from stones and firecrackers to knives, from there to vehicle ramming attacks, and from there to shooting, and who knows where else. It has to be stopped with full force now, before it grows. Sometimes a disproportionate response can lead to immediate results. Like a fire in an oil well. Only an explosion will put it out.

This battle also includes secondary debates within the security establishment. For example, the GSS's approach versus the IDF's approach. Yoram Cohen versus Gadi Eisenkot. There is no personal rivalry between them, incidentally. On the contrary. The working relations are good and the professional esteem is mutual. But the worldviews are completely opposed. The GSS is opposed, automatically, traditionally, in a Pavlovian response, to all recommendations for relief measures presented by the army. The GSS care about not having a terror attack tomorrow morning, period. They have no overall picture, they have no broader front. The IDF looks at the overall situation, at the broader front, not only at tomorrow morning but also at the day after, next week, in two years' time.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The GSS tries to hem in the [relief] measures while the IDF, with the powerful backing of Coordinator of Government Activities in the Territories Maj. Gen. Yoav Mordechai, tries to be more expansive. The political echelon has its hand on the tap. At the moment, Netanyahu, Deri and Yaalon still set the tone, in the sane and lenient direction. One or two severe terror attacks, and that too shall pass.

Why Kerry Should Have Skipped His Stop in Israel

By Akiva Eldar

If the Nov. 24 visit by US Secretary of State John Kerry to Jerusalem is to be judged by its contribution to advancing a diplomatic deal between Israel and the Palestinians, then Israeli news editors were right to push this non-event to the tail end of the news broadcasts and the back pages of the papers. The stories about the young women who were allegedly sexually harassed by Knesset member Yinon Magal (HaBayit HaYehudi) are far more newsworthy and interesting than another meaningless signature by Kerry on the attendance sheet at the prime minister's office.

The affair is a reminder that even in the religious HaBayit HaYehudi party — the standard bearer of "family values" — there are those who neglect to obey the seventh commandment, "Thou shalt not commit adultery" (Exodus 20:14). Even the scandal de jour involving Oren Hazan , the contemptible Knesset member (Likud) who, metaphorically, runs red lights and doesn't even stop to let a wheelchair pass, is more relevant to Israel's citizens and the residents of the occupied territories. Hazan's sleazy, victorious smiles are a reminder of the flimsy foundations propping up the Israeli government.

But Kerry's visit should not be judged by its usefulness to the diplomatic process, and not even by its contribution to preventing further deterioration of Israeli-Palestinian ties . The importance of this visit lies in the additional proof it provides of the impotence of the world's strongest power. This visit belongs in the lengthy annals of US initiatives that intensified the sense of despair and hopelessness among the Israeli and Palestinian peace camps regarding the diplomatic option. In the words of Brig. Gen. Guy Goldstein, deputy coordinator of Israeli Government Activities in the Territories, "Absent combined diplomatic steps by Israel and the Palestinian Authority [PA], the current clash will not end."

Speaking on Oct. 28 at a conference at Netanya Academic College, the senior military officer added, "We are sitting on top of a kind of powder keg. Unless significant change occurs, mostly or entirely in the diplomatic arena, we will probably keep experiencing what we're experiencing today." His comments, the likes of which are being made behind closed doors by many defense officials, can be summed up in these words: Every piece of evidence pointing to the lack of significant change, such as another futile visit by an American secretary of state, pumps additional fuel to the fire burning under the powder keg.

Briefing reporters in Abu Dhabi on the eve of his stop in Israel, Kerry said, "We have ideas for how things could advance. But this street violence doesn't provide any leader with the framework within which they could look their people in the eye and say, 'There's a reason we're sitting down and talking.'" It is hard to overstate the importance of this sentence, spoken by the most important diplomat in the world. The US secretary of state replaced the message that peace is the right answer to violence, with words to the effect that violence delays peace. In fact, he supported the approach presented by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu the following day at the start of their meeting, according to whom "there can be no peace when we have an onslaught of terror — not here or not anywhere else in the world."

Kerry, for his part, stressed that "there's no justification for Palestinian terror attacks against Israelis." Indeed, there's no justification for the murder of parents in front of their children, or for stabbing people walking down the street in towns such as Kiryat Gat. But Kerry "forgot" to say that there's no justification for the continuing occupation and for denying basic human rights to millions of Palestinians. He thus buttressed Netanyahu's argument that there's no difference between a 13-year-old Palestinian who stabbed a Jew in the settlement of Givat Ze'ev and a terrorist who fired indiscriminately at those sitting in a Paris cafe. All of them, Netanyahu told Kerry, are victims of "that same assault by militant Islamists and forces of terror."

There was good reason for Netanyahu to greet Kerry with the words, "You are a friend in our common efforts to restore stability, security and peace." The "stability" to which Netanyahu referred is acceptance of the status quo in the relationship between occupier and occupied. The "security" is the supply of additional state-of-the-art fighter jets to Israel. And there's no point wasting time talking about joint "peace" efforts. The prime minister is actually trying to put together a package deal that would include US recognition of areas dubbed "settlement blocs" and agreement to construction in those areas. In return, Israel would grant building permits to Palestinians in West Bank Area C, which is under Israeli civil and security control, and additional "goodwill gestures" to strengthen the standing of the PA.

It almost goes without saying that there was no way the United States would sign off on such a deal. One can assume that Netanyahu himself assessed that the United States would not provide a stamp of approval to what it considers an uncontrollable criminal enterprise. The prime minister surely did not believe that Israel would throw the Palestinians a few bones and US President Barack Obama would become the first president to change the fundamental US policy on the settlements, in force since June 1967. And, in fact, Deputy State Department spokesman Mark Toner made it abundantly clear in a Nov. 24 briefing that the answer to Netanyahu's demand was "a big no." The spokesman took the opportunity to remind Israelis that Democratic and Republican administrations alike view the construction in the settlements and Israeli attempts to create facts on the ground as moves undermining the two-state solution.

It seems that even if Obama were to come to Israel to lay the cornerstone for a new neighborhood in one of the settlements of the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Etzion settlement bloc, this deal would not have been consummated. Netanyahu informed Kerry that any measures supporting the PA would depend on a drastic reduction of violence and incitement by the PA. But even if he were to truly understand the connection between Palestinian violence and Palestinian despair, it is highly doubtful that Netanyahu would succeed in making any sort of gesture toward the PA.

Even a mere decision to temporarily freeze construction in illegal outposts would dump him into political oblivion. His political survival depends on Hazan's whims and Magal's voting mood, not to mention his rival on the right, HaBayit HaYehudi party leader Naftali Bennett. "Bibi [Netanyahu] spoke abroad about a unilateral move," Bennett boasted to party activists, "and he retracted his remarks only because I put a bullet between his eyes." Afterward, the minister tasked with the education of the children of Israel explained that of course, these violent words were just a metaphor.

As long as Obama is not prepared to treat Netanyahu with the same determination and decisiveness as Bennett in order to make him overcome his recalcitrance on taking serious diplomatic steps, he would do well to leave Kerry home.

President Obama and Secretary Kerry have been persistent and determined in pursuit of this goal, building on a decade of bipartisan pressure and diplomacy. Getting the rest of the way to a final deal by June won't be easy, but it is absolutely crucial. I know well that the devil is always in the details in this kind of negotiation. So I strongly support President Obama and Secretary Kerry's efforts between now and June to reach a final deal that verifiably cuts off all of Iran's paths to a nuclear weapon, imposes an intrusive inspection program with no sites off limits, extends breakout time, and spells out clear and overwhelming consequences for violations. The onus is on Iran and the bar must be set high. It is also vital that our efforts to deny Iran a nuclear weapon be part of a comprehensive strategy to check its regional ambitions, defend our allies and partners, and reinforce American leadership in the Middle East. There is much to do and much more to say in the months ahead, but for now diplomacy deserves a chance to succeed.

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: "Biden takes shot at Clintons in SC"

By Cameron Joseph

May 10, 2014, 10:03 a.m. EDT

Vice President Joe Biden gave a closed-door speech Friday to South Carolina Democrats that included a shot at the Clintons.

Biden, a potential 2016 candidate, said the unraveling of middle-class financial security began in "the later years of the Clinton administration," not under George W. Bush.

One attendee told CNN he gave an "Elizabeth Warren-type speech" blasting income inequality.

Biden has been moving to the left as he prepares for a possible primary against former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, though many Democrats don't think he'd run against her.

Multiple sources described the 30 minute speech as "populist" and high-energy, according to CNN. He did not, however, mention his own presidential ambitions.

"He said we have some of the most productive workers in the world, but corporations are more concerned about their stockholders than they are about their employees," one attendee said. "He talked about how the fruits of labor go to stockholders, rather than to the people who are producing it. That the people making the money in this country are the corporations."

Another attendee described it as "a stem-winding, almost revival-type speech."

In recent months, the vice president has focused on revving up the liberal base on issues of income inequality. He delivered a lengthy attack on Rep. Paul Ryan's (R-Wis.) budget at George Washington University in late April.

But his rare rebuke of the Clintons' economic policies, which some liberals view as too friendly to Wall Street, indicates how he'd possibly approach a 2016 campaign if he and Clinton square off in a primary.

AP: "Chelsea Clinton to Receive Doctorate from Oxford"

By Ken Thomas

May 9, 2014, 6:23 p.m. EDT

Former President Bill Clinton and former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton are in Oxford, England, this weekend to attend the graduation ceremonies of their daughter, Chelsea.

Chelsea Clinton will receive her doctorate degree in international relations on Saturday from the prestigious British university. Her father was a Rhodes scholar at Oxford from 1968 to 1970.

The graduation ceremony comes as her mother is considering a potential 2016 presidential campaign.

The 34-year-old Clinton is reaching a number of milestones this year. In addition to her doctorate, Clinton and her husband, Marc Mezvinsky, are expecting their first child in the fall. And she has taken a more public role at her family's Bill, Hillary and Chelsea Clinton Foundation, where she serves as vice chairwoman.

If her mother runs for president, the younger Clinton could be an asset in connecting with younger voters and members of her generation.

A longtime advocate for public health, Clinton has played an active role in developing policies at the foundation to address childhood obesity, HIV and AIDS, and childhood diarrhea around the globe.

During an appearance at the annual South by Southwest festival in March, Clinton noted that more than 750,000 children die around the world every year because of severe dehydration due to diarrhea, an issue her family's foundation hopes to address.

"We have to do whatever we can to ensure that no child dies of diarrhea," she said.

Clinton's dissertation examines international global governance structures with a focus on global health. At the foundation, she has worked closely with the Alliance for a Healthier Generation and the Clinton Health Matters Initiative.

The younger Clinton, a special correspondent for NBC News, is a graduate of Stanford University and holds master's degrees from Oxford and Columbia University's Mailman School of Public Health.

During an appearance on ABC's "Jimmy Kimmel Live!" in April, the former president noted that once his daughter receives her doctorate, she will have four degrees.

"She'll have as many as her parents do — combined," Bill Clinton said. "When she was younger, the way all kids are, she thought she knew more than I did about everything. But alas, in my dotage, it turned out to be true!"

New York Times: "Clintons to Meet With Foundation's Big Donors Next Month"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Amy Chozick

May 9, 2014

The most generous donors to the Bill, Hillary & Chelsea Clinton Foundation will convene on June 6 at the Goldman Sachs headquarters in Lower Manhattan for a daylong event to discuss the family's philanthropy with the Clintons themselves.

The event, which is held annually, will include a morning talk and lunch with the Clintons and their daughter, who as vice chairwoman of the foundation her father started has taken on a leadership role. Later, Mr. Clinton and his daughter will join donors for dinner at Birreria, the chef Mario Batali's rooftop restaurant in the Flatiron district of Manhattan.

"Our annual briefing assembles the foundation's program leadership and major supporters to reflect on our progress and to consider strategies and priorities for the year ahead," Dennis Cheng, the Clinton Foundation's chief development officer, wrote in an email to donors.

Ms. Clinton and her parents have held fund-raisers throughout the country in the past year to build up the foundation's endowment. In addition to the scheduled events, Ms. Clinton and her husband, Marc Mezvinsky, are expected to join her father in a high-stakes poker game to raise money for the family's philanthropic organization, whose wide-ranging work includes projects in America's inner cities as well as in African villages.

The typically low-key donor briefing is likely to attract more attention this year as Mrs. Clinton contemplates a run for president in 2016. Many of the foundation's major supporters are also the Clintons' most devoted political donors. Mr. Cheng, who is overseeing the event, served as a finance director for Mrs. Clinton's presidential campaign in 2008.

Steve Bing, a Hollywood producer; the media mogul Haim Saban; and the hedge fund billionaire Marc Lasry have given generously to the Clintons' political campaigns and their philanthropic causes. The foundation also receives millions of dollars in support from overseas donors who are barred from contributing to United States political campaigns, including Frank Giustra, a Canadian businessman, and Victor Pinchuk, a Ukrainian steel magnate.

The Clinton Foundation has used the Goldman Sachs auditorium for the event before, but the location underscores that Mrs. Clinton is undeterred by criticism from the progressive wing of the Democratic Party that she is too close to the financial industry.

In his new book, "Stress Test: Reflections on Financial Crises," Timothy F. Geithner, the former Treasury secretary, describes a conversation with Mr. Clinton about how Mr. Geithner could improve his standing with economic populists.

"You could take Lloyd Blankfein into a dark alley," Mr. Clinton said, referring to the chief executive of Goldman Sachs, "and slit his throat, and it would satisfy them for about two days. Then the blood lust would rise again."

Politico: "Hillary Clinton's no good, very bad week"

By Maggie Haberman

May 10, 2014, 7:04 a.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton isn't a candidate for president, at least not yet. But this week felt like she was very much in the 2016 grind.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

One day, she was weighing in on gun control, Obamacare and social inequality. The next she was taking heat over Benghazi and facing questions about whether as Secretary of State she went too easy on the group behind the kidnap of Nigerian girls.

Then there was Monica Lewinsky, reviving the scandals of 1998.

It was arguably the roughest week Clinton has had since she left the State Department early last year, highlighting the tensions between the past and the future that will inevitably come to a head if she runs.

Lynne Cheney, the wife of the former vice president, picked up the Lewinsky story quickly, telling Fox News host Bill O'Reilly: "I really wonder if this isn't an effort on the Clintons' part to get that story out of the way." It was a sentiment some other hosts on the network echoed.

Lewinsky resurfaced with a Vanity Fair essay she penned about her difficult last decade, detailing her inability to find a job and her feelings about what she insisted was a "consensual" relationship with former President Bill Clinton. She faulted Hillary Clinton for engaging in a "blame-the-woman" mentality by dubbing her a "narcissistic loony toon" to the former first lady's late confidant, Diane Blair.

Clinton and her aides have not commented on the essay, which resulted in a flood of news coverage of a scandal that took place in 1998, providing who didn't live through it with a crash course. Clinton supporters approached the topic gingerly in private conversations, and wouldn't go near it for the record.

For Republicans who've been invoking the Lewinsky scandal as a character question about the Clintons ahead of the presidential race, the essay was a welcome development. For the Clintons, it most certainly wasn't. There's nothing new to say about the Lewinsky scandal itself; the newness for Clinton's critics is in trying to tether it to her presidential aspirations.

As pictures of Lewinsky posing for Vanity Fair went viral, Republicans were busy ramping up a select committee to investigate Benghazi. The House panel, created in an almost straight party-line vote, ensures the controversy surrounding the 2012 attack will continue as Clinton's new book about her tenure as Secretary of State hits book stores next month.

The issue generates heat among the Republican base, although it's not clear that the general public is engaged on it. House Democrats have been split over whether they should participate in an exercise that their leadership has already dismissed as a partisan farce. But they're also worried about giving Republicans running room if they stay away.

Clinton officials say there's been no formal interaction with House Democrats about what their strategy should be; House Speaker Nancy Pelosi has appeared to be adamant about having some of her members have sway over the panel's scope of activities.

The head of the committee has not said whether he will try to subpoena Clinton. Democrats expect blowback on Republicans for what they say is a gross overreach, and anticipate their base rallying around Clinton. But for Clinton, occupying the familiar space of partisan icon is at odds with the post-partisan message she's been projecting in her recent speeches.

Clinton addressed the Benghazi committee briefly at an event in New York City on Wednesday, sounding somewhat dismissive as she said she felt everything had been answered from her end already.

"That's their choice and I do not believe there is any reason for it to continue in this way, but they get to call the shots in Congress," Clinton said of Republicans who called for the hearing.

As if all that weren't enough, Clinton found herself on the receiving end of questions about the kidnap of 300 Nigerian girls. The Daily Beast reported that Clinton's State Department declined entreaties from congressional Republicans and others to label Boko Haram, the group responsible for the kidnappings, a terrorist organization. Secretary of State John Kerry gave the group that designation last year.

Outside of Benghazi, which has dominated discussion of Clinton's State Department tenure, the Boko Haram issue is the first prominent example of her record being scrutinized in the heightened political atmosphere that now surrounds her.

During Clinton's time at State, "The FBI, the CIA, and the Justice Department really wanted Boko Haram designated, they wanted the authorities that would provide to go after them, and they voiced that repeatedly to elected officials," the Beast quoted a former senior U.S. official familiar with the discussion as saying.

Republicans have widely circulated the original Daily Beast story. The actual details of why the Clinton-run Department declined to affix the group with terrorist status are complicated – her former Assistant Secretary for African Affairs, Johnnie Carson, was reportedly concerned about elevating the group among extremist outfits, and potentially giving the Nigerian government latitude to go after them in an inhumane way.

But those explanations won't end up being spliced into a 30-second political ad. And the story gives Republicans another chance to stoke doubts about her leadership at State.

It's the question of Lewinsky that remains the most personally painful and politically unclear for Clinton. Potential GOP presidential hopeful Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) has been openly critical of Bill Clinton over the scandal, at a moment when Republicans are trying to counteract the Democrats' edge with female voters.

Clinton allies like Media Matters founder David Brock have slammed Republicans for resurrecting the ghosts of the past to do the potential candidate harm now. It's a perspective a number of Clinton backers have offered.

Next week, Hillary Clinton will rejoin the political force next week in earnest by hosting a fundraiser for her son-in-law's mother, Marjorie Margolies, a Pennsylvania congressional candidate.

But as she takes clear steps toward her political future, the echoes of the old days are making the most noise right now.

Talking Points Memo: "Rand Paul: Benghazi Has 'Precluded' Hillary From Being President"

By Dylan Scott

May 9, 2014, 3:37 p.m. EDT

Sen. Rand Paul (R-KY) took another shot at Hillary Clinton over Benghazi on Friday, saying she had "precluded herself" from being President because of how she handled the attack and its aftermath.

Paul made the remarks at the Republican National Committee's spring meeting in Memphis, Tenn.

"The thing is, this is about judgment," Paul said. "And we're talking about, should we as a country have a commander-in-chief who didn't provide adequate security in Libya, didn't send reinforcements and then gave us nothing but spin?"

"My opinion is that Hillary Clinton has precluded herself from ever being considered for that position," he concluded to loud cheers from the crowd.

Paul has already said the House select committee on Benghazi should "absolutely" subpoena Clinton.

Correct The Record, the pro-Hillary rapid response group, offered a response to Paul's comments.

“Rand Paul should be ashamed of playing partisan politics with this tragedy. Secretary Clinton took immediate action to prevent this from happening again,” Adrienne Watson, its deputy communications director, said in a statement to TPM. "This is no secret; it’s public record. Is Rand Paul so focused on partisan gamesmanship he’s lost sight of the facts, or is he willfully playing politics with a tragedy?"

Politico blog: Dylan Byers on Media: “Besieged Beverly Hills Hotel taps former Clinton aide for damage control”

By Dylan Byers

May 9, 2014, 9:44 p.m. EDT

The Beverly Hills Hotel, besieged by celebrity protests and City Council action over its owners’ decision to institute new laws against women and homosexuals in Brunei, has tapped a former Clinton aide to run damage control, POLITICO has learned.

Mark Fabiani, who became infamous for his aggressive, rapid-response strategy during the Clinton administration, was hired this week to oversee crisis management. His business partner Chris Lehane, another former Clinton aide, is not involved with the project.

Both Fabiani and Lehane declined to comment.

The Beverly Hills Hotel has been the target of high-profile protests by members of its celebrity clientele ever since its owner, the Sultan of Brunei, imposed regulations based on Islamic law penalizing homosexuality and adultery. Punishment for such acts can be as severe as death by stoning.

Celebrities such as Jay Leno and Ellen DeGeneres have called for a boycott of the high-end hotel. Earlier this week, the Beverly Hills City Council approved a resolution urging the sultan to give up ownership of the hotel.

Fabiani and Lehane were once dubbed the “masters of disaster” for their aggressive approach to press relations during the Clinton administration. They are also credited with drafting the “right-wing conspiracy” memo that then-First Lady Hillary Clinton referenced in a 1998 interview.

Fabiani and Lehane launched the California-based crisis management firm Fabiani & Lehane in the early 2000s after working on Al Gore’s failed presidential bid. Fabiani also has his own LLC, through which he is representing the Beverly Hills Hotel.

How Would McCain Mediate A Russia-Georgia Conflict?

Russia's invasion of Georgia today raises some questions about how a McCain administration might deal with a crisis like this.

McCain's main foreign policy adviser and spokesperson, Randy Scheunemann , is a former registered lobbyist for the Republic of Georgia. Back in April, in an interview with Radio Free Europe, Scheunemann took a strongly pro-Georgia anti-Russia line, insisting that the United States should move forward with missile defense in Poland and the Czech Republic, as well as supporting the NATO membership of Ukraine and Georgia, regardless of the negative consequences that these policies would likely have for U.S.-Russia relations.

Given McCain's provocative statements regarding Russia, it's clear that he shares Scheunemann's hardline views on the subject. As we wrote last month, this has troubling implications for the prospect of Russia's essential cooperation in dealing with the Iranian nuclear program. But is also raises the question of how a McCain administration — staffed by committed Georgian partisans like Randy Scheunemann — could conceivably be seen as an honest broker for dealing with the growing crisis between Russia and Georgia?

Subject: FW: Parking the Big Money by Cass R. Sunstein (NY Review of Books - Jan 14, 2016 issue)

This is a review of a book by Gabriel Zucman (with a foreword by Thomas Piketty) by Cass Sunstein. The title of the book is " The Hidden Wealth of Nations: The Scourge of Tax Havens"

Parking the Big Money

Cass R. Sunstein

In some circles, "redistribution" of wealth has become a dirty word, and recent efforts to make the tax system more progressive have run into serious political resistance, above all from Republicans. But whatever your political party, you are unlikely to approve of the illegal use of tax havens. As it turns out, a lot of wealthy people in the United States, Europe, and elsewhere have been hiding money in foreign countries—above all, Switzerland, Luxembourg, and the Virgin Islands. As a result, they have been able to avoid paying taxes in their home countries. Until recently, however, officials have not known the magnitude of that problem.

But people are paying increasing attention to it. A vivid new documentary, The Price We Pay, connects tax havens, inequality, and insufficient regulation of financial transactions. The film makes a provocative argument that a new economic elite—wealthy managers and holders of capital—is now able to operate on a global scale, outside the constraints of any legal framework. In a particularly chilling moment, it shows one of the beneficiaries of the system cheerfully announcing on camera: "I don't feel any remorse about not paying taxes. I think it's a marvelous way in life."

Gabriel Zucman, who teaches at the University of California at Berkeley, has two goals in his new book, The Hidden Wealth of Nations: to specify the costs of tax havens, and to figure out how to reduce those costs. While much of his analysis is technical, he writes with moral passion, even outrage; he sees tax havens as a "scourge." His figures are arresting. About 8 percent of the world's wealth, or $7.6 trillion, is held in tax havens. In 2015, Switzerland alone held $2.3 trillion in foreign wealth. As a result of fraud from unreported foreign accounts, governments around the world lose about $200 billion in tax revenue each year. Most of this amount comes from the evasion of taxes on investment income, but a significant chunk comes from fraud on inheritances. In the United States, the annual tax loss is $35 billion; in Europe, it is $78 billion. In African nations, it is $14 billion.

The fractions of wealth held abroad are highly variable. In Europe, it is about 10 percent. In African and Latin countries, it is much higher—between 20 percent and 30 percent. In Russia, it is a whopping 52 percent. It follows that while tax havens hit wealthy nations hardest in absolute terms, they can have especially destructive effects on poorer or developing countries, because such a high percentage of their money is offshore. Zucman does not explain why this is so, but it is possible to speculate that one reason is rampant corruption within both the public and private sectors. The extraordinarily high figure for Russia might be best understood as involving money corruptly acquired or invested, which suggests an important point: all uses of tax havens are not the same. Sometimes government officials are the ones who are evading taxes, and they do not want to stop that evasion.

In the aftermath of the financial crisis, you might expect that there would be an international crackdown on the use of tax havens, and as we shall see, international attention is indeed growing. But the numbers demonstrate that no crackdown has occurred. In Luxembourg, offshore wealth actually increased from 2008 to 2012 (by 20 percent). In Switzerland, the increase has been comparable; foreign holdings are now close to an all-time high. Disturbingly, the new wealth is coming mostly from developing countries, which poses a serious problem in light of the severe strains on their limited budgets.

Zucman is the first economist to produce specific numbers of this kind, and to do so, he had to undertake some creative detective work. In order to identify hidden wealth, he focuses on "anomalies"—situations in which international balance sheets show, in aggregate, more liabilities than assets. To see the importance of that inquiry, Zucman asks readers to imagine that a citizen of the United Kingdom holds an American security—say, stock in Google—in a bank account in Switzerland. In the United States, statisticians estimating US wealth overall will record a liability, because a foreigner owns US equities. But in Switzerland, statisticians will see nothing, and for a good reason: Google stock held in Switzerland by a UK resident will be, for Switzerland, neither an asset nor a liability. In the UK too, nothing will be registered, but for a bad reason: the UK has no way of knowing that one of its citizens owns Google stock in Switzerland. From this example, we can see the anomaly: on the global level, liabilities will be recorded as exceeding assets.

Zucman puts it this way: "as far back as statistics go, there is a 'hole'; if we look at the world balance sheet, more financial assets are recorded as liabilities than as assets, as if planet Earth were in part held by Mars." For the purpose of producing an accounting of hidden wealth, that is actually helpful, because "money doesn't evaporate randomly into the ether, but instead follows a precise pattern of tax evasion." In 2015, for example, the nations of the world reported $2 trillion as mutual fund holdings in Luxembourg; this is the total of recorded liabilities. But Luxembourg's own statisticians calculated that worldwide, $3.5 trillion in mutual fund holdings were kept in Luxembourg; that is the total of recorded assets. What happened to the missing $1.5 trillion? In global statistics, that amount had no owners. For Zucman's purposes, the anomaly is a revealing one: the amount by which assets exceed liabilities is a measure of wealth hidden in offshore accounts.

Zucman acknowledges that his measure is only an estimate. He must rely heavily on just two nations, Switzerland and Luxembourg, since both provide useful statistics about assets and liabilities; most tax havens do not do so. To make up for the missing information, he enlists some indirect measures. The technical issues need not concern us here. What matters is that Zucman convincingly argues that his accounting is at least pretty close, and that the grand total has to be in the general vicinity of $7.6 trillion.

How might this problem be solved? Zucman points to several recent efforts. An illuminating failure comes from the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), which instituted, in 2009, what it saw as a promising "on-demand" system for exchanging relevant information about the nationality and holdings of investors. Under that system, any nation may request information about investors from foreign banks, but only if it can establish a well-founded suspicion that fraud has occurred. The problem is that in order to have a well-founded suspicion of fraud, nations need to have relevant information in the first place. Often they don't. Even though the 2009 reform has been widely praised, it seems to have had little or no effect, and Zucman denounces it as a "masquerade." Recall that since 2009, the use of tax havens has increased significantly.

Zucman is also unimpressed by the Savings Tax Directive, adopted with considerable fanfare by the European Union in 2005. That directive imposes a simple requirement. When, for example, citizens of the UK earn interest on French accounts, the French government must automatically inform tax officials in the UK. That sounds like a solution, but it runs into three problems. First, it excludes dividends altogether. Second, it has been successfully avoided by the creation of shell corporations and trusts, which make it hard to know who, exactly, owns what. Third, nations are not treated equally; for example, Luxembourg and Austria are not required to send information automatically.

Zucman much prefers the Foreign Account Tax Compliance Act (FATCA), which was signed into law by President Obama in 2010. Under FATCA, all foreign banks are required to identify any American citizens among their clients and to disclose to the Internal Revenue Service the amount of their holdings and any dividends and interest paid on them. What Zucman emphasizes, and especially admires, is the automatic nature of the act's requirements. The IRS need not name names or show grounds for suspicion. Every year, foreign banks are required to comply. If they fail to do so, they face a severe sanction, in the form of a 30 percent withholding tax on gross income (including dividends and interest) from US sources. In Zucman's account, the sanction appears to be working; foreign banks are meeting their obligations, and some initially skeptical nations (including China) are even praising the new law.

With this precedent in mind, Zucman unveils his principal proposal: an automatic, fully global register, so that every government in the world can know where money is kept, and who is trying to escape national taxes. Under his proposal, the register would record "who owns all the financial securities in circulation, stocks, bonds, and shares of mutual funds throughout the world." If rich people in the United States or Germany are depositing their money into Swiss banks, the

Swiss authorities would have to inform American and German officials of the deposits. Zucman emphasizes that all this should be done automatically, so as to make special inquiries or evidence of suspicion unnecessary.

With the register, tax authorities could tell, essentially immediately, if their citizens are using tax havens. Zucman notes that a global register of this kind could have other benefits, helping to combat the financing of terrorism, bribery, and money laundering; public and private corruption might be added to this list. He notes too (and here he will immediately lose some readers) that such a register could facilitate the imposition of a global wealth tax, of the sort proposed, very controversially, by Thomas Piketty.

To avoid the charge of utopianism, Zucman emphasizes that there is a clear international movement in the direction he favors. With respect to the approach taken in FATCA, some nations are already considering emulating the United States, and importantly, Luxembourg, Singapore, and Switzerland have said that they would agree to automatic sharing of bank information. But he acknowledges some serious obstacles to the current reform efforts. The first is that, with the exception of the United States, nations are not threatening to impose penalties. That is a major problem, because a polite "please" will not do the job, especially since foreign banks have so much to gain from continuing business as usual.

The second obstacle is financial opacity. Many offshore accounts remain hidden through trusts and shell corporations, which makes it difficult for anyone to link those accounts with their real owners, even when information is formally exchanged. Zucman emphasizes the need to promote financial "transparency" (a principal term for him) and to ensure verification. To this end, he calls for serious economic sanctions against tax havens (as in the US approach), potentially including customs tariffs against nations that help "defrauders evade their home countries' laws."

Zucman has a final concern: tax avoidance by multinational corporations. As he is aware, this is a quite different problem from tax evasion, because it is typically done without violating a national law. Under US law, for example, American companies have significant discretion to locate their operations where they please, and also to shift their profits to nations with lower tax rates. Even if this is lawful, Zucman thinks that it is a problem. As a result of tax avoidance, US firms are able to save $130 billion annually, contributing to a decline in the effective corporate tax rate from 30 percent in the late 1990s to about 20 percent today.

In response, he wants "a radical reform of corporate taxation." He favors a kind of tax on global profits, one that starts with the worldwide profits of firms, and then apportions them to each country. If, for example, a multinational company earns $900 billion in global profits in 2016, a formula would be used to allocate that amount among the various nations in which it does business. Each nation would be free to apply its ordinary tax rate to the profits allocated by that formula. Zucman notes that in the United States, corporate taxes within states already operate a bit like this, with national profit calculations followed by an apportionment formula.

On this particular issue, Zucman's approach seems naive; many tax specialists believe that the apportionment system works very poorly in the United States, and any kind of international formula would produce serious challenges of accounting (let alone politics). Nonetheless, Zucman has produced an important book, above all because of his effort to calculate the magnitude of the world's hidden wealth. As he acknowledges, his estimates depend on a degree of guesswork, not least because of the absence of reliable worldwide statistics. Even so, he has used the most rigorous methods to date, and he makes a convincing argument that the global figure is unlikely to be much lower than his $7.6 trillion estimate. It might well be higher.

The result is a substantial loss of revenue worldwide, with unfortunate consequences for both public services and deficits. According to Zucman, the United States is losing $35 billion in annual taxes, and some estimates say that the real loss is as high as $100 billion.* If so, and if those who successfully evade taxes are mostly the wealthiest people, there is a serious problem. By way of comparison, the entire annual budget of the Department of State is in the vicinity of $50 billion.

At the same time, Zucman's proposed solution raises an assortment of questions. Should nations really want a global institution to keep a register of everyone's ownership of stocks, bonds, shares of mutual funds, and other financial securities? Might there be a risk to personal privacy? To be sure, Zucman does not want everyone's holdings to be visible on the Internet. A global institution could be required to maintain privacy. But many people would undoubtedly fear that it would not respect that requirement, and that people with nefarious purposes might be able to get access to it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And who, exactly, would serve as that global institution? Zucman suggests the International Monetary Fund, which is probably the most natural candidate. The IMFhas a great deal of credibility in many circles, but hardly in all. Should the IMF be given full access to people's financial holdings?

These questions might well have answers. With respect to privacy, domestic banks are already required to make reports to the IRS, and the privacy concerns do not seem severe; perhaps the risks could be controlled at the global level as well. Nonetheless, an international effort to negotiate a global register might not be feasible. A less provocative suggestion, in the spirit of Zucman's proposal, would be that other nations should move on their own toward adoption of the approach embodied in FATCA—by which banks must identify their clients and report their holdings—complete with stiff penalties for noncompliance.

In Europe, which is losing a lot of tax revenue, that approach could prove especially helpful. True, some developing countries might lack the leverage to enforce requirements of this kind, and because of domestic corruption, some nations would be reluctant to impose those requirements. To these problems, the best solution might be an international treaty to uncover hidden wealth, through which participants generalize the requirements of FATCA. That approach might have significant advantages over the global register that Zucman favors.

But there are counterarguments here as well. Zucman largely praises FATCA, but in the United States, the law has turned out to be highly controversial, and some people are loudly calling for its repeal or modification. One reason is expense. Foreign financial institutions are not at all happy with the considerable administrative burdens that it imposes. Another reason involves unintended adverse consequences. Because FATCA increases the costs of having American investors, it gives some foreign banks an incentive not to allow Americans to invest at all (or to charge them higher fees). The law is also a blunt instrument. A lot of law-abiding Americans, living abroad, use foreign financial institutions, and they do not need FATCA to ensure that they obey the law. The same is true of many Americans who choose, for one or another reason, to invest abroad.

But if we keep the size of Zucman's estimates in mind, these concerns need not be taken as decisive. If the effect of FATCA is to produce major reductions in tax evasion, and to ensure that people pay what they owe, then it might well be worthwhile to incur the costs. Of course foreign banks do not like the law, not only because compliance can be burdensome, but also because it makes it much harder to provide tax havens. That is not exactly an argument against FATCA.

A strong virtue of Zucman's book is that it puts a bright spotlight on an area in which significant reforms might appeal to people who otherwise disagree on a great deal. You might believe that the tax system should be made more progressive, or you might believe that it should be made less so. But whatever you think, you are unlikely to support a situation in which trillions of dollars are hardly taxed at all.

April 3, 2015

Dear Friends,

We promise to say this in 450 words or less. It is, after all, a holiday. And for many, the prospect of a nuclear agreement with Iran is closer to the top of mind than Cuba.

But can't we just start this weekend by considering -- and celebrating -- what's happened these last seven days?

Cuban and U.S. diplomats sat at the same table for unprecedented framework talks on human rights . U.S. policymakers dropped hints that Cuba would soon be dropped from the State Sponsors of Terrorism list. AirBnB started offering U.S. travelers the ability to make on-line reservations in Cuba. A new poll showed majority support among Cuban Americans for President Obama's new policies. And American University released a fascinating series of papers: Implications of Normalization .

On December 16th, 2014, any one of these developments could have been sufficient to lead the news and instill us with a healthy measure of optimism.

Back then (by which we mean just 109 days ago) there were two constants in U.S.-Cuba policy: the United States had an unbreakable commitment to facilitating regime change on the island by isolating Cuba's government and immiserating the Cuban people; and that policy, because it was owned by powerful Cuban American hardliners, would never be changed.

In that era of decades-long hostility, every hopeful moment that unexpectedly arose also evanesced quickly. It seemed inevitable that events would force one or both governments to regress to the mean.

Since December 17th, a new narrative -- one that values normalcy over hostility -- has taken hold.

We're not saying everything is better. The embargo remains in place. The U.S. still seems unable to wash the regime change mentality completely out of our system. Cuba's government continues to seek and exert control (50% Internet usage by 2020 ? Really?); although loyalists dissent publicly from those holding onto their "siege mentality ." Of course, both capitals still hold divergent views on human rights and foreign policy and express them unreservedly.

Yet, something fundamental is changing. The sharp disagreements that drove us apart for decades are now being mediated in a process that is designed to narrow and resolve our differences.

Today, Americans are engaged by the possibility they soon could use their MasterCard while staying in an Airbnb in Havana, or that further changes in public opinion will encourage U.S. policy makers to abolish all remaining limits on travel and lift the embargo once and for all.

Ultimately, we think these changes will build on one another and, perhaps faster than we imagine, normalization will be the new normal for U.S.-Cuba relations.

With that, we wish a happy weekend and happy holiday to you all.

U.S.-CUBA RELATIONS

Airbnb expands to Cuba

Airbnb, the online bed and breakfast rental service, began listing accommodations in Cuba on Thursday, Bloomberg reports.

By offering U.S. travelers the option of booking overnight stays in Cuba online, this announcement by Airbnb is one of the biggest commercial developments since the Obama Administration initiated sweeping changes in U.S. policy toward the island in January of this year.

Travelers using Airbnb to search for accommodations in Cuba will find approximately 1,000 listings across the island, with 40% of those properties in Havana, the AP reports.

Cubans have been renting out private homes, or casas particulares, to tourists for over two decades, but the rentals are operated on a cash-only basis, and Cuba's limited Internet connectivity has made making reservations difficult for many American tourists.

Airbnb sent company members to Cuba to encourage owners of casas particulares to use the online service. But, since so few Cubans -- only about 5% -- have access to the global Internet, the company worked with Florida-based VaCuba, an organization that is authorized to send cash remittances to Cubans, to make the Internet payments possible.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

According to a company press release , the arrangement makes Cuban hosts "eligible for Airbnb's Host Guarantee program, which reimburses up to $1 million USD for property damage. Airbnb will also expand its photography program to Cuba, currently through a beta program that utilizes the work of local photographers in Cuba's independent entrepreneur community, to capture images of hosts' unique spaces."

Airbnb, which has evolved into a $20 billion global company since its 2008 origins as a San Francisco startup, joins Netflix and MasterCard as some of the first Internet-based companies to expand to Cuba. Netflix and MasterCard unblocked Cuba in February in moves that are, for the moment, largely symbolic, since very few Cubans have fast enough connections to stream video, and no banks have permitted MasterCard carriers to access their accounts from the island.

The number of tourists visiting Cuba has been steadily rising in recent years. Many of hotels are already fully booked for most of this year, highlighting Cuba's need to expand its hospitality infrastructure. But, hotels can take years to build, and Cuba still lacks the means to update most of its dilapidated state-run facilities.

Airbnb's move clears those hurdles, since no construction or real estate acquisition is necessary for the company to operate. "The idea here is to support growth in travel that isn't disruptive, that actually celebrates and preserves Cuba as a distinct destination," said Airbnb co-founder Nathan Blecharczyk.

"We believe that Cuba could become one of Airbnb's biggest markets in Latin America," added Airbnb regional director Kay Kuehne. "We are actually plugging into an existing culture of micro-enterprise in Cuba. The hosts in Cuba have been doing for decades what we just started doing seven years ago."

The company's expansion could also be a positive development for diplomacy. Dan Restrepo, a former adviser to President Obama on Latin America, said the expansion "creates connectivity between peoples in a way that is outside the reach of government on both sides."

Despite the challenges, casas particulares have been successful in attracting hard currency in Cuba's struggling socialist economy. Many owners have re-invested their earnings in the remodeling of their homes, which in turn has attracted more customers. "You're starting to see places that can compete with three- and four-star hotels," says Collin Laverty, director of Cuba Educational Travel.

Before President Obama announced in December of 2014 that the U.S. would significantly ease trade and travel restrictions on Cuba, Airbnb, like other U.S. service providers that operate online, was forced to block Cuban access to their websites. After many restrictions were officially lifted in January, Airbnb executives worked with U.S. officials to approve the company's plan to operate on the island.

Under the new regulations put in place by the Obama Administration, U.S. travelers can visit Cuba as long as they fall into one of twelve categories of approved travel, including family visits, professional research, people-to-people exchange, journalistic activity, and humanitarian work.

This week, a U.S. official said Cuba's government has committed to reaching 50% Internet penetration on the island by 2020, raising the possibility of a rapid growth in online companies looking to do business in the country.

Secretary Pritzker confident in future of U.S. businesses in Cuba

At a conference in Tampa, Florida titled "Tampa at the Forefront of Historic Change," U.S. Secretary of Commerce Penny Pritzker expressed optimism for the future of the U.S.-Cuba trade relationship, the Tampa Tribune reports.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"What we do know from other countries who have gone through this transformation is that over time there will be more opportunities," Pritzker told Tribune reporters after the forum. "The early and first often have an advantage, and that may mean you have to invest your time."

First formal talks on human rights held in Washington

Cuban and U.S. diplomats met in Washington, D.C. on Tuesday to establish a framework for future discussions on human rights, Reuters reports. The Cuban delegation was headed by Pedro Luis Pedroso, a deputy director in Cuba's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and the U.S. team was led by Tom Malinowski, the Assistant Secretary of State for Human Rights and Democracy.

The plan to meet was first disclosed in Havana last week by Mr. Pedroso, who told Granma that the "dialogue on human rights... demonstrates Cuba's readiness to address any issue despite our differences."

A State Department official told Reuters, "This preliminary meeting reflects our continued focus on human rights and democratic principles in Cuba."

President Obama has kept Cuba's human rights record a priority for U.S. policy since he announced the decision to reestablish diplomatic relations last year. In January, as a part of the larger agreement to improve relations with the U.S., Cuba released 53 political prisoners.

"There's still many short-term, arbitrary detentions taking place. Cuba is in the process of an electoral reform but we don't see any indication that they will allow a multi-partisan democracy to occur," said Assistant Secretary of State Roberta Jacobson at the Cuba Opportunity Summit hosted by the University of Pennsylvania. "People can't exercise freedom of expression or association. Cuba thinks that it's meddling on our part but we believe those are international obligations."

Assistant Secretary Jacobson added, "You have to engage even with people you don't agree with if you want to get to a point where you can bring about change."

In an interview with ABC News, Josefina Vidal, Cuba's chief negotiator said, "We know that this is the way the United States government presents its policy toward Cuba, but what we believe is that we can respect each other's differences and at the same time work together on issues of common interest as neighbors."

U.S. Official: completion of terror list review could happen soon

Stefan Selig, the Assistant Secretary of International Commerce, told an audience at the Cuba Opportunity Summit held this week in New York that Cuba's removal from the list of state sponsors of terrorism "could occur in the near future," the Miami Herald reports.

Last December, President Obama said he was instructing Secretary of State John Kerry to review Cuba's designation as a terrorism sponsor. In the months following President Obama's announcement, Cuban officials have stressed that getting their country off the U.S. list of State Sponsors of Terrorism is a priority.

Three rounds of negotiations to restore diplomatic ties and re-open embassies have been held so far, and President Obama declared his goal of restoring ties before the Summit of the Americas meeting convenes next week in Panama. Cuba will attend the Summit for the first time after decades of exclusion at the behest of the United States.

from the list will make it easier for Cuba to engage in international transactions, and may even enable Cuban diplomats in the U.S. who have been without banking services for over a year to conduct normal consular services.

U.S. officials have asserted that they are working to complete the review as quickly as possible. But, Secretary of State John Kerry told reporters that a decision on Cuba's status is "being pursued separately" from the current negotiations.

Cuba was first placed on the State Sponsors of Terrorism list in 1982 during the Reagan administration for reasons that have been increasingly difficult for the U.S. to justify. The State Department's 2013 report said "there was no indication that the Cuban government provided weapons or paramilitary training to terrorist groups."

New poll shows majority of Cuban Americans supports normalization

A public opinion poll released this week by Bendixen & Amandi International shows that 51% of Cuban Americans support President Obama's move to normalize relations with Cuba, while 40% oppose the new policies. This shows a strengthening of support for reform compared to a similar poll of 400 Cuban American adults conducted last year following President Obama's announcement, which found 44% of Cuban Americans supported the move and 48% disagreeing.

Another poll conducted this week by Reuters/Ipsos shows that only 5.5% of Americans think Cuba is an "imminent threat" to the United States. Out of Republicans surveyed, only 13% labeled Cuba an "imminent threat," compared to 35% of Republicans who placed President Obama in that category.

These are just the latest in a series of public opinion surveys that have shown remarkable support for normalizing relations with Cuba and lifting the embargo.

- A Beyond the Beltway poll released in March showed that 64% of Americans favor lifting sanctions against Cuba, and 72% want to see expanded travel and trade with the island.
- A February Gallup poll showed that 59% of Americans favor ending the embargo.
- A February FAU poll shows that 79% of Hispanics in the U.S. support re-establishing diplomatic relations with Cuba.
- An AP poll in February found that 60% of Americans want the U.S. to lift the embargo.
- A January Wall Street Journal poll showed that 60% of Americans approve of President Obama's December 2014 announcement that the U.S. and Cuba would re-establish diplomatic ties.
- A Washington Post-ABC poll in December showed 68% support for ending the embargo.
- A poll conducted by CBS in December found 54% approval for re-establishing diplomatic relations with the island.

Senator Menendez,indicted on 14 federal counts, steps aside on Foreign Relations Committee

Senator Robert Menendez has voluntarily relinquished his position as the senior Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee after being charged in a fourteen-count indictment for alleged violations including bribery and the denial of "honest services" to his nearly 9 million New Jersey constituents.

According to USA Today , Menendez will be replaced by U.S. Senator Ben Cardin (MD) as he battles the corruption charges brought by U.S. Justice Department prosecutors. Menendez has been a "vocal critic of the White House on its handling of Iran and Cuba," The Baltimore Sun reported .

Contrasting the Senators' approaches on Cuba, the National Journal writes: "Unlike Menendez, Cardin has pushed for Congress to ratify and expand upon Obama's moves to normalize diplomatic relations with Cuba."

In wake of the indictment, the New York Times and the Newark Star-Ledger editorial boards called on Menendez to resign his Senate seat. The Newark paper said, "The state needs a respected senator who is focused on his job, not a tarnished defendant who spends his days fending off credible charges of corruption and raising money for his legal defense."

Menendez, however, promised his supporters in a video released this week, "I will never give up."

CUBA'S FOREIGN RELATIONS

Cuba announces over 300 requests for Mariel investment

Cuba's government announced this week that is has received over 300 formal requests to invest in the Mariel special economic zone, Prensa Latina reports.

Legislation approving the construction of the Mariel Special Economic Zone was authorized by President Raúl Castro in September 2013 . Brazil's development bank BNDES financed $682 million of the almost $1 billion being spent on the project.

The deep-water port, built by Brazilian construction giant Odebrecht and managed by Singapore's PSA International, is designed to process post-Panamax ships, and the port's four crane cables can load and unload cargo faster than any port in the region, according to Cuba Standard .

Cuba hopes that the port and special development zone will turn into a hub for regional trade, and in doing so attract much-needed hard currency investments. Cuba Standard reports that tens of thousands of containers from Europe and Asia already pass through the port on a weekly basis.

So far, only three companies have publicly announced that they will be carrying out projects in the Mariel zone, including a German orthopedics manufacturer, a Vietnamese trade and investment conglomerate, and a Mexican meat packing company .

Ebola workers return from West Africa

The last of the over 250 Cuban medical workers who joined international efforts to contain the Ebola epidemic that killed over 10,000 people in Sierra Leone, Liberia, and Guinea have returned home, Granma reports.

Cuba was one of the first countries to respond to the WHO's call for increased medical personnel in Guinea, Sierra Leone, and Liberia. The island nation's contribution has been the largest to date, an effort that has drawn praise from international figures like Secretary Kerry and WHO Director-Genera Margaret Chan .

Cuba shoots for 50% Internet penetration in five years

A U.S. State Department official told reporters Monday that Cuba's government hopes to extend Internet access to 50% of Cuban households and to reach 60% mobile phone access by 2020, Reuters reports. "I believe they are extremely eager to do so," the official said.

Only 5% of Cubans have unfettered access to the Internet. Approximately 20% of Cuba's population uses the state-run intranet that can only access Cuban websites.

As ABC reports, many Cubans spend hours waiting outside state-run cyber cafés just to check email or log onto Facebook. Using the Internet on the island can cost as much as $5 per hour -- a cost few can afford in a country where the average monthly salary is $20.

"They are falling behind, and that's denying their people access to knowledge and to the opportunity to grow as an economy and as a people, and they're aware of that," the State Department official commented. "As long as the Cubans create an environment that's attractive to investment... and attractive to the delivery of services, I believe those services will reach the island."

In December, U.S. President Barack Obama announced sweeping changes in U.S. policy toward Cuba, significantly easing restrictions on exports of telecommunications products and services.

Last week , a delegation of U.S. diplomats led by Daniel Sepulveda, the U.S. State Department's international communications coordinator, traveled to Cuba for talks on improving Cuba's telecommunications infrastructure.

First gluten-free bakery established in Havana

A gluten-free bakery, the first in Cuba, will open its doors in the coming weeks exclusively for the use of Cubans with Celiac disease, a genetic disorder that prevents some people from being able to eat gluten, the Cuban News Agency reports.

Luis Carlos Góngora, the director of Cuba's Provincial Food Industry enterprise, said the bakery will be the first of many that will gradually be introduced across the country for use by Cuba's Celiac patients.

McCain Jokes About Killing Iranians With Cigarette Exports (MSNBC, 07/09/08, 8:17am)
REPORTER: We've learned that the exports to Iran increased by ten fold during the Bush administration. The biggest export was cigarettes. Giving that the, yeah, that the supposedly […]

McCain: Maybe that's a way of killing them.

[McCain and reporters laugh]

McCain: I meant that as a joke.

JOE SCARBOROUGH: Ok, he jokes a lot about killing Iranians, I'm sorry!

ANDREA MITCHELL: That's before the missile tests, let's just point that out.

CHUCK TODD: But you know what's funny, in all this re-tooling of McCain that we've read about over the last couple of weeks, apparently one of the things that they want to have him stop doing are these jokes!

SCARBOROUGH: About killing Iranians! Bomb, bomb, bomb, bomb Iran!

TODD: But I think this is what people like about John McCain.

WILLY GEIST: It is!

TODD: I mean, I'm sorry […]

SCARBOROUGH: Not killing Iranians, but […]

TODD: No! But when he does things like that it's sort of like that's what makes him real and that's what makes people that disagree with him say, ah you know what, the guy seems like any guy you'd want to have around the dinner table or the bar stool.

Romney Can't Explain how McCain will Balance the Budget by 2013 (CNN 07/09/08 07:55AM)
KIRAN CHETRY: […] If there's evidence that dipping into our reserve would provide immediate relief is that something Senator McCain would support?

MITT ROMNEY: […] If we 're going to see long term energy prices brought down were going to have to have more supply and more supply here in this country. That is why John McCain is focused on saying lets have additional drilling, lets have new nuclear plants so we can have less expensive electricity to power our plug in cars, and lets also use coal and natural gas more aggressively. […]

CHETRY:[…] We talked to T. Boone Pickens earlier this morning, who talked about his plan to reduce our dependence and it involves spending billions of dollars on wind energy and being able to then harness natural gas to power our cars. Is that something that seems like a working solution, something that a McCain administration would pursue?

ROMNEY: What you're going to find in the McCain administration is an aggressive desire and willingness to support new technologies that help America become energy independent. […]

CHETRY: John McCain says he can balance the budget by 2013 and one way he says he's going to do it is by reigning in spending. You still have him though promising to extend the president's current tax cuts, adding tax cuts of his own. And he needs to find hundreds of billions of dollars. How will he be able to do that by simply reigning in spending?

ROMNEY: I think the key thing the American people want to see right now is who's going to help them deal with some very tough economic situations at home, with gasoline prices through the roof and some of them upside down in their home mortgages. And John McCain has a plan to do exactly that. […] Oil prices down, […] taxes down for middle-income families, and that's by eliminating the alternative minimum tax […] and double the personal deduction. And finally he's got a plan to create more jobs […]

CHETRY: What would he be able to cut? What would he cut though?

ROMNEY: […] cut out the earmarks, the waste, the fraud, the abuse. […]

CHETRY: Right, but let me ask you this. Earmarks make up about 2% of the overall budget so that's not going to be enough. And when it comes to entitlement programs like Medicare, you have more seniors getting older and more people that are going to be needing to rely on Medicare, so how does he make that happen by 2013?

ROMNEY: By reforming the system to make sure that we are providing for the needs of those who need it but we are not spending excessively. For instance in the area of Social Security. The President proposed certain personal accounts, that would have helped. […] Medicaid is a place were enormous savings are potentially there. So the idea that somehow we are going to have to take more and more and more out of people's pockets to pay for federal programs is something John McCain rejects.

CHETRY:[…] Is your campaign digging a hole by saying that by 2013 the budget can be balanced. Politico has a story today that says many of the economist that signed on and said they support McCain's plan, still don't think that he can balance the budget by 2013.

ROMNEY: […] Senator McCain believes that by the end of his first term we'll have wound down our major contributions to our efforts in Iraq, that will save a lot of money, we'll have reformed many of our entitlement programs, cut out waste, fraud and abuse. And if we also see a strong growing economy, those things can combine to balance the budget. But I must admit, I think most people want some help balancing their own budget right away.

Romney Praises McCain on Energy and Being a Maverick on Hannity and Colmes (FNC 07/08/08 09:05pm)
HANNITY: I have publicly said I think you'd be the best choice.

COLMES: You'd like the job though right? You wouldn't say no?

MITT ROMNEY: […] I think its one of the least interesting parts of the campaign at this point. I think the most interesting thing that's going on relates to Barack Obama and his aggressive shift on policy positions in breathtaking speed. As regard to the VP sweepstakes, I think its all speculation that I'm going to avoid.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

COLMES: It's very interesting because during the campaign now you and McCain said a lot of things about each other, which were not always particularly complimentary including what you just said about Barack Obama, that he changed his position on ethanol and go down the list. How do you square that with your now in support of John McCain?

ROMNEY: […] He is a person of great capability that has been tested and proven, that I respect enormously. There are places we disagreed on certain issues; I wouldn't have been running if we agreed on every issue. But the American people spoke and they chose John McCain to be our nominee. And on the major issues of the day, he is consistent, he is right; I agree with him, He has charted the right course for America. And right now with the number one issue on people's minds the economy, he's got the right prescription to make our economy stronger.

COLMES: You once referred to him, as outside the mainstream of Republican thought, do you still believe that?

ROMNEY: […] what's characterized John McCain over the years is that he is not someone who has marched in lock step with the party. Some would even say that he was hard on the President. I remember him saying that Don Rumsfeld was the worst Secretary of Defense in the history of the United States of America. That's pretty tough on your own administration or your party's administration. And it's that very, if you will, Maverick outspoken nature that's making it so hard for Barack Obama to try to characterize John McCain as being a continuation of George Bush. Everybody that has watched the last eight years knows that is far from the truth.

COLMES: […] You once referred to his program to limit carbon emissions as something that would raise gasoline prices $0.50 a gallon. Is that one of the areas where you and he disagree on the trade and cap issue?

ROMNEY: What I would do on a trade and cap program is make sure what's done is done on a global basis and not just on a US only basis. […] The real heart of energy is what we are going to do about our natural resources, are we going to drill for more oil, John McCain says yes […] Nuclear power plants, John McCain says absolutely [….] John McCain will get us energy independent. […]

HANNITY: […] Barack Obama basically saying that it's embarrassing that American's can't speak French when they go to Europe.

[Clip of Obama]

ROMNEY: […] our concerns about our education system is less about speaking French and more about whether we can keep up with the world in Math and Computer Science and other Sciences. […]

HANNITY: […] Don't you think a lot of Americans are going to find this arrogant?

ROMNEY: […] I think Barack Obama looks towards Europe for a lot of his inspiration. As he thinks about his tax plan, raising taxes in this country is exactly the sort of thing that happened in Europe, putting in place a governmental healthcare system, that's what Europe has done. The European course is not the right course for America. I think John McCain is going to make sure that America stays America.

Mitt Romney Discusses McCain's Economic Plan on Fox and Friends (CNN 07/09/08 08:51am)
STEVE DOOCY: John McCain said something about that the Economy is not his strong suit. […] Are you confident he knows enough to run the country.

MITT ROMNEY: […] He's laid out a plan to get our economy going again, and it includes at the top of the list finally becoming energy independent. Something that of course Barack Obama, because his need to adhere to the desires of the extreme environmentalist in his party, he just cant do.

ANDREW NAPOLITANO: […] John McCain has said that by 2013, by the end of his first term, he will balance the budget, keep both Bush in place, make them permanent, and double the standard deduction of $3,500 for parents with children. How can he possibly do all that?

ROMNEY: […] by cutting unnecessary spending, also reforming entitlements to make sure we don't have growth way out of line with our ability to pay, and of course we have to see a fast growing economy again, and that is something that Senator McCain is counting on by the end of his first term, that we'll have the economic growth that combined with reigning in federal spending well be able to balance the budget.

Romney Talks Iran Foreign Policy and McCain's National Security Strengths (MSNBC, 07/09/08, 8:23am)
JOE SCARBOROUGH: This morning, Iran of course fired that, uh, long range missiles in a test that many people believe was provocative. Certainly in Israel and the United States. Do you think that John McCain is better equipped to handle a crisis like this than Barack Obama?

MITT ROMNEY: No question about that. I think the American people recognize that and it's not just with regards to foreign affairs, with regards to our economy and keeping America strong and providing good jobs for Americans. John McCain has the experience of a leader. And Barack Obama is a wonderful and charming person, but he's never been a leader. Wasn't a leader in the state senate. Hasn't been a leader in the federal senate, hasn't pushed through a major piece ever legislation. He is untested and unproven when it comes to leadership. John McCain if you agree with him or disagree with him, you do know the man is a leader.

SCARBOROUGH: Well, Barack Obama would say for all of John McCain's experience not only in war but in peace, not only in the house but also in the senate, this is a guy who is a guy who supported a disastrous war in Iraq while Barack Obama opposed it.

ROMNEY: […] but John McCain, you know where he is. John McCain says look, we are going to protect this country and without question, based upon what we knew at the time we had that information, we took action, which frankly most senators agreed we ought to take. And that was to go after Iraq and go after Afghanistan.

ANDREA MITCHELL: […] if this were a McCain Romney administration and Iran fired these missiles, what would the McCain Romney team do?

ROMNEY: Well, I'm afraid I'm not going to pick up any speculation with regards to my involvement with senator McCain's ticket. I'm happy to support it but I'm not anticipating being part of it. With regards to response to Iran, you respond as well with, in my view, tightening the economic sanctions that we have been arguing for that great Britain and the rest of Europe is lining up behind as well. You tighten sanctions on Iran as long as they continue to take belligerent action and particularly as they pursue their nuclear capacity for weapons building.

MITCHELL: But Russia and china have been vetoing sanctions. I mean there have been economic sanctions that have impacted Iran. But the really tough action against Iran, for years now, Condi rice has failed to get a deal because of vetoes from Russia and china.

ROMNEY: Oh you are absolutely right. And so the action that America has it take is to continue to use every source of leverage we have to put tighter and tighter sanctions on Iran. To take those actions unilaterally that we can take, as well as actions from our friends throughout the world, particularly, our European friends. It would be nice if we could get U.N. sanctions as well. But as you point out that is going to be tough with Russia and china. But without question, short of taking military action, which we do not want to take at this stage, the only way we can put real pressure on Iran is by having the kind of economic sanctions that will make the people of Iran and the leadership say enough.

SCARBOROUGH: governor but that hasn't worked, obviously, over the past seven years to stop them developing nuclear weapons. George w. bush, dick Cheney, this administration has said Iran will not be allowed to get nuclear weapons. Suggesting if sanctions don't work then they'll have to take military action. Do you believe that the United States of America should take military action if that is the last and only option to keep nuclear weapons away from Ahmadinejad and Iran?

ROMNEY: Of course you always leave military options on the table. You never tell someone like Iran that is developing nuclear technology potentially for the purpose of weaponry that we are going to take military action off the table. It is on the table but you pursue every other possible avenue. And that's what we're doing.

SCARBOROUGH: And when those avenues are closed off, do you go militarily to stop them.

ROMNEY: When I say you leave it on the table, I mean it's on the table. You show very clearly your willingness to potentially take military action. And I'm not going to suggest you take that off the table nor am I going to announce exactly what kind ever action that might be. But we have a wide array of options, which include the military.

PAT BUCHANAN: […] you used the phrase at this stage, military action is really not in the cards. That we're going down this diplomatic road. In that the united states believes that Iran could not acquire the enriched uranium at weapons grade to test it on a missile, for any number of years, are you not sort of saying that we are, we ought to rule out military action at least for the next five or six months to the end of the Bush-Cheney presidency? And if we are going to take a look at that option, that is far, far down the road?

ROMNEY: I don't think that's an option which is going to be picked up in the immediate future, Pat, I think it's far more likely to be considered down the road. But I must admit that the reliability of our intelligence sources in the Middle East is somewhat in question. I thought the national intelligence estimate comments were overstated in terms of confidence that a weapon is not being created in Iran. So, we obviously have to deal with the information we have. And clearly, the movement in Europe towards tightening sanctions is a positive development. I would like to see those sanctions applied and see if we can't put the kind of pressure on Iran to get them to pull back.

MCCAIN: Governor, you said you don't anticipate being on John McCain's ticket, do you know something we don't know? Did he call you up and say hey, buddy, you are not on my short list any more.

ROMNEY: You know we have never had a conversation with regards to the vice presidency. Between our staffs, or directly between myself and Senator McCain. It's a decision he's going to make all by himself.

McCain Political Implications of Iran's Missile Test Discussed (MSNBC, 07/09/08, 10:09am)
CRAIG CRAWFORD: Yeah, it strikes me that this missile test is as much of a test of the presidential candidates as it is of Iran's missiles. And what happens here, it is no longer a hypothetical. And so now, I think the media and the public should press these presidential candidates for real specifics.

CRAWFORD: You know one problem for McCain, Monica, is if the administration takes some specific action and McCain is just "me too", just parrots that, says yeah that's great. Then that just further complicates the problem McCain has with appearing to be Bush three.

MONICA CHETNEY: Christina, how does this stay in the news cycle? Might this have been a bigger deal if we were talking about mid-October end of October for these test firings? Or is this something, will the conversation shift back to Iraq and Afghanistan now?

CHRISTINA BELLANTONI: It's possible. I think foreign policy, we've seen a lot more conversations about the economy than we have about foreign policy lately, so this could bring it back to that. But it also, I mean, we were talking about Charlie Black's comments a few weeks ago about how a terrorist attack might help Senator McCain as a candidate. And this is an issue, that allowing them both to talk about foreign policy, they each believe that they have strengths with this among voters. And if it does stay into the fall then they can both kind of stress their main issues. And for Senator Obama that's judgment and for Senator McCain he's going to say he's more experienced and tougher on these issues.

The Daily Show Mocks Bush/McCain's Addiction to Oil (Comedy Central, 07/08/09, 11:15pm)
JOHN STEWART: John, the president's got a plan to wean us from our addiction from oil by drilling for more oil.

JOHN HODGMAN: Yes, john, it's typical addictive behavior. In the light of day, a vow to pursue alternative energy sources. Then at night, when the demons come, you find yourself outside naked in the garden trying to squeeze shale into your carburetor.

STEWART: You seem to understand this subject quite well, John.

HODGMAN: Well, I feel very strongly about this, Jon. I see what addiction does to people everyday in my private addiction treatment clinic and my t.v. show "Quit It! With John Hodgman."

STEWART: it's a very cute title.

HODGMAN: […] But I digress. My point is, before an addict can recover, he's got to hit rock bottom, and in this case rock bottom, as it is for many people, means the coast of Florida.

STEWART: Oil companies, though, why do we have the drill off the coast of Florida or in Anwar? Oil companies already own leases to millions of acres of unexplored territory deep in the Gulf of Mexico. Why not just explore out there?

HODGMAN: Deep water crude? That's schwag, john. Stems and seeds. Do you want that skunk fossil when there's ten billion barrels of the good stuff within swimming distance? And by barrels, John, I mean it's just sitting there already in barrels. It's got spigots and everything.

John: I'm not sure even that would really help, john. Listen to John McCain talk about offshore drilling.

[McCain clip shown from May 28th]

HODGMAN: Okay. But when was that, John?

STEWART: That was in May.

HODGMAN: And what month is it now?

STEWART: June.

[McCain clip shown from June 16th]

HODGMAN: You see, John? An addict will say anything he has to in order to get is fix.

STEWART: So McCain is addicted to oil as well?

HODGMAN: No, John, he's not addicted to oil, he's addicted to wanting to be president. He's suffered from it for years. […]

STEWART: John, what's the solution here to this addiction?

HODGMAN: Well, in many ways both President Bush and John McCain are on their way to recovery already. They both recognize they have no control over their addiction and they have submitted to a higher power, named Exxon.

Subject: The Iran Deal: Path to a Bomb or Window to a Target?

Colleagues & Friends,

The deluge of commentary and analysis on the Iran deal has rightly focused on the adequacy of constraints on Iran. (As I wrote yesterday in The Atlantic , "the agreement imposes the most intrusive verification and inspection regime ever negotiated.") But the public debate has so far overlooked a similarly crucial question: Whose weapons and activities does the agreement not constrain? Ours and those of our allies.

In a piece published today in The Boston Globe, I highlight the analysis of Amos Yadlin , the former chief of Israeli Military Intelligence. He assesses that, if Iran adheres to an agreement for a decade and then decides to race for a bomb, a military attack to prevent them reaching the goal line would not only be feasible, but easier than attacking today. Indeed, the agreement would reduce the number of Iranian targets, and give us ten years to learn more about them.

As always, I welcome your feedback, and I also recommend the Belfer Center's latest publication – "The Iran Nuclear Deal: A Definitive Guide " – prepared by our team of experts, including Democrats, Republicans, independents, and internationals.

Extremely helpful. Thanks.

Dear Jake,

I thought it might be useful for the campaign to give you a quick summary of some of the points that were made at the JPPI conference we had on Monday and Tuesday of this week at Glen Cove, New York. Dennis Ross and I co-chair JPPI, which is based in Jerusalem, and was created by the Jewish Agency of Israel ten years ago to be a think tank for strategic issues facing Israel, the Diaspora, and USG-Israel relations. We have a group of fellows, like retired General Michael Herzog (brother of the opposition leader), Avi Gil and others. At the conference, we had Natan Sharansky, who heads the Jewish Agency; leading Jewish organizational leaders (e.g. heads of major UJA Federations around the country); leading rabbis (e.g. Norman Kurtz in Chicago, and Eric Yoffie); academics from Harvard to UCLA; a Member of the Canadian Parliament and former Cabinet Minister (Irwin Cotler)l Middle East experts like David Makovsky, Martin Indyk, and, of course, Dennis Ross, as well as Henry Kissinger and Eric Schmidt of Google, who talked about high tech in Israel. Moreover, Malcolm Honlein, the president of the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations (who I put together with Hillary through you and Huma), was there for the whole two day conference. and spoke on several occasions. We had a signficant number of Israelis there, as well.

1. ISRAEL

(1) The new Netanyahu government has very little flexibility on the peace process, given its right-wing tilt.

(2) While solid majorities of the Israeli public (over 60%) continue to support the two state solution, only a minority believe it is feasible, given Palestinian intransigence.

(3) A number of people, including, interestingly, Malcolm Honlein, felt the Prime Minister should now accept the last Kerry offer as a basis for resuming negotiations. Evidently, the last version given to Bibi did not contain language on Jerusalem (which he cannot accept), while the last version given to Abbas contained the language (but they still rejected it).

(4) There was a clear consensus that the BDS/anti-delegitimization movement against Israel was growing in Europe, and was an increasing threat.

(5) There was a grave concern that the Obama Administration, once the Iran nuclear negotiations are out of the way, will support some form of the French proposal for a new UN Resolution to supplant UN Resolution 242, endorsing the two-state solution, with 1967 borders, and with Jerusalem as the capital of both Israel and a Palestinian state. Several people felt that given the impasse in the peace process, Israel's argument that this should be left to negotiations, had a hollow ring to it. If this is going to happen, then it should be framed in ways that force the Palestinians to make tough choices, like ending claims to the "right of return". But the safest political position is to oppose what will be seen as an effort to "impose" a solution both sides will reject.

(6) There was a feeling on the part of some that Gaza was likely to blow-up again, a combination of Hamas rearming and rebuilding their tunnels, and the impact of the embargo, which has not been loosened.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(7) Israel needed to be more creative to take advantage of the open window for cooperating with the Sunni states (Saudi Arabia, the Gulf States, Egypt, Jordan) against their common enemy, Iran.

(8) Most troubling was the pervasive feeling that the US has withdrawn from a leadership position in the Middle East, leaving our allies in the Arab world, and Israel, to fend for themselves. The level of vitriol against the President was striking, to such a degree that one participant urged that he was being unfairly demonized.

2. ANTI-SEMITISM/ANTI-ZIONISM

(1) There was genuine belief that there is a substantial rise in anti-Semitism in Europe (a topic I addressed at some length). This is most evident in France (where 7000 French Jews left in 2014 for Israel, with almost double that amount expected this year); Belgium; parts of Sweden (Malmo); the Netherlands; Greece; Hungary; Ukraine; but even in the UK. Roger Cukierman, the long-time head of the CRIF, French Jewry's central organization, cited several examples of the growth of anti-Semitism during my negotiations with the French government for payments for people deported on the French railway during World War II, as Secretary Kerry's Special Adviser on Holocaust Issues. Thus, in 2001, when his first term began, 90% of school-age French Jews attended public schools; now only 30% do so, because of the intimidation in schools. It is dangerous to wear a kipot (head-covering) on the Metro. Argentine Jews are also increasingly fearful, in part because of their government's close relations with Iran, which is widely seen as having planned and funded the Hezbollah attacks in the 1990s against the Jewish community center (AMIA), and the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires.

(2) Modern-day anti-Semitism is a product of a combination of factors:

(a) Neo-Nazi/right wing parties, which have long had an anti-Semitic strain, like Le Pen's National Front in France.

(b) Left-wing parties/academics, who oppose Israel's settlement policy and occupation and import their opposition on Jews, who are seen (wrongly) as surrogates for Israel.

(c) Angry, disaffected, unintegrated Muslim young people, who identify with the Palestinians as the underdogs and address their anger for their plight and that of the Palestinians at Jews in their countries.

(3) French Prime Minister Valls estimates there are some 3000 European-born Muslims fighting in Syria and Iraq, 1000 from France, who come back to Europe, armed and trained jihadists. This was precisely the profile of the suspect in the Brussels Jewish Museum attack last year.

(4) The growth in anti-Semitism, and anti-Zionism is not limited to Europe. There is a greater security fear among Jews in both the U.S., Europe, and key Latin American countries. It was reported that 14 AEPi fraternity houses on American campuses were subject to some form of desecration. Several people said that "American campuses were our Europe".

(5) Malcolm Honlein placed special emphasis on the rise of anti-Semitism in his remarks. He said that the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations was catalyzing efforts to create a Global Forum to deal with this phenomenon, to track it, exchange information about it, and develop new ways to combat it. He said that Israel had a role to play, as well.

3. DIVISIONS WITH THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMUNITY OVER ISRAEL POLICY.

(1) There are increasingly sharp left-right divisions (J Street vs. AIPAC) within the American Jewish community over Israel. Remarkably, rabbis are reluctant to discuss Israel in their sermons for fear of alienating one faction or another.

(2) There was now a big debate over which groups can march in the annual New York City Israeli Independence Day parade, which take more liberal positions (e.g., New Israel Fund, J Street). It was generally felt best to have a “big tent” so the Democratic Party left-leaning people were not excluded.

(3) The kind of robust debate that occurs in Israel over Israeli policy, is blunted here by attacks against those who oppose the current government’s policies in the West Bank.

(4) There was a clearly established (Pew and Gallup polls) drop in support for Israel among self-identified Democrats (now under 50%, with over 80% for Republicans). This could feed into making Israel a partisan issue (one of the problems with Bibi’s speech to Congress) for the first time in its history, a dangerous situation.

4. IRAN NUCLEAR NEGOTIATIONS AND BEYOND

(1) This was the most emotional issue. Most of the participants who spoke on the topic (Sharansky, Kissinger, Honlein, Makovsky, Ross) were deeply skeptical of the Iranian nuclear negotiations. Clearly, Honlein and AIPAC will mount a major effort to block the agreement. There was a real foreboding (one participant called it a “panic”) that the American Jewish community was going to be involved in a confrontation with the Administration, that the Republicans would use to try to drive a further wedge with Jewish voters over Israel-related issues.

(2) At the same time, there was a recognition (e.g. Kissinger) that the President would be able to overcome a veto override fight, although just barely.

(3) It was important to reassure Israel and Saudi Arabia and the Gulf States that any nuclear deal with Iran did not presage broader cooperation with Iran on regional issues. (Kissinger agreed, but felt it was inevitable over time, because Iran is a real country, with a long history)

(3) Several speakers (e.g. Ross) suggested that Israel should now begin to talk with the White House about ways to repair the damage to the relationship over the nuclear talks (if there is an agreement). Indeed, the President proposed to Bibi, in his call after the formation of the government, just that, but was rebuffed, seeing any cooperation as signaling he was giving up the fight against the deal.

(4) The options for a post-agreement reassurance included:

(a) Reassurance that the agreement would not lead to a new U.S.-Iranian alliance in the region, at the expense of our traditional alliances.

(b) Sophisticated military weapons to defend themselves against a resurgent Iran.

(c) Defense treaties, that an attack by Iran would be considered an attack against the U.S. (But this was fraught with difficulty; would it be all forms of attack or only a nuclear attack)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(d) Development of a common agenda with Israel, Saudi Arabia, Egypt and the Gulf States. This has not been initiated.

(5) The “snap-back” of sanctions was felt to be impractical. What would constitute a violation? Who would make the determination? Which sanctions would be re-imposed (US, EU, UN)?

(6) There needed to be a clear declaration after the 10/15 year period of the agreement, that a nuclear-armed Iran is unacceptable, and the U.S. would every means to stop it. Likewise, the U.S. could not afford to disengage from the region, and had to lead the coalition against Iran.

(7) There was almost no one who subscribed to the Administration’s hope that over the 10/15 year period of the agreement, the Iranian regime would moderate. Far from it, the end of sanctions and the massive amount of money that would flow to Iran would strengthen the regime, provide more funds to support terrorist groups, and embolden them in the region.

I hope this is helpful in shaping Hillary’s positions on these difficult issues. But more broadly, she needs to understand the great angst in the Jewish community over the cascade of challenges I have described. The empathy and appreciation she can demonstrate, would itself be important and reassuring.

Best wishes,

Stu Eizenstat

Be Careful What You Wish For

LCV Looks at the Record, John McCain Falls Deeper Down the Oil Well and Barack Obama Puts Energy First

Washington, DC – Today, the League of Conservation Voters, which works to turn environmental values into national priorities, applauded Tom Brokaw and NBC News for including a direct question about global warming in this evening's debate. Such questions have been few and far between, but tonight's responses from the two candidates proved that our next President's answer to that question will fundamentally shape the future of the country.

Senator Obama listed a new energy future for America as his #1 priority and outlined an ambitious plan to create jobs, ensure national security and protect the planet with meaningful investments in clean energy. While in one breath Senator McCain called for an All Of The Above energy plan, in his next breath, he only spoke about more oil drilling and more nuclear power – the same energy proposals that the Bush Administration has championed for the last eight years.

"As we listened to their energy proposals tonight, Senator McCain unwisely urged us to look at his record," LCV President Gene Karpinski said. "So we did. While Senator Obama has consistently supported clean renewable energy, energy efficiency, and efforts to reduce global warming pollution, Senator McCain failed to vote in favor of clean energy and measures to reduce global warming at least twelve times. It's no wonder that McCain's plans for the future fail to live up to either his rhetoric or to our country's needs."

McCain was absent when the Senate voted to table an amendment that would have allowed conventional and polluting sources of energy, such as coal-fired power plants and nuclear power, to qualify for credits under the national renewable electricity standard. YES is the pro-environment vote. [Roll Call #211, H. R. 6, 6/14/07]

McCain was absent when the Senate failed to override the filibuster against the renewableelectricity standard and again when the Senate failed by one vote to repeal billions of dollars in subsidies to big oil in order to fund clean energy. YES is the pro-environment vote. [Roll Call #416, H.R. 6, 12/7/07 and Roll Call #425, H.R. 6, 12/13/07]

McCain was absent when the Senate voted on an amendment that would have eliminated public health and environmental permitting procedures for new or expanded oil refineries, coal-to-liquid refineries and ethanol or bio-diesel plants and would have replaced all state and federal approvals with a single "consolidated" permit, set arbitrary deadlines for approving permits, barred state courts from reviewing permitting decisions, and limited challenges brought in federal court. NO is the pro-environment vote. [Roll Call #210, H.R. 6, 6/13/07]

McCain voted no on an amendment that would have raised the CAFE standard for cars, SUVs, and minivans to 40 miles per gallon by 2015, saving 3.1 million barrels of oil a day by 2020—as much oil as the U.S. currently imports from the Persian Gulf and could extract from the Arctic Refuge and the California outer continental shelf, combined—and would have annually kept more than 500 million tons of carbon dioxide out of the air. YES is the pro-environment vote. [Senate Roll Call #157, H.R.6 amendment 902, 6/23/05]

McCain voted no on an amendment that would require electric utilities to produce 10% of their electricity from clean, renewable sources by 2020. YES is the pro-environment vote. [Roll Call #141, H.R. 6, 6/16/05]

McCain voted no on an amendment to raise the CAFÉ standard for cars and light trucks to 490 mpg by 2015. YES is the pro-environment vote. [Roll Call 309, S. 14, 7/29/03]

2002
McCain voted yes on an amendment that would replace a 10% renewable energy standard with a provision for utilities to offer electricity from renewable sources only to the extent available. NO is the pro-environment vote. [Roll Call #55, S. 517, 3/21/02]

McCain voted no on an amendment to raise the renewable energy standard from 10% to 20%, a level that the Department of Energy believes is both affordable and feasible. YES is the pro-environment vote. [Roll Call #50, S. 517, 3/14/02]

McCain was absent when the Senate voted on a resolution expressing that the freeze on CAFÉ standards should end. YES is the pro-environment vote. [9/15/99]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

McCain voted yes to block an amendment that would add $62 million to the Energy Department's solar and renewable energy programs. NO is the pro-environment vote. [Energy and Water appropriations, 6/16/99]

1994
McCain voted yes on a motion to table an amendment that would have added $33 million to renewable programs and decreased spending for nuclear weapons. NO is the pro-environment vote. [H.R. 4506, 6/30/94]

1991
McCain voted yes on an amendment to give states money for using more fuel; states investing is mass transit, car polling, HOV lanes, and programs to control congestion, energy consumption, and pollution would have their allocation of transportation funds decreased. NO is the pro-environment vote. [S.1204, 6/18/91]

New documentary from Harvard's Belfer Center

Dear Colleagues and Friends,

At the Belfer Center's Middle East Initiative (MEI), we're engaged in deepening the connection between Harvard Kennedy School (HKS) and the peoples and institutions of the region. One of the ways we do so is through experiential, on-site learning, which offers students the opportunity to travel to the Middle East and examine some of the region's most pressing public policy challenges. Experiential learning builds a bridge between the Kennedy School and the region, and between theory and practice. It also increases ownership over one's own learning, allows for the rapid transformation of previously-held conventions, and we hope acts as a conduit for enhanced exchange.

We are pleased to share with you a short documentary about the January 2015 experiential field study course in Jordan, led by Professor Claude Bruderlein, Strategic Advisor to the President of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC). This year's course, "Assessing Rehabilitation Needs of the Syrian Refugee Population in Jordan: Critical Review of the Regional and International Response" examined the synergies between public health, emergency humanitarian assistance, refugee and displacement issues, urban conflict, human rights, and other relevant domains of interest as they relate to the inflow of Syrian refugees in Jordan. For three weeks, students explored this case as a means to further professional dialogue, to build exchanges with practitioners in the region, and to shed light on the challenges of engaging in key dilemmas in the context of humanitarian action.

We hope you enjoy the documentary, and encourage you to learn more about MEI and how it is connecting HKS and the region on our website .

Warmly,

LOCKDOWN

THE STORY

There's been lots of Netflix marathoning and nail biting for citizens in Brussels this week. The city's been on lockdown for days.

WHAT'S GOING ON?

The city has been shutdown for days while police have carried out multiple raids to hunt down one of the suspects in the Paris attacks. Police are also trying to break up a terrorist cell in Brussels that they say poses an "imminent threat." Several people have been arrested in anti-terror raids over the past few days, and four have been charged with terrorism. Meanwhile, soldiers are patrolling mostly empty streets, while normal life has basically been put on pause.

ANYTHING ELSE?

This morning, Turkey shot down a Russian warplane near the Turkish-Syrian border. Turkey says that's because the jet violated its airspace and ignored multiple warnings. Russia says the plane never left Syria's airspace. Problem. Footage seems to show the jet's pilots parachuting out before the crash, but it's unclear where they are now. This plane went down near an area where Syrian President Assad – backed up by Russian airstrikes – has been fighting a rebel group that's friendly with Turkey. TBD on how this might affect relations between Turkey and its NATO buddies, and Russia.

In the wake of the Paris attacks, ISIS has continued to show its strength stretches beyond its Mideast borders. With the defacto capital of the European Union pretty much shut down, yesterday the US State Dept. issued a worldwide travel alert for US citizens for the first time in a year.

'm the captain now. Yesterday, Argentina got a new president. Mauricio Macri, the mayor of Buenos Aires, beat his opponent in a very close runoff race. Macri's election is a big deal because Argentina's been ruled by the same leftist party for years, and Macri's from the opposition party. The leftist party loved to spend heavily on social programs. But Argentina's economy hasn't been looking too hot, which is why people said 'let's change.' Literally, Macri's party is called the "Let's Change" coalition. During his campaign, he promised to roll back government spending, get rid of poverty, and appoint an economic cabinet – something the country's never had before. This election also has Wall Street's ears perking up. Some US hedge funds are waiting to be repaid for all those times when Argentina defaulted on debt it owed them. Macri says he's ready to negotiate. After winning the election, he asked the people of Argentina to "have some patience." And then read over his to-do list and started hyperventilating.

WHAT TO SAY WHEN YOUR GRANDMA FINALLY UNDERSTANDS SNAPCHAT...

Progress. Yesterday, scientists in California said they're one step closer to getting rid of malaria . NBD. The scientists have been genetically modifying mosquitos so that it's impossible for the bugs to spread malaria to humans. Malaria kills hundreds of thousands of people every year, most of them in sub-Saharan Africa. These Franken-mosquitos are still in the lab. But the aim is to release them into the wild so they can get it on with other mosquitos and pass on their anti-malaria genes. Apparently even eliminating malaria can be controversial. Critics say this could have "unpredictable ecological consequences." To which everyone else said "I see your ecological consequences, and raise you a Chris Pratt and 'Jurassic World.'"

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS, HOST: And the author of "Clinton Clash," Peter Schweizer, joins us now.

Thank you for joining us this morning, Peter.

You know, I was looking at the book jacket right here and you say that, here in the book jacket that your reporting raises serious and alarming questions about judgment of possible indebtedness to an array of foreign interests and ultimately, a fitness for high public office.

So how does your reporting show that Hillary Clinton may be unfit for the presidency?

PETER SCHWEIZER, AUTHOR, "CLINTON CLASH": Well, I think the real question here, George, is when you ever have an issue of the flow of funds to political candidates, whether that's to their campaigns, whether that's to private foundations, whether that's to their spouse, is there evidence of a pattern of -- of favorable decisions being made for those individuals?

And I think the -- the point that we make in the book is that there is a troubling pattern.

There are dozens of examples of that occurring.

Some people, I think particularly the Clinton camp, would say that these are all coincidence. I don't think, when you're talking about 12 instances, you're talking coincidence. I think you're talking trend.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But you take it pretty far. You write that, "The pattern of behavior is troubling enough to warrant further investigation by law enforcement (INAUDIBLE)."..

SCHWEIZER: Correct.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Do you have any evidence that a crime may have been committed?

SCHWEIZER: Well, I think it's -- if you look at a couple of recent examples. For example, Governor McConnell down in Virginia, or you look at Senator Menendez , in these cases, you didn't have evidence of a quid pro quo. What you had was funds flowing to elected officials, some of them gifts, some of them campaign contributions and actions that were being taken by those public officials that seemed to benefit the contributors.

Certainly, I think it warrants investigation. What that investigation will reveal, we'll see.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But a criminal investigation?

SCHWEIZER: Well, we'll see. I mean that's what the Governor McConnell has faced and that's what Menendez has faced.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But the...

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SCHWEIZER: And I think the evidence here is far more widespread in terms of repeated action than there were in those two instances.

STEPHANOPOULOS: As you know, the Clinton campaign says you haven't produced a shred of evidence that there was any official action as secretary that -- that supported the interests of donors.

SCHWEIZER: Well...

STEPHANOPOULOS: We've done investigative work here at ABC News, found no proof of any kind of direct action. And an independent government ethics expert, Bill Allison, of the Sunline Foundation (ph), wrote this. He said, "There's no smoking gun, no evidence that she changed the policy based on donations to the foundation."

No smoking gun.

Is there a smoking gun?

SCHWEIZER: Yes. The smoking gun is in the pattern of behavior. And here's the analogy I would give you. It's a little bit like insider trading . I wrote a book on Congressional insider trading a couple of years ago and talked with prosecutors.

Most people that engage in criminal insider trading don't send an e-mail that says I've got inside information, buy this stock.

The way they look at it, they look at a pattern of stock trades. If the person has access to that information and then they do a series of well-timed trades. That warrants investigation.

I think the same thing applies here.

By the way, what's important to note is it was confirmed on Thursday, both by "The New York Times" and "The Wall Street Journal," that there are multi-million dollar, non-disclosed donations that were made to the Clinton Foundation that were never disclosed by the Clintons.

This is a direct breach of an agreement they suggested with the White House.

STEPHANOPOULOS: That -- that is an issue for them, but it's not a criminal -- it's nothing that would warrant a cmii.

So let's look at some of the specifics behind your pattern.

SCHWEIZER: Sure.

STEPHANOPOULOS: A lot of focus on the sale of a company, Uranium One, to a -- to a Russian company. Of course, Frank Drisdra (ph), who had committed, what, a $130 million, a pledge to the Clinton Foundation back in 2006, had had an interest in this company.

But he actually sold it.

SCHWEIZER: Well, he sold his stock, but his firm, Endeavor Financial, continued to do finance deals well after that. And the individuals involved in the book, as you probably read, there are nine -- count them, nine major contributors to the Clinton Foundation who were involved in that nuclear deal.

The two individuals who were the financial advisers on the deal of the sale to the Russians, they're both major Clinton Foundation supporters. The chairman of that Foundation, Ian Telfer, whose donations were not disclosed, campaign -- and sorry, Clinton Foundation contributor. And there are others.

So this is not just about Frank Giustra. This is multiple layers (INAUDIBLE)...

STEPHANOPOULOS: OK, but you didn't disclose in your book that he had sold the interest.

SCHWEIZER: Yes.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Beyond that, this deal was approved by a -- a board of the government called the CFIUS Board.

SCHWEIZER: Correct.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

STEPHANOPOULOS: This actually chaired by the secretary of the Treasury...

SCHWEIZER: Correct.

STEPHANOPOULOS: -- not the secretary of State.

SCHWEIZER: Right.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Eight other agencies on board, the secretary of State, Homeland Security, Defense, Commerce...

SCHWEIZER: Right.

STEPHANOPOULOS: -- Energy, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission...

SCHWEIZER: Right.

STEPHANOPOULOS: -- signed off on it. And even though the State Department was one of nine agencies to sign off on it, there's no evidence at all that Hillary Clinton got directly involved in this decision.

SCHWEIZER: Well, I think it warrants further investigation. And there's a couple of things that need to be clarified.

Number one, she was one vote -- or the State Department was one vote on CFIUS. But any agency has veto power. So it needs to be unanimous. So they had to support this agreement.

The second thing that I would say is that in the midst of all of this, Hillary Clinton was in charge of the Russian reset. She was in charge of -- in -- of the A123 nuclear agreements with the Russians. She was the one that was meeting with Lavrov. There were four senior congressmen on national security issues that raised concerns about this issue...

STEPHANOPOULOS: But wait a second. There were nine different agencies...

SCHWEIZER: Sure.

STEPHANOPOULOS: -- who approved it.

Doesn't that suggest that that was because there was no national security concern, not because of some nefarious influence by Hillary Clinton?

SCHWEIZER: But -- but look at the nine individuals that were on the CFIUS committee, the nine agencies represented.

Who was, by far, the most hawkish on CFIUS issues in the past?

Hillary Clinton. She was big on rejecting the Dubai ports deal. She was big on other issues. She sponsored legislation when she was in the Senate to straighten CFIUS.

This was a signature issue for her and this is totally out of character...

STEPHANOPOULOS: But the assistant secretary who sat -- the assistant secretary of State who sat on the committee said she never intervened on any CFIUS issue at all.

SCHWEIZER: Well, I think that deserves further scrutiny. I would question that.

To argue that (INAUDIBLE)...

STEPHANOPOULOS: But based on what?

Based on what?

SCHWEIZER: Well, I think based on her (INAUDIBLE)...

STEPHANOPOULOS: Do you have any evidence that she actually intervened in this issue?

SCHWEIZER: No, we don't have direct evidence. But it warrants further investigation because, again, George, this is part of the broader pattern. You either have to come to the conclusion that these are all coincidences or something else is afoot.

STEPHANOPOULOS: And that -- that is that -- the Clintons do say it's a coincidence. As they say, you have produced no evidence. And I still haven't heard any direct evidence and you just said you had no evidence that she intervened here.

But I do want to ask a broader question.

It's been reported that you -- you briefed several Republicans on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, including the chairman, Bob Corker.

Did you offer any briefings for Democrats?

SCHWEIZER: No, but I'd be glad to give them before the book is released. This was a -- a friend that asked me. He thought it would be a good idea to talk to these individuals. This was the committee that confirmed her.

And I was glad to meet with them. They did not get copies of the book. They did not get any material. It was simply a verbal briefing.

And I'd be glad to brief any Democrats before May 5th, when the book comes out.

STEPHANOPOULOS: As you know, the Democrats have said this is -- this is an indication of your partisan interest. They say...

SCHWEIZER: Well...

STEPHANOPOULOS: -- you used to work for President -- President Bush as a speechwriter. You're funded by the Koch brothers.

How do you respond to that?

SCHWEIZER: Well, George, what did I do when this book was completed?

I went to the investigative unit at "The New York Times," the investigative unit here at ABC. I went to the investigative unit at "The Washington Post." And I shared with them my findings, OK. These are not cupcakes. These are serious researchers and investigators.

And they are confirming what I've reported. So people can look at the facts and...

STEPHANOPOULOS: They haven't come -- they haven't confirmed any evidence of any crime.

SCHWEIZER: Well, but -- but it's not up to an author to prove crime. I mean do you think that when people first started looking at Governor McConnell or they started looking at Menendez, that they immediately had evidence?

You need subpoena power. You need access to records and information. You need access to e-mails.

There's all sorts of things that you can do. You can't leave it up to an author to say that an author has to prove a criminal case.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Finally, Bloomberg News is reporting that you're going to be looking into Jeb Bush's business dealings, as well.

Is that true?

What have you found?

Where and when will you publish?

SCHWEIZER: We've been working on it for about four months. We've been looking at land deals. We've been looking at an airport deal. We've been looking at some financial transactions involving hedge funds based out of the UK.

We have already reached out to several media outlets and we're going to adopt a similar model that we have here, which is to share that information with investigative journalists at established news outlets, share with them that information.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And I think that people will find it very, very interesting and compelling.

Peter Schweizer, thanks very much.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Thanks for having me, George.

Up next, the roundtable on this Hillary book and augways (ph) from the campaign trail.

Plus, same-sex marriage coming to the Supreme Court this week.

Bruce Jenner's big announcement puts transgender issues in the spotlight. We debate the next frontier in civil rights.

And we're back in just two minutes.

Dear Bruce, can you please advise me on how to disabuse Senator Harkin's office that this is in any way the position of Consumer Directed IHSS Consumers in California. As you know so well, we had our own advocates meeting with Donna Aguilar of the Office of Management budget to let her know about how destructive the negative unintended consequences of the DOL rules deal well rules would be here in California and the widespread misery that would be created on the day it would be enacted. I will attach -mails during below of our communications to Donna Aguilar of OMB beneath your e-mail, so that Andrew Imperato might convey our true sentiments to the Senator.

> Subj: Revised Oped Unintended Consequences: Collateral Damage of the Homecare Rules

Dear Editor;

In your editorial, "Homecare Rules in the Homestretch," you fail to understand the reality of living on government funded Medicaid and the Russian Roulette pistol aimed at the heads of the Seniors, People with Disabilities and our Home Care Workers who depend on it, every year when budgets are cut. Although overtime pay would be great for IHSS providers, in publicly funded Medicaid programs, states that are cutting IHSS (In Home Supportive Services) are not likely to provide overtime pay and will instead most likely cut hours worked above 160 hours a month for any one provider. There is a big move to push through these Department of Labor rules as written right now with no consideration of how they'll really play out in the homes of Seniors and People with Disabilities and their Caregivers in New York and California where people have over 159 hours of IHSS a month.

I know of a proud union member, a mother over 60, who has multiple disabilities of her own and takes care of her adult son with athetoid cerebral palsy who will see her household income of about $2520 a month in California drop to $1431, as her hours are cut from 280 hours a month to 160 hours. She doesn't have the stamina to supplement her income with more jobs and she has trouble finding other caregivers because her son cannot be understood very well by others. The union has taken over $40 a month from her for check each month to lobby for what will cut her income by a pretty big fraction. 70% of the caregivers in California are family members whose households stay intact with IHSS. A cut in hours can threaten their ability to stay in their homes. Seniors and People with Disabilities with Live in Caregivers will be uprooted as well. Jerry Brown just got done settling a lawsuit trying to cut the IHSS program in California by 20% and settled for cutting it by about 8 percent. Do you really think he's going to take time and a half for over 50,000 providers? His representative on an Olmsted conference said they wouldn't.

When I was in the Young Socialist Alliance in college, before I had my accident, I believed in theories in a vacuum. Then I became disabled and saw how these things work out on a real-life level. In California, we have the most highly advanced In-Home Supportive Services program, and the reason it was so good is that the disabled person received money to find somebody and all of that money went directly to the caregiver. The attendant got all the bang for the buck. And while ADAPT American Disabled for Attendant Programs Today was fighting to get In Home Care, this wonderful program to all the states, they came up with things like "Money Follows the Person" and "Community First Choice Option" where that money continued to go to the disabled person to pay directly to their caregiver with no middleman.

But suddenly all kinds of profiteering is going on as big bad corporations and yes even sometimes big bad unions behaviors are immerging as monied interests smell a beautiful dollar to be made in the graying of the baby boomers. On a good day the union is our greatest blessing on a bad day they are our greatest curse. The only way to come up with a reasonable solution that takes everyone's welfare into account is to sit down and work it out. I think what's been most frightening to me in all of this is the ease with which able-bodied regard People with Disabilities as invisible. The SEIU would not even sit down at the table with People with Disabilities to work out a compromise. Would this happen to a person of color? Are we the last population to be seen as a fraction of a person -- or a person who is really there at all?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

People have been making industries of people with disabilities for decades, in the nursing home industry, the charity industry, and now the medical industrial complex and the unions too on a bad day. People from ADAPT clawed our ways out of nursing homes that were profiteering off of us and now we have to fight against the nursing agency industry, managed care corporations, and even at times a union that is so out of touch with its rank and file providers needs that it would create three crappy jobs from one not so good one in order to collect two or three union dues on a one house. It is the people disabilities and rank-and-file providers, who are in a symbiotic relationship, huddled together to keep industries and unions from objectifying us and moving us around like "furniture" in their business plans. You can choose to be naïve and come up with lovely little fairy lands in your own mind, but make no mistake, your naïveté will be paid for by the rank-and-file workers whose pay will be cut badly and people with disabilities who will go back to nursing homes.

The ADAPT-NCIL compromise would simply eliminate the exemption for third party employers, treating Medicaid consumers in consumer directed programs (including public authorities, fiscal intermediaries and agencies with choice) the same as private employers so they can still use the existing exemption. According to the DOL analysis, this change - alone - would eliminate the companionship exemption for 70% of home care workers. It covers all of the "bad players" and concerns raised in the DOL analysis that exist in traditional home care while minimizing the negative impact on people with disabilities and preventing the unexpected consequences such changes would have on real live people in Medicaid funded programs.

Where were our points of view in this newspaper? In the DOL discussions? Why include us? It's only our bodies, our civil rights, our freedom from living lives akin to political prisoners in iinstitutions! If anyone had any respect for people with disabilities we would have included us in the discussion.

Subject: Home Care Rules in the Home Stretch

What this NY Times editorial fails to acknowledge is that California has had the most generous home care program for poor people in the United States for several decades - In-Home Supportive Services. Today, IHSS pays about 380,000 home care workers - 72 percent of whom are family members - to serve about 440,000 people. Throughout that time, the workers have been paid minimum wage. The issue in California is how the OVERTIME regs will affect both IHSS consumers and workers. Neither your analysis nor that of the DOL has considered that as drafted these regs will significantly damage this consumer-directed program. Yes. The state of California AND many IHSS consumers and workers oppose these regs on monetary grounds. Because they point toward both service reductions and less income for households where family workers provide the assistance. We are not part of the home care AGENCY industry world. But none of you have truly understood the uniqueness of IHSS and the unnecessary damage these regs will perpetrate.

Dear Ms. Echols, please forgive me for the informality of sending you this e-mail string, but I think it will give you some background on some of the concerns those of us who are and advocate for Seniors and Persons with Disabilities in California: The IHSS Consumers Union, The San Francisco Public Authority, Members of the Managed-Care Committee of the Los Angeles County Public Authority and the Arc of California, the largest membership association for all people with intellectual and developmental disabilities and their families would very much like to speak with you. We have serious concerns regarding the unintended negative consequences that could occur for Seniors and Persons with Disabilities in the state of California if the Department of Labor rules regarding the Companionship Exemption are applied to publicly funded Medicaid programs.

Thank you for your dedication in serving our country.

Sincerely

In California where 70% of caregivers are family providers, IHSS makes it possible for families to stay intact when they have a senior family member or a family members with a disability, who needs in-home care. These families could see their household income drop dramatically. Significantly disabled people with over 160 hours could lose loyal live-in and live out caregivers they've had for decades, because their work hours will be cut below the money they need to live. Or people with severe disabilities may not be able to get providers to help them when one of the providers needs to leave, because the remaining providers will be in danger working overtime. The unintended consequences of this unbalanced approach to the way private and public in-home supportive services are paid could lead to widespread misery in publicly funded In-Home Supportive Services.

Senior and Disability Rights Advocates were not included in discussions where these Department of Labor rules were developed. Now, the National Council on Disability is trying to explain this to those who can make a difference. Their letter is printed below. The NCIL/ADAPT compromise could be a win-win solution for everyone, where privately funded agencies would have different rules than in publicly funded Medicaid In-Home Supportive Services in states where finite revenues determine what can be paid. "Our compromise creates a win-win solution, covers 70% of attendants and allows us all to be at the table for further discussion," says Bruce Darling of CDR ADAPT.

Below see the Letter from the National Council on Disability about these possible negative unintended consequences. http://www.ncd.gov/publications/2013/03192013/ The Disability and Senior communities and the rank-and-file IHSS providers in New York and California do not seem to of been fully informed or permitted to give input about the impact of this law as written. If after reading this letter, you feel the Office of Management and Budget should delay changing these rules until they consult with Disability And Senior Communities and make sure it won't cut the number of hours providers are permitted to work in publicly funded programs, then sign the petition at the link above or make your comments here at Capitol Hill's Congress blog http://thehill.com/blogs/congress-blog/economy-a-budget/286539-act-now-on-fair-wages-for-home-care-aides and DIRECT letters to letters@nytimes.com

As more sign-on letters are developed for the Office of Management and Budget OMB, we will give you other opportunities to voice your opinions, but time is running short before these proposed laws will become what we try to live with. From Michael Condon – STOP THE UNINTENDED CONSEQUENCES

My name is Michael Condon I'm a disabled Veteran, paralyzed from the neck down for the last 40 years. I live in San Diego, CA, in a home I rent,and I am assisted by a caregiver paid for by In-Home Supported Services (IHSS). IHSS employs nearly 400,000 caregivers across the State. Almost 50% of these caregivers currently work more than 40 hrs/week. In addition, 70% of the IHSS caregivers in this program care for family members, many of whom require protective supervision (24 /7 care).

The State has neither the funds nor the inclination to pay overtime. This will put me, and hundreds of thousands like me, at risk of institutionalization. Because our caregivers will be limited to a 40 work week, I will be forced to have multiple caregivers while there are already not enough to meet the current need. Please do not institute the DOL regs. requiring overtime. The disabled, elderly and blind on ...this program would love to have their caregivers receive time and a half, but that will not happen. What will happen (unintended consequences) instead, the caregivers hours will be cut driving many deeper into poverty. The caregiver loses, the senior/disabled loses and the Unions almost double their membership dues.

Sincerely.

Michael Condon

This is why a 40 hour work week mandate is bad. It will be financially devastating to 46% of IHSS IP's (190,000 workers)in CA alone.

IF YOU CAREABOUT OUR ABILITY TO LIVE IN THE COMMUNITY AND OUR CAREGIVERS NOT TO GET THEIR HOURS CUT IN HALF, SHOW US THE MONEY!

by Philip Bennett
Petition Organizer
I ask all who signed my petition to please call the White House (202-456-1414) & ask for the Office of Information & Regulatory Affairs (OIRA) at the Office of Management and Budget (OMB). OMB is currently reviewing the FLSA change & is set to release it April 1st. We need to tell OMB to reject it & thereby save home care workers & the people we assist. Comments can be made to OMB through OIRA.
The name of the regulation is FLSA Domestic Service Regs (29CFR 552 and the ID at OMB is RIN# 1235-AA05
Unfortunately that phone number is not released to the public so we must call the White House switch board. For more information call me, Philip Bennett: 718-339-0404
And please share my petition with as many people as possible. I love my job & I want to afford to keep doing it & I don't want to see more people forced into nursing homes. Thank you!

Please forward to Brenda Aguilar. Thank you.

Statement of Frank Giustra

POSTED ON APRIL 23, 2015 BY FRANK GIUSTRA
CATEGORY FRANK GIUSTRA ,

A book that has not yet been published has caused the New York Times to publish a wildly speculative, innuendo-laced article about the Clinton Foundation and my role in contributing money to it. There is not one shred of evidence to back up the Times' conclusions. This is not about me, but rather an attempt to tear down Secretary Clinton and her presidential campaign. If this is what passes for investigative journalism in the United States, it is very sad.
The facts do not comport with the story in the New York Times. The reporter, Jo Becker, wrote a similar piece in 2008, which was eventually debunked by Forbes. http://www.forbes.com/2009/01/12/giustra-clinton-kazakhstan-pf-ii-in_rl_0912croesus_inl.html
I began working on financing the purchase of mining stakes from a private Kazakh company in early 2005. The purchase was concluded in late 2005.
In late 2005, I went to Kazakhstan to finish the negotiations of the sale. Bill Clinton flew to Almaty a few days after I arrived in the country on another person's plane, not on my plane, as the Times reported. Bill Clinton had nothing to do with the purchase of private mining stakes by a Canadian company.
I sold all of my stakes in the uranium company – Uranium One – in the fall of 2007, after it merged with another company. I would note that those were sold at least 18 months before Hillary Clinton became the Secretary of State. No one was speculating at that time that she would become the Secretary of State.
Other media outlets have insinuated that I influenced the decision by the U.S. to sign a free trade agreement with Colombia. At one point, I was an investor in Pacific Rubiales, a Colombian energy company. I sold my shares in Pacific Rubiales several years before the U.S.-Colombia Free Trade Agreement, which, I will note, was approved by several U.S. agencies and the White House. To theorize that I had anything to do with that is sheer conjecture.
I hope that the U.S. media can start to focus on the real challenges of the world and U.S. society. Focus on poverty, homelessness, infrastructure, health care, education, or fractious world politics. You are a great country. Don't ruin it by letting those with political agendas take over your newspapers and your airwaves.
I am extremely proud of the work that we have done at the Clinton Giustra Enterprise Partnership. Thousands of people, all over the world, have been helped by this initiative. I plan to continue that work long after the harsh glare of this week's media stories has faded.

Handshake for Obama and Raúl Castro of Cuba [Julie Hirschfeld Davis & Randal C. Archibold, NYT, April 10, 2015]

President Obama and President Raúl Castro of Cuba shook hands here on Friday night, and American officials said they would hold discussions on Saturday during a gathering of regional leaders, in the first full-fledged meeting between presidents of the United States and Cuba in more than a half-century

PANAMA CITY, Panama — President Obama and President Raúl Castro of Cuba shook hands here on Friday night, and American officials said they would hold discussions on Saturday during a gathering of regional leaders, in the first full-fledged meeting between presidents of the United States and Cuba in more than a half-century.

The expected encounter was not on Mr. Obama's official schedule, but it held deep significance for the regional meeting, as the president's move to ease tensions with Cuba has overshadowed the official agenda.

Mr. Obama is nearing a decision on removing Cuba's three-decade-old designation as a state sponsor of terrorism, citing progress in the effort to re-establish diplomatic ties after half a century of hostilities.

He spoke by telephone with Mr. Castro before the gathering, and on Thursday, Secretary of State John Kerry met with Bruno Rodríguez, the Cuban foreign minister — the highest-level session between the governments in more than 50 years — to lay the groundwork for the advancing reconciliation. The much-anticipated handshake on Friday night came as leaders gathered for a welcome dinner, where Mr. Obama and Mr. Castro were seated at the same table, separated by two other people.

Before the official start of the summit meeting, Mr. Obama spoke at a civil society forum. "As we move toward the process of normalization, we'll have our differences government-to-government with Cuba on many issues, just as we differ at times with other nations within the Americas," he said. "There's nothing wrong with that, but I'm here to say that when we do speak out, we're going to do so because the United States of America does believe, and will always stand for, a certain set of universal values."

The president rushed through a packed schedule on Friday as the summit meeting got underway, beginning his day with a tour of the Panama Canal.

At a forum with business executives Mr. Obama promoted a $1 billion investment package he has proposed for Central America in an effort to address the causes of the surge of immigrants across America's southern border last summer. "The more we see our economies as mutually dependent rather than a zero-sum game, I think the more successful all of us will be," he said.

Mr. Obama made it clear that he still had human rights concerns and was determined to discuss them openly. He held a lengthy meeting with civil society leaders from 12 other countries, including two from Cuba, after a speech at the forum in which he referred to the American civil rights and gay rights movements and to people who opposed apartheid in South Africa and Communism in the Soviet Union.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Civil society is the conscience of our countries," he said.

Cuba is attending the Summit of the Americas for the first time since the meeting's inception in 1994. As senior Cuban and American officials spoke, people representing pro- and anti-Cuban government groups clashed for the third straight day on the sidelines, drawing a contrast with the diplomatic warming.

Hours before Mr. Obama arrived to address the civil society forum at a hotel here, members of groups sent by the Cuban government tried to block access to dissidents, calling them mercenaries who did not speak for Cuba.

At one point, amid angry chanting by the various groups, one of Cuba's best-known government opponents, Guillermo Farinas, was jostled and manhandled as he tried to pass through a crowd of pro-Castro demonstrators.

"These aren't really dissidents, they aren't really interested in democracy and human rights," Patricia Flechilla, a Cuban student and delegate at the summit meeting, told reporters, going on to repeat a familiar complaint from the Cuban government that opponents are paid and propped up by foreign governments, namely the United States.

The fracas interrupted the work of the forum, made up of nongovernmental groups from across the hemisphere, to produce a statement directed at the region's leaders.

Later, before Mr. Obama arrived, scores of people waving Cuban flags and chanting "Long Live Fidel, Long Live Raúl" gathered outside the hotel.

Santiago Canton, executive director of RFK Partners for Human Rights at the Robert F. Kennedy Center for Justice and Human Rights, said the presence of Cuba at the summit meeting would inevitably lead to discord that only highlighted the lack of democracy and human rights on the island. "People were sent by the Cuban government to disrupt everything going on, and they are doing that well," he said after observing the clash. "Human rights and democracy are weak points on the Cuban side."

Representatives of the Cuban delegation said they would withdraw from the civil society forum rather than "share space with mercenaries."

Hillary Clinton to Announce 2016 Run for President on Sunday [Amy Chozick and Maggie Haberman, NYT, April 10, 2015]

Hillary Clinton's campaign launch is expected to take a slow path forward, starting with a visit to Iowa on Sunday.
The prolonged prologue to Hillary Rodham Clinton's second run for the White House will reach its suspenseless conclusion on Sunday: The former secretary of state, senator and first lady is to announce that she will indeed seek the Democratic nomination for president.
Mrs. Clinton is expected to begin her campaign with a video message on social media, followed by a visit to important early-primary states next week, said two people briefed on her plans.
But for all the attention paid to how Mrs. Clinton would reveal her 2016 candidacy, little has been said about her reasons for mounting another presidential bid. Her campaign rollout is expected to provide voters, particularly users of Twitter, Facebook and other social media, a succinct rationale that she is best positioned to address an American electorate that has seen virtually stagnant wages for middle-income earners over the last 15 years.
A fresh epilogue to Mrs. Clinton's 2014 memoir, "Hard Choices," posted on The Huffington Post Friday morning, signaled a number of elements of what is very likely to be a familiar feature of her campaign message: evoking her new status as a grandmother to talk about creating opportunities for all Americans.
"I'm more convinced than ever that our future in the 21st century depends on our ability to ensure that a child born in the hills of Appalachia or the Mississippi Delta or the Rio Grande Valley grows up with the same shot at success that Charlotte will," Mrs. Clinton wrote, referring to her new granddaughter.
Mrs. Clinton will begin testing that and other themes in earnest beginning on Sunday and stretching through next week when she travels to Iowa and later this month to New Hampshire for a series of small-scale events where she can field questions and address the concerns of the voters her campaign calls "everyday Americans," people made aware of her plans said.
In the early months of the Democratic primary contest, Mrs. Clinton's campaign hopes to capture some of the magic of her successful 2000 run for the Senate in New York, when she worked to show some of the common touch that had helped catapult her husband to the White House. Her governing principle in the 2000 campaign was demonstrating that she would work hard to earn every vote.
Mrs. Clinton's team is also planning a slow expansion of its staff over the course of the year, deliberately avoiding the appearance of a battleship heading into the fight, as her organization seemed on her entry into the 2008 Democratic campaign. Back then, Mrs. Clinton arrived at some events in Iowa on a chartered aircraft called the "Hill-A-Copter" that made her campaign seem presumptuous.

But even as Mrs. Clinton attempts to set aside her celebrity and offer herself as a fighter for ordinary voters, her finance team and the outside groups supporting her candidacy have started collecting checks in what is expected to be a $2.5 billion effort, dwarfing the vast majority of her would-be rivals in both parties.

The Clinton campaign's fund-raising staff and other aides have already started working out of a new headquarters in Brooklyn, with almost the entire team working there on Friday.

Mrs. Clinton has fielded advice from more than 200 policy experts in formulating her economic agenda and still has not settled on the details. Rather than deliver a robust policy speech immediately, she intends to ease into presenting her ideas for alleviating the growing gap between rich and poor and for increasing wages, said several people involved in her plans. The slow pace will allow her to continue to generate news coverage as Republican presidential hopefuls engage in heated debates in their crowded primary field.

But the essence of Mrs. Clinton's message has become clearer and was reiterated in the new epilogue of her memoir on Friday. "You shouldn't have to be the granddaughter of a president or a secretary of state to receive excellent health care, education, enrichment, and all the support and advantages that will one day lead to a good job and a successful life," she wrote.

Many factors played into the timing of Mrs. Clinton's announcement. Senator Marco Rubio of Florida, whom Mrs. Clinton's advisers are watching closely as a potential opponent, staked a claim on Monday as his announcement date. Mrs. Clinton's announcement on Sunday will certainly draw attention from Mr. Rubio's entry into the race and could well eclipse it.

Some in her campaign are betting that Democrats will applaud the show of force against a Republican. (Others involved insisted the date was selected before Mr. Rubio scheduled his event, but said that the juxtaposition was an added bonus.)

Mrs. Clinton's advisers are holding a conference call for her entire staff on Saturday afternoon, according to two people briefed about it. For all the planning that went into Sunday's event, her team has been working feverishly in recent days, another sign of how the campaign's infrastructure has been slow to take shape.

In Bill Clinton White House, Hillary Clinton's staff helped push on gay rights [Josh Gerstein, POLITICO, April 10, 2015]

The records released by the National Archives at the Clinton Library here Thursday demonstrate that Hillary Clinton's staff took a progressive stand on other gay-rights issues and helped push to torpedo anti-gay-rights legislation.

LITTLE ROCK —Newly-disclosed documents show President Bill Clinton's White House engulfed in a political firestorm over gay marriage in the mid-1990s, but they offer no indication that Hillary Clinton pushed her husband to abandon his opposition to such unions or to veto the Defense of Marriage Act, which he signed two months before his re-election in 1996.

The records released by the National Archives at the Clinton Library here Thursday demonstrate that Hillary Clinton's staff took a progressive stand on other gay-rights issues and helped push to torpedo anti-gay-rights legislation.

Story Continued Below

The saga of the Clinton White House's handling of the Defense of Marriage Act, which was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court two years ago, remains a bitter one for some gay activists. But the more than 5,000 White House documents made public for the first time Thursday offer what could be a political silver lining for Hillary Clinton as she prepares to announce her second presidential bid.

The files show several of her staffers lobbied actively on behalf of the gay community during her husband Bill's White House tenure, while presidential aides debated how to position him on key issues given his personal opposition to same-sex unions.

In an August 2000 memo, domestic policy aide Ann O'Leary — a liaison between Hillary Clinton's office and President Bill Clinton's policy staff — pushed for government-wide vetting of an executive order to ban federal contractors from discriminating on the basis of sexual orientation. Writing to Clinton Domestic Policy Adviser Bruce Reed, O'Leary said such a directive could be modeled on a 1941 order by President Franklin Roosevelt that banned racial discrimination by contractors.

An order forbidding contractors from discriminating against gays and lesbians was eventually issued by the White House, but not until last year — some two presidencies later. "Many of you have worked for a long time to see this day coming," President Barack Obama said when he signed the order.

spearheaded by Rep. Steve Largent (R-Okla.) to prevent unmarried couples from adopting children in Washington, D.C. The measure passed the House in 1998, but was later dropped from an appropriations bill. In 1999, it was narrowly defeated in a floor vote.

The files underscore how dramatically the politics of same-sex marriage have changed over two decades. Most national-level Democratic politicians now fully embrace gay marriage rights, and the Supreme Court is set to hear a case later this month that could guarantee recognition of same-sex marriages nationwide.

But back in 1996, Bill Clinton's aides wrestled at length over the issue before he signed DOMA, the law banning gay couples from receiving federal benefits and declaring that states did not have to recognize same-sex marriages from other states.

The records show the legislation caused political heartburn for the Clinton White House, which was caught between the president's stated opposition to same-sex marriage and a desire to keep his gay and lesbian supporters enthusiastic about his unfolding re-election campaign.

While there appears to have been little discussion of Clinton vetoing the DOMA bill in 1996, some White House aides urged a softer line against gay marriage and a full embrace of civil unions.

However, in April of that year, Clinton personally approved talking points framing same-sex marriage as a threat to traditional marriage.

"The institutions of traditional marriage and family face tremendous pressures in today's society," says a memo from White House Counsel Jack Quinn bearing Clinton's trademark left-handed check mark on the "AGREE" line. "We must do everything we can to support and strengthen these institutions."

The talking points — sent to the Oval Office for clearance in response to a request from a gay magazine, The Advocate — note that Clinton "has previously said that he does not personally support same-sex marriages."

The memo strikes a neutral tone towards discussions about civil unions, supporting the idea of non-discrimination while again suggesting such efforts could undermine male-female marriages or offend religious beliefs.

"The challenge in addressing these issues is to remain sensitive to the traditional values of our communities while preserving the fundamental right to live free from unjustified discrimination," the position paper said.

One memo released Thursday shows that two White House aides who served as liaisons to the gay and lesbian community, Director of Presidential Personnel Marsha Scott and domestic policy aide Richard Socarides, urged Clinton to publicly oppose the GOP bill.

"We have been extremely successful in rebuilding our relationships to our friends in the gay and lesbian communities despite the fiasco of gays in the military, the disjointed handling of the Colorado case [at the Supreme Court over an anti-gay-rights measure], and the President's stated personal opposition to gay marriage," Scott and Socarides wrote in a May 1996 memo addressed to Deputy Chief of Staff Harold Ickes. "Our support for this bill would be taken by many in the gay communities as an expression by the President of deep ceded [sic] bias against gay people."

They urged that Clinton reaffirm his "strong personal opposition to same-sex marriage…but oppose this bill as an intrusion on what for over 200 years has been the prerogative of state legislatures."

It's unclear if such proposals ever reached Clinton. Other top aides, including Scott, eventually argued to Clinton that he could not oppose DOMA without appearing to renege on his opposition to same-sex marriage.

"Given your stated and longstanding opposition to gay marriage, we believe there would not be a substantive basis for you not to sign the proposed legislation if it were to be adopted by Congress," White House Counsel Jack Quinn, Communications Adviser George Stephanopoulous and Scott sent to Clinton in May 1996.

The records indicate Clinton saw that memo, but they do not show explicit action. However, another set of talking points approved by Clinton that month take a fairly hard line against any federal recognition for same-sex marriage.

"The President has long opposed gay marriage based on his belief that the institution of marriage should be reserved for unions between one man and one woman," says a statement bearing Clinton's check mark and a "THE PRESIDENT HAS SEEN" stamp. The points go on to say that Clinton strongly opposes "unfair discrimination….but he does not believe that the federal government should promote gay marriages [and] does not believe it is appropriate for federal resources to be devoted to providing spousal benefits to partners in gay and lesbian relationships."

When the White House signaled that Clinton would sign the bill, many gay and lesbian advocates were furious, viewing the move as pre-election pandering. "This is being seen as a clear and calculated signal from the White House that we are abandoning the gay and lesbian constituencies," Scott wrote in an email to White House political aide Eric Fanning.

The documents also show that senior presidential aides made a series of confusing and contradictory statements about gay marriage as the issue intensified in late 1995 and early 1996, with brewing legal fights and a Republican plan to press for passage of DOMA.

"The president doesn't think that same-sex marriage should be outlawed," Deputy Press Secretary Ginny Terzano said in December 1995. The quote featured in a Newsweek article grabbed the attention of Socarides, who circulated it among White House staffers.

Some in the White House also flagged comments by Scott, who told a gay audience in early 1996 that the administration was looking "for ways to ensure that those of you in loving, long-term and committed relationships can enjoy all the same benefits that [heterosexual couples] are entitled to under the law."

"Came up at 7:30 meeting this morning," Deputy White House Counsel Kathleen Wallman wrote, sending a Washington Times article about Scott's comments to White House Counsel Jack Quinn and another lawyer in the office, Steve Neuwirth. "Not really our message."

For her part, Scott sent a memo to Vice President Al Gore criticizing White House Press Secretary Mike McCurry for linking Clinton's DOMA opposition to his view that "this is a time when we need to do things to strengthen the American family."

"This…is not the President's position," she wrote.

As public support for gay marriage has evolved , Clinton has cast his signing of DOMA as a kind of defensive measure taken in the face of overwhelming opposition to same-sex marriage in Congress and the likelihood of an override or even a constitutional amendment if he vetoed the legislation. However, among gay activists, the episode has long contributed to an ambivalence about Clinton, who took historic steps as president on behalf of the gay community but sometimes seemed to be triangulating on the issue.

Clinton critics note that despite his claim that he reluctantly signed DOMA, his re-election campaign advertised that fall on Christian radio stations in 15 states touting his approval.

More recently, both Clintons have grown more receptive to same-sex marriage and have gradually turned around on DOMA as well.

After saying in 2000 as a Senate candidate from New York that she would have voted for DOMA, Hillary Clinton said in 2007 she favored repealing part of the law that blocked federal benefits.

Bill Clinton also distanced himself from DOMA, before repudiating it altogether in 2013 and urging the Supreme Court to overturn the legislation, which said had become a vehicle for discrimination. Three months after Clinton's reversal, the high court ruled the law unconstitutional in a 5-4 vote.

The newly-public library records also show one young woman's brief and successful drive to overturn a Clinton White House policy of not sending presidential greetings — or any acknowledgement at all — to invites from couples holding commitment ceremonies.

"I've learned that when an invitation comes in from a same-sex couple the volunteers put it in a question box which staff go through….No greeting is sent, nor is the couple responded to in any way," White House Deputy Director for Presidential Inquiries Kelley Van Auken wrote in a September 1999 email to more senior staffers. "I think a greeting should be sent. I understand that it is not my beliefs that should determine what type of cards are sent, as they come from the President, but I think sending a card would fit in with this administration's policies. He did sign the DOMA, and therefore we would not be able to send the wedding greeting."

Van Auken went on to argue that sending some good wishes would not be a substantive policy change. "They are not asking for a card congratulating them on their 'legal marriage ceremony.' Perhaps I'm playing with semantics, but I don't think some sort of recognition of this is too much to ask for," she added, urging that such couples be sent what volunteers referred to as a Special Day card.

The issue was eventually escalated to an openly gay aide to Clinton, Staff Secretary Sean Maloney (now a Congressman from New York), who was "very much in favor" of the change. Within less than a month, couples began receiving cards that read: "Hillary and I are delighted to join your family and friends in sending congratulations as you celebrate this special occasion. Best wishes for much continued happiness. — Bill Clinton."

Van Auken was just 22 at the time and later became an aide to Rep. Susan Davis (D-Calif.). Van Auken died last year at the age of 37, according to the San Diego Union-Tribune.

Hillary Clinton to announce 2016 bid Sunday with video [Brianna Keilar & Jeff Zeleny, CNN, April 10, 2015]

Hillary Clinton will launch her presidential campaign Sunday with a video on social media announcing her candidacy, followed immediately by campaign travel to build on the announcement, according to a source close to Clinton's campaign in waiting.

Hillary Clinton will launch her presidential campaign Sunday with a video on social media announcing her candidacy, followed immediately by travel to build on the announcement, according to a source close to Clinton's campaign in waiting.

Her first stop will likely be to the early caucus state of Iowa, according to the source.

Observers see the likely visit to Iowa as a show of humility by Clinton, who came in third in the 2008 caucuses and who, so far, has dominated the likely Democratic field for 2016.

Clinton has already filmed her campaign video, a person close to the campaign said, which outlines the central themes of her second bid for the White House. The message is intended to send a signal to Democrats that she intends to aggressively fight for the party's presidential nomination.

The decision will sweep aside more than a year of speculation about her political aspirations and allow her to start making her case to voters. Advisers say she knows that Democratic activists are not interested in a coronation and she intends to campaign as though she has a tough primary challenge.

Central to Clinton's second presidential run will be reintroducing the former first lady -- on her own terms -- to the American people. Democrats close to Clinton have started to call her the most unknown famous person in the world. Their argument is that people know of Clinton -- she has near 100% name recognition in most polls -- but they don't know her story.

Clinton is expected to trade big rallies for a series of smaller events with voters, as she seeks to reintroduce herself to voters. Her supporters have urged Clinton to take the time to meet voters one-on-one and build their trust.

"The views about women candidates and how they should conduct themselves has really changed since 2008," said Bonnie Campbell, the co-chair of Clinton's 2008 campaign in Iowa. "First and foremost people vote for candidates that they like, people who connect with them emotionally. I think that helps with everybody but certainly it helps with women and the men who love them. It just makes her a more complete person."

Clinton's presidential campaign has long been a foregone conclusion, and speculation that she would take another shot at the White House has followed the former first lady since she left the State Department in early 2013.

For much of the last two years, Clinton has crisscrossed the country delivering paid speeches, selling her new memoir and stumping for Democrats during the 2014 midterm elections.

In the coming weeks and months, the Clinton campaign will look to hone in on that story, using themes such as Clinton's Midwestern upbringing, her mother's perseverance in the face of neglectful parents and Clinton's own time raising a daughter to cast the presidential hopeful in a more favorable, softer light than she was seen during her 2008 presidential run.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Campbell said she saw voters in Iowa light up when they connected with Clinton in coffee shops and in their homes, but those events were few and far between compared to large rallies and speeches. She said Clinton's empathetic side was not seen nearly enough during her 2008 campaign.

"Somehow, that did not come through in Iowa," Campbell said.

But her efforts to introduce herself come as Clinton is fighting fresh questions about her trust and honesty. The controversy about using a private email server while Secretary of State has already caused some political damage, her aides concede, which is one of the reasons she is jumping into the race to start campaigning on her own terms.

March found Clinton at the center of her own controversy over her exclusive use of private -- rather than official -- email during her time running the State Department. The controversy, again seized on by Republican critics, escalated, and Clinton took to a quickly organized press conference at the United Nations to respond to controversy.

Hillary Clinton skeptics fear 'an unstoppable train' [Gabriel DeBendetti, POLITICIO, April 10, 2015]

Concerns mount that Hillary Clinton's 2016 campaign will be no different than her '08 campaign.
It's gotten to this point: Even the Democratic Party's Hillary skeptics are resigned to her being the party's nominee.
"I don't see a path for anyone not named Clinton," declared former New Mexico Governor Bill Richardson, who served as United Nations ambassador under Bill Clinton before running against Hillary in 2008.
"You know I don't get along with her," he noted, by way of explanation. "I'm not a Ready for Hillary person. I'm trying to be honest with you."

Added Bob Shrum, the veteran liberal strategist whose list of presidential candidates (Al Gore, John Kerry) does not include anyone named Clinton: "Assuming she remains healthy and runs the kind of campaign she will run, I don't see anyone beating her."

Their conclusions are based on a range of factors, from Clinton's standing in the polls to her formidable fundraising potential. But there's another one: None of her potential challengers appear to have the will and/or the ability to beat her.

Still, as Clinton prepares to announce her campaign on Sunday, there's a pervasive feeling among unaligned Democrats and Clinton loyalists alike that at least one of the possible challengers will take the plunge and creep up to 20 or 25 percent in the polls — enough to give her a scare. It's still a waiting game, though, because there's no such consensus on a few critical questions.

Namely: who, when and how.

Former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley, former Virginia senator Jim Webb, and Vermont senator Bernie Sanders — the trio who have shown the greatest interest in mounting a challenge to Clinton — face a steep path, Democratic operatives say, while the two most famous names mentioned as potential challengers — Vice President Joe Biden and Massachusetts Senator Elizabeth Warren — seem increasingly far from running.

Lincoln Chafee, the former Rhode Island senator and governor, emerged in the last few days to stake a possible claim to be the Clinton alternative, raising Warren-like concerns about Clinton's closeness to Wall Street. But he's a maverick whose shift from Republican to independent to Democrat is unlikely to excite the progressive base.

Nonetheless, the array of party operatives, Clinton allies, and former Democratic presidential candidates who spoke with POLITICO described a path for any of the would-be challengers similar to the ones O'Malley and Chafee are trying to blaze: Distinguish themselves from Clinton on a series of policy points, mostly by running to her left — and then, simply due to the structure of the first-in-the-nation Iowa caucus, one of them would likely approach a 30 percent showing. But nearly every figure also cautioned that, given Clinton's lead in polls and in organizing throughout the country, the path forward for any other candidate would be treacherous.

Nonetheless, the situation on the ground does not mirror 2007, when Clinton was overtaken by a rush of support and money that flowed to the upstart Barack Obama. By mid-April 2007, both Clinton and Barack Obama were both polling in the 20-to-40 percent range nationally.

"It would take a formidable, inspirational candidate" to seriously challenge Clinton now, says Richardson, who himself was at around 3 percent in April 2007, and who added that O'Malley has emailed him to talk about foreign policy. "I think while

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

O'Malley is developing as a good candidate, I don't see the mix for a dramatic alternative there."

That's largely because Richardson's 3 percent in 2007 is roughly three times higher than O'Malley's 1 percent in the RealClearPolitics national polling average through March of this year. That leaves him alongside Webb's 1 percent and behind Sanders's 4 percent. Clinton's 60 is trailed by Biden's and Warren's 12 percent, despite the former's lack of political organization and the latter's repeated insistence that she will not run. The numbers are similar in Iowa and New Hampshire, the first two states to vote in the primary contest.

Nonetheless, Clinton aides point to O'Malley as the most viable alternative candidate, believing he will eventually pick up support from many of the liberal activists currently urging Warren to run. The silver lining in his low name recognition is that he has an opportunity to introduce himself to the American people on his own terms.

Warren, meanwhile, repeatedly insists she will not throw her hat in the ring despite an organized campaign put together by progressive groups intended to draft the bank antagonist.

And even though the vice president has run for president twice before — including against Clinton and Obama in 2008 — he has no political operation to speak of. Biden's supporters insist that he would need little preparation to jump in due to his existing networks and the goodwill generated by his trips to Iowa, New Hampshire, and South Carolina earlier this year. But he shows no signs of seriously considering a run.

The biggest opportunity for a Clinton alternative would likely come in Iowa, the site of her 2008 undoing, because the caucus system there is friendly enough to protest candidates that someone else, or a group of others, will almost certainly garner at least one-quarter of the vote. Even Iowa's sitting senator, Tom Harkin, won just 76 percent when he ran in 1992, despite the fact that none of his rival candidates, including Bill Clinton, bothered to contest the caucuses.

But even a relatively promising showing in Iowa could be a one-off if it doesn't generate momentum for a challenger heading into New Hampshire. And, for Clinton, "it's kind of a luxury in a campaign when you're worried about only getting 75 percent of the vote," notes Shrum.

One person who disagrees with the idea that challenging Clinton is a hopeless task is former Colorado Sen. Gary Hart, who vaulted from single digits in the polls to mount a serious challenge against the far better-known and better-funded Walter Mondale in 1984.

"I also discount the polls a great deal," says Hart, who is personally close with O'Malley and a past email correspondent with Webb. "At this moment, and for a time period, they are name recognition functions and less matters of preference."

O'Malley, for one, has been trying to boost his name recognition as he preps for a likely run.

He and Webb are expected to appear at South Carolina's Clyburn Fish Fry on April 24 — an annual event hosted by Rep. Jim Clyburn that frequently draws presidential hopefuls to the early voting state — and the state party's convention the next day. Clinton is not currently scheduled to appear, but may do so after formally announcing her candidacy.

It's a reflection of a long-established pattern: O'Malley has been by far the most aggressive candidate in terms of early state organizing, while Webb has been slow to schedule events and Clinton has let others represent her. Sanders, meanwhile, has appeared in early states but also spent considerable time elsewhere — most recently a political trip with stops in San Francisco, Los Angeles, Las Vegas, Austin, and Chicago. The groups supporting a Warren candidacy have also been organizing voters in the early states, but absent a candidate, they have largely focused on shifting the overall conversation to the left.

The four likeliest contenders — O'Malley, Webb, Sanders, and Chafee — occupy vastly different lanes within the party, in terms of ideology, experience, and preparation for 2016.

O'Malley saw his 2016 chances flicker when his expected successor lost his 2014 run for governor, in what was seen by some as a referendum on the outgoing governor. He says he will decide whether to run for president sometime this spring. But he has already pulled together a team of operatives that includes Bill Hyers, the campaign manager for New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio.

This year, he has already stopped by at least four events in each of Iowa and New Hampshire, and one in South Carolina. He also recently hired a new press secretary with New Hampshire experience.

Meanwhile Webb, a one-term senator and former Secretary of the Navy under Republican President Ronald Reagan, has been more deliberate. After announcing his exploratory committee in November, Webb has largely kept out of the public eye. But he recently traveled to Iowa and has hired a state campaign director.

Sanders, a self-described socialist who often rails against billionaires and appears frequently on television, initially suggested he would decide whether to run in March. But he told POLITICO that month that he would likely push off a decision because of his work as the ranking member on the Senate Budget Committee. His spokesman now says he will make a decision "sooner rather than later."

Chafee has been the most eager to take on Clinton, though his bid would be regarded as an even longer shot after he declined to seek re-election for governor in 2014 when it became clear he would face a tough Democratic primary.

Indeed, none of these candidates will have the benefit of anything approaching the widespread Clinton network, which was largely represented by the independent political action committee Ready For Hillary that signed up nearly 4 million voters over the last two-plus years.

In the face of such organizing, the non-Clinton candidates seemed so daunted that none of them seized the moment in March when Clinton was revealed to have used a private email system as secretary of state.

Former candidates and advisers say the best approach would be to chip away at Clinton on a few policies — like Wall Street regulation — as a way to start to gain traction.

"If the policies [Clinton] comes out with are all-inclusive, then a primary is not necessary," said Reverend Al Sharpton, who ran in 2004. But "if they're just running and there's no policy debate, it's just a vanity exercise."

O'Malley has said the presidency should not be "passed between two families" — a reference to the Clintons and the Bushes — and has begun tailoring his rhetoric on Wall Street policy to Clinton's left, though he has not attacked her by name.

Webb is taking a different tack, suggesting he is, in the words Rania Batrice, his Iowa state director, an outsider who is well-positioned to take on the Democratic Party's most famous name.

"It's safe to say that Iowans and the rest of the country are tired of the 'same ol', same ol" rhetoric when it comes to today's political atmosphere," she wrote. "They're ready for someone different, someone who will put people ahead of politics. That is Jim Webb."

But neither Webb nor Sanders can realistically claim that they are fresh faces. At 69 and 73, respectively, each is older than the 67-year-old Clinton. And while O'Malley is largely a new face on the national scene, Clinton's team can point to a recent Washington Post/ABC News poll showing that over 60 percent of Democrats favor "experience" to "a new direction" in a presidential candidate.

"A lot of this [talk of alternatives] is that journalism abhors a presidential primary vacuum, so a lot of it is hothouse stories. They're not real stories," said Shrum. "If you ask me, in all honesty, do I see a path? No."

Or, in the words of Richardson: "It's very likely going to be an unstoppable train."

Clinton studying up on upward mobility with Harvard economist [Annie Linsky, The Boston Globe, pril 10, 2015]

Hillary Clinton has been consulting with Harvard professor Raj Chetty as she formulates her economic policy.

Harvard professor Raj Chetty flew from Boston to New York City about two months ago to give a private tutorial on his research into social mobility. The student: Hillary Clinton.

In a conference room at her Manhattan personal office, he clicked through a set of slides including a map of the United States that shows how poor children are more likely to get ahead in some parts of the country than in others. The meeting, which included members of Clinton's staff, lasted two hours.

Clinton absorbed the lesson well.

At a panel discussion at the Center for American Progress in Washington last month, she cited Chetty by name and echoed his work: "Why do some communities, frankly, have more ladders for opportunity than others?" Clinton asked.

With Hillary Clinton expected to launch her presidential campaign on Sunday, Democratic donors and strategists agree that her message will have to address the yawning gap between the rich and lower classes in America. How she will navigate this issue, and what the broader theme of her campaign will be, has been one of the pressing questions of her precampaign period.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Chetty's emphasis on upward mobility offers a less divisive way to address middle class economic issues than the rhetoric of income inequality that progressives in the Democratic Party like Senator Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts and her followers are pushing. It's also more palatable to large corporations and wealthy donors who have funded her previous campaigns.

The other key topic Clinton is expected to quickly embrace — women's issues — appears to be less fraught.

Clinton "leaned in" on that topic at an Emily's List gala in Washington, according to one of staff member at the organization. She delighted the room when ticked off a list issues the group cares about: Access to paid sick days, paid medical and family leave, affordable child care and more flexible work schedules.

"It's an outrage that so many women are still paid less than men for the same work," Clinton said. "These aren't just problems for women. They're problems for families and for our entire economy."

Clinton's expected to make her first trip to Iowa next week. Emily's List activists are hoping that the trip — which will be heavily covered by the national media — will coincide with Equal Pay Day on Tuesday, and bring more attention to the gap in salaries between men and women.

And many are noting that Clinton is already embracing the historic nature of her White House bid more than she did in 2008. She's taken series shots at Senate Republicans for stalling the nomination of Loretta Lynch for attorney general via her Twitter feed. And she used Twitter for a playful back-and-forth with former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, where both women touted their Wellesley College educations.

Albright wrote: "Statistics show that @Wellesley alums make great Secretaries — right?"

Clinton replied: "There must be something in the water @Wellesley. #YouGoGirl"

Over the past few weeks Clinton has hired staff for her campaign and found office space in Brooklyn for campaign headquarters. A Clinton spokesman, didn't respond to a request for comment.

Meanwhile, Clinton's precampaign has been winding down: The Ready for Hillary super-PAC, formed to convince the former First Lady to run, spent the week hosting a fire sale on merchandise with prices dropping each day. On Sunday all items were 40 percent off. On Tuesday glassware was 50 percent off. On Wednesday fleece products were 60 percent off. On Friday all T-shirts were on sale for $10.

The same activists buying up the "merch'' are also ready to hear her start making her case. And polls show that Americans continue to see the economy as the most important issue facing the country.

The research Chetty and his team have done shows that children who grow up in parts of the country with less segregation, less income inequality, stronger schools, more social capital, and stable families are more likely to improve their social standing as adults. He and his colleagues are preparing to release policy prescriptions in coming months.

Clinton was "really interested in issues of social mobility and the American dream" during their meeting Chetty said. "She really engaged with the data," Chetty recalled.

He also spoke at last year's Clinton Global Initiative meeting, where he mentioned his signature eye-popping statistic: "Chances of achieving the 'American Dream' are almost two times higher in Canada than the United States," he said, showing slide with data to back up the claim.

Other researchers on his project said that people from different political backgrounds tend to seize on different parts of the work. "When you look at the data it is a political Rorschach test," said Nathaniel Hendren, an assistant professor at Harvard.

Indeed, on Monday Chetty said he plans to talk with Republican Jeb Bush, who is also mulling a White House run. He's also sat down with Warren in her Cambridge home and spoken with President Obama.

Thinkers in the left wing of the party are skeptical of what Chetty's findings will mean when injected into a presidential campaign.

"Social mobility is a good thing, but it is not the right question," said Damon Silvers, the Director of Policy and Special Counsel for the AFL-CIO. "The right question is what happens to the majority of us who work hard and don't make it to the top of the pyramid?"

Clinton has sent some soothing signals to the progressive wing of the party. She has consulted with Joseph Stiglitz in recent months, a Nobel prize winning economist who recently wrote a book entitled "The Price of Inequality: How Today's Divided Society Endangers Our Future."

During the Aspen Ideas Festival last year, Clinton was asked about income inequality and seemed to fuse the ideas from thinkers on both wings of the party. Her answer of noted the importance of bolstering the middle class with the notion of helping children move up the social ladder.

"We've always been very proud of the fact that we have an upwardly mobile expanding middle class society," Clinton said. "We've had this American Dream embedded in our DNA."

Hillary Clinton begins her entry into the 2016 presidential race [Anne Gearan & Philip Rucker, WaPo, April 10, 2015]

Hillary Rodham Clinton's long-anticipated entry into the 2016 presidential race took shape Friday, with Democrats saying she will announce her candidacy on Sunday and begin a series of deliberately small discussions with voters next week.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Rodham Clinton's long-anticipated entry into the 2016 presidential race took shape Friday, with Democrats saying she will announce her candidacy on Sunday and begin a series of deliberately small discussions with voters next week.

The low-key rollout — no big rallies or lengthy speeches — will end months of speculation surrounding the overwhelming favorite for the Democratic nomination. Clinton intends to begin her second White House bid via social media, probably Twitter, and include a video that introduces her economic-centered campaign message before jetting to Iowa next week for public appearances, according to three Democrats with knowledge of her plans.

Behind the scenes, meanwhile, Clinton's fundraising machine is coming to life. Her top bundlers are plotting aggressive outreach to thousands of Democratic donors over the weekend and into next week to urge them to send checks and make donations online as soon as the Clinton campaign's Web site goes live.

The strategists and allies spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss details of the forthcoming announcement. Spokesmen for Clinton's now-robust campaign-in-waiting declined to comment Friday.

Clinton's go-slow, go-small start is the opposite of how many Republicans have entered or plan to enter the race. Instead of a splashy launch event, Clinton's plan is a calculated understatement. She is scheduling a series of small roundtables and other give-and-take sessions with voters, first in Iowa and later in New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada — the states holding the first presidential primaries and caucuses early next year.

The idea is to showcase Clinton's abilities as a problem-solver and crusader for the rights of those struggling to climb into or stay in the middle class. The intimate events with voters are also designed to help the former secretary of state connect with ordinary Americans and listen to their concerns, supporters said.

Jay Jacobs, a former New York Democratic Party chairman and longtime Clinton friend, said he thinks the events will present Clinton "as she is known by people who are close to her: as a very warm, genuine, thoughtful, certainly intelligent, regular person."

"There's been so much that we've seen that seems to create an image, by the press and by others, those who are looking to derail her, but now the voters are going to hear from Hillary," Jacobs said.

Clinton's human-scale approach is modeled on the listening tour she conducted across New York state at the start of her successful 2000 Senate race. She came to that campaign as a sitting first lady and political celebrity with no roots in New York, but her efforts to seek out New Yorkers' opinions — in diners as well as people's living rooms and kitchens — surprised many voters and some critics.

"It became a two-way conversation that impressed voters not by just what she said, but by how intently she listened," Jacobs said. "I think that's Hillary. That's something that has worked before and it'll work again."

David Axelrod, who helped lead the insurgent 2008 Barack Obama campaign that eclipsed Hillary Clinton's first presidential run, welcomed the new approach.

For 30 years, Hillary Clinton has been a fixture on the national stage. Now, as she takes another shot at becoming the first female president, she's hoping to battle any Clinton fatigue by touting her unique experience. (AP)

"Humility is the order of the day," Axelrod said. "Last time, they launched as a big juggernaut cloaked in the veil of inevitability and at 20,000 feet. There was a tremendous backlash to that. It is imperative for her to go out, to meet people where they live, to make her case, to deliver a message, to listen to what they have to say and to ask for their votes."

Axelrod added that Clinton must also articulate a message about economic mobility during her launch that's "compelling and authentic," rooted in her personal biography. "She needs to project what the cause is that she's fighting for here and give people a sense of where they fit into that vision," he said.

One open question for Clinton allies is what role her husband, former president Bill Clinton, and their daughter, Chelsea, will play in the campaign. Both have made splashy media appearances in the past week, with Chelsea on the cover of Elle and Bill on the cover of Town & Country. The former president told the magazine that he plans to be merely a "backstage adviser" to his wife, at least in the early stages of the campaign.

Widely considered by Democrats to be Obama's heir apparent, Clinton has hired several of the president's top campaign strategists to work on her 2016 bid.

In polls, Clinton is the dominant Democratic candidate, and in general election matchups she is at least slightly ahead of all likely Republican challengers.

The potential to become America's first female president is a lodestar for Clinton's campaign, and the soon-to-be candidate has strongly suggested that she will stress her path-breaking role.

Clinton resisted pressure from some Democrats to begin her campaign earlier this year, using the past several months to hone her message and assemble an extensive operation to run a campaign and raise money. She has recruited dozens of staffers who have been volunteering their time before the launch; her team signed a lease last week on office space in Brooklyn to serve as her national campaign headquarters.

Clinton's Sunday announcement would come one day before the expected campaign launch of Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Florida), who is planning a major speech to supporters Monday afternoon at Miami's Freedom Tower. On Friday, Rubio released a YouTube video, called "A New American Century," previewing his announcement.

With Clinton's launch, Republicans are revving up their attack machine. The Republican National Committee announced an online ad Friday to highlight past scandals, including her use of private e-mail at the State Department.

"From the East Wing to the State Department, Hillary Clinton has left a trail of secrecy, scandal and failed liberal policies that no image consultant can erase," RNC Chairman Reince Priebus said in a statement. "Voters want to elect someone they can trust and Hillary's record proves that she cannot be trusted. We must 'Stop Hillary.' "

Like the small-scale rollout in Iowa living rooms, Clinton and her advisers are also modulating their fundraising early on to avoid appearing presumptuous and keep the campaign focused on a grass-roots effort. Clinton allies have been tamping down expectations for a massive influx of campaign cash, but her fundraisers anticipate a rush of major donors trying to get checks in the door on Day One.

"All the horses are in the gate just waiting for those gates to open," said John Morgan, a Clinton fundraiser in Florida. "There's really nothing to do until the gate opens. But the gate could open Sunday and it could be the flood gate. The only issue they'll have is how fast can they raise the money, because the money is pent up."

Clinton will raise only primary-season money at first, with a cap of $2,700 a donor. That is partly to avoid the appearance that Clinton is taking the nomination for granted. The focus on Internet appeals will free up Clinton to spend time on the trail talking to voters, rather than wooing wealthy donors at glitzy, high-priced fundraisers.

"I don't think the first thing out of the gate she should be doing is a bunch of big fundraising events," said one senior party strategist who requested anonymity to speak candidly.

The approach is a notable contrast to former Florida governor Jeb Bush, who has spent the better part of four months crisscrossing the country holding closed-door finance events for his Right to Rise political action committee and super PAC with tickets costing as much as $100,000 each.

"I think she'll be in Iowa eating corn on the cob instead of clinking champagne flutes with donors," Morgan said. "She can do this much quicker, much more efficiently because she's not fighting for donors. Rubio, Bush, that whole crowd is in mortal combat for dollars. She's not. That's her advantage."

The campaign is not expected to give titles to top bundlers or announce a list of finance committee chairs or members at the outset, according to Democrats with knowledge of the Clinton strategy.

One priority is creating an extensive small-donor network similar to the Obama campaign's much-admired list from his 2008 and 2012 campaigns, and Clinton advisers see her announcement period as a ripe opportunity.

"We're not going to take it slow," said one Clinton fundraiser who spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss the campaign's internal plans. "The announcement is a good time to raise money, and we'll have everyone out there asking people to support her candidacy."

The campaign will be able to build on the efforts of Ready for Hillary, an outside group started in 2013 to lay the groundwork for Clinton's run that has held more than 1,000 grass-roots events in all 50 states. The group amassed a donor pool of more than 135,000 people, the vast majority of whom gave contributions of $100 or less, according to PAC officials.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ready for Hillary will not be able to coordinate with Clinton once she announces, but it could share its list of supporters with her campaign through a list swap, campaign finance lawyers said.

The group may not even have to take that step, however. Once Clinton declares her candidacy, the super PAC can simply direct its supporters to her Web site, allowing her campaign to quickly build a small donor list.

Once she's officially in, Ready for Hillary plans to post online the names of hundreds of donors who have given or raised more than $5,000, according to a person familiar with the plans. That list — which includes at least 222 donors who gave $25,000 — would be valuable not just for Clinton's campaign but for Priorities USA, the high-dollar super PAC planning to finance a pro-Clinton television advertising campaign and facing pressure to kick-start its fundraising.

Ahead of the campaign launch, Clinton released a new epilogue Friday for "Hard Choices," her State Department memoir coming out this month in paperback. In it, she ruminates about a "memory quilt" she received as a gift after her granddaughter Charlotte's birth last September.

"I wondered for a moment what a quilt of my own life would look like," Clinton wrote. "There was so much more to do. So many more panels waiting to be filled in. I folded up the quilt and got back to work."

Hillary Clinton's Presidential Campaign to Make a Low-Key Start [Peter Nicholas & Laura Meckler, WSJ, April 10, 2015]

Hillary Clinton will launch her second campaign for the White House on Sunday with much less fanfare than the standard 2016 rollout: She'll post a video online, followed by small events with voters spaced out slowly over coming weeks.

Hillary Clinton will launch her second campaign for the White House on Sunday with much less fanfare than the standard 2016 rollout: She'll post a video online, followed by small events with voters spaced out slowly over coming weeks.

The strategy stands in contrast to Republican contenders, who have kicked off their campaigns with splashy events and cheering crowds. The lower-key approach also differs from Mrs. Clinton's 2008 presidential effort, when she often traveled with a large staff and Secret Service entourage that kept her at a distance from voters.

Mrs. Clinton, given her long presence on the national stage and current lack of serious competition, finds herself in the odd position of appearing like an incumbent, which brings both benefits and drawbacks. While she doesn't need to prove she can draw a crowd, Mrs. Clinton needs to show herself working hard for the nomination, her advisers say, to avoid giving the impression it is hers for the taking.

Central to the task is laying out the rationale for her campaign, which some supporters say has been absent amid Mrs. Clinton's two-year pondering about a run.

"I think No. 1 is to articulate what she'd like to do if she were president and where she wants to take the country," said Jeff Link, a Democratic consultant in Des Moines, Iowa. "We haven't heard that."

The answer her campaign is set to offer: Mrs. Clinton is a fighter for the middle class and a results-driven pragmatist who can make Washington work again.

In the days following her announcement, Mrs. Clinton will likely hold a handful of events followed by short bursts of travel through April. Behind the scenes, her campaign team will settle into its new headquarters in New York City, and a significant fundraising operation will gear up to begin raising more than $1 billion.

She will be accompanied by fewer aides than in 2008, in hopes of seeming more disarming and approachable, her team says.

"She needs to be a good retail politician, and go around the state and engage in meetings with voters that maybe 20 to 40 people," said Tom Henderson, chairman of the Polk County Democratic Party, in Iowa's largest county. "That's where all the activists come. Once you start to get the activists on your side, then they will reach out to their neighbors."

Her husband, former President Bill Clinton, made a similar point in an interview with Town & Country magazine.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I think it's important, and Hillary does too, that she go out there as if she's never run for anything before and establish her connection with the voters," Mr. Clinton said.

Mrs. Clinton towers over her potential rivals in polling in a way that has little precedent in recent presidential elections. On Friday, former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, who is considering running against her for the nomination, suggested that her dominance may be overstated.

"There is an inevitable front-runner who remains inevitable right up until he or she is no longer inevitable," he told MSNBC.

Mrs. Clinton will make her formal launch already under fire from both the political right and left.

Republicans, presuming she is the likely general-election nominee, are attacking her on a daily basis for her decision to use a personal email account for public business as secretary of state and her family foundation's acceptance of donations from foreign countries.

"Voters want to elect someone they can trust and Hillary's record proves that she cannot be trusted," Reince Priebus, chairman of the Republican National Committee, said in a statement Friday.

The RNC released an online ad with voices raising questions about her record, as a woman meant to be Mrs. Clinton walks away from the camera toward a stage. It ends with the message: "Stop Hillary."

The RNC said it was spending more than $100,000 in online advertising including promoting the Web ad.

Some liberal Democrats worry that she isn't populist enough in her policy outlook, especially when it comes to the economy and Wall Street, and is too willing to make compromises. Some have launched a movement to draft Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D., Mass.) into the race, despite her repeated statements that she won't run.

Advisers say Mrs. Clinton's core argument will be her support for the middle class and that she is a pragmatist who can make Washington work again. It is a case she has made in roundabout fashion in paid speeches, interviews and other appearances. In coming weeks, she will make it in town-hall meetings, diners and living rooms in states that hold early nomination contests, including Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada and South Carolina.

During her 2008 run, Mrs. Clinton's campaign saw her chief challenge as projecting strength, so voters would feel comfortable electing a woman as commander-in-chief at a time when the U.S. was engaged in two wars. Now, after four years as secretary of state, she has those credentials, advisers say, and the goal is to show a softer side.

In a new epilogue being published with the paperback release of her most recent book, "Hard Choices," Mrs. Clinton writes of the joys of becoming a grandmother. She segues from her personal experience to her policy agenda—something advisers say she will do frequently.

"You shouldn't have to be the granddaughter of a President or a Secretary of State to receive excellent health care, education, enrichment, and all the support and advantages that will one day lead to a good job and a successful life," she wrote in an excerpt published in the Huffington Post.

Mrs. Clinton is expected to frame the economic debate around the idea of "responsible capitalism," said one adviser. "You can support business, but business needs to be responsible in how they make money and what they need to give back to society," is how the adviser put it.

She will also draw distinctions with Mr. Obama, emphasizing how she would give high priority to forging close ties to Capitol Hill, something many say Mr. Obama failed to do. In one speech last year, she seemed to offer a veiled criticism of the president.

"I mean, some people can paint a beautiful vision," she said at a CNN event. "And, thankfully, we can all learn from that. But then, can you, with the tenacity, the persistence, the getting-knocked down, getting-back-up resilience, can you lead us there?

Can Hillary Clinton run an intimate campaign? [Alex Seitz-Wald, MSNBC, April 10, 2015]

Alex Seitz-Wald explores how Hillary Clinton can run a campaign that maximizes intimate contact with voters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

After a long wait, Hillary Clinton will finally makes her second presidential bid official Sunday with a social media “soft launch,” followed by a trip to Iowa to meet with voters, sources tell msnbc.

Unlike her 2008 bid, when Clinton sometimes came off as imperious, aides to the all-but-declared presidential candidate say this time she will focus on smaller, intimate events that will allow her to spend quality time with voters and connect with them in casual settings.

But how does the biggest political celebrity in the world go small? How does someone who travels with a large coterie of reporters, aides, and Secret Service do intimate? It’s a challenge the nascent Clinton campaign acknowledges they don’t yet have a perfect solution for, and likely never will.

“It’s really hard,” said former Obama White House communications director Anita Dunn. “You have to balance the needs of the press corps and their wish to be in every event, with trying keep the event from feeling as though a small number of people are performing a staged play for the benefit to the press corps.”

“Candidates love this part,” Dunn continued. “You want to make sure the press can cover the campaigning without becoming the campaign.”

Aides want to showcase Clinton’s warmth and sense of humor, which can be lost in larger events, and bring the high-flying former secretary of state down to the earth. But they acknowledge it won’t be easy and will likely frustrate the press at times.

Every candidate has to deal with this problem at some point if they’re lucky and make it to the big leagues, but Clinton is in the unique position of starting from day one with a footprint closer to that of an incumbent president running for reelection than an upstart primary candidate.

How do Clinton's 2016 and 2008 campaigns compare?

She’s already under Secret Service protection, thanks to her time as first lady, and has had a dedicated traveling press corps for more than a year.

Ryan Williams, a Republican strategist who was Mitt Romney’s press secretary in 2012, thinks Clinton’s team is dreaming.“It’s utterly impossible,” he said. “My guess is Hillary Clinton’s intimate campaign will be nothing more than a staged photo opportunity designed to look like something that it’s not. You’re at a stage where it should be open access to voters, spontaneous interaction with voters, and that’s just going to be very hard for her.”

When Clinton returned to Iowa last year for the first time since she lost the state’s critical caucus in 2008, more than 200 reporters showed up from as far away as Sweden and Japan.

She and her husband pulled up in an eight-car motorcade of armored SUVs, and a metal barricade separated her from voters as she worked a ropeline with federal agents looming on either side of her.

When Romney got Secret Service protection after winning the Republican nomination in 2012, “it was night and day,” Williams said, explaining the agents make everything more complicated and want to preserve a buffer between the candidate and the public.

Clinton’s campaign-in-waiting has worked with the Secret Service to try to pare down the agency’s footprint around Clinton as much as possible, and give the candidate room for spontaneous interactions with voters. They’ll also have to push back on local law enforcement, who often seek to add a second, more visible layer of protection around candidates.

But Robert Gibbs, the former White House press secretary who traveled with Obama extensively during the primary, said Clinton’s team is smart to focus on small events. “There’s no doubt that the logistics are hugely challenging for these things,” he said. “But the pictures are really great, and those stories are the kind that candidates tell for the rest of the campaign.”

And Gibbs said Clinton handled this well in New Hampshire, when a flurry of town hall events helped her come from behind to beat Obama.

Iowa native Tommy Vietor, another former Obama aide who helped Clinton with her book tour last year, said the issue will sort itself out over time.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He predicted a huge crush of press coverage for Clinton's initial foray on the campaign trail that will die down quickly. "If she spends time in Iowa, her events will be competing with Rand Paul and Ted Cruz going for the jugular, and that will make for sexier copy, and she'll have a chance to have a slightly more relaxed conversation with voters," he said.

And campaigns have long known that the further they venture from Des Moines, the fewer reporters who will be willing to make the trek. "It's totally doable," he said.

Still, no one disputes that reporters will end up frustrated at times. Some events may be closed to the press, others may have limited access, and many may have access to only a select "pool" of reporters who represent each type of outlet on behalf of their colleagues.

To offset perceptions that's cutting off the press, Clinton may regularly take questions from reporters after events where some were denied access. Or she could prioritize local media and give a few minutes to the local TV affiliate or newspaper, like Obama did during the primary.

The format of the events could further inflame relations between Clinton and the press, which she acknowledged are "complicated," but pooling coverage may be the only way to satisfy all sides. After all, Clinton wants reporters to cover her small events as much as they want to cover them. If a touching connection is made with an Iowa voter and there's no reporter around to Tweet it, does it make a sound?

The awkwardness of huge media attention combined with small spaces was on display last month when Jeb Bush visited the house of a former state Republican Party chairman in New Hampshire. Aides removed the furniture from the living room and reporters piled in.

C-SPAN broadcast live from the kitchen, showing a room packed wall-to-wall with reporters watching a handful of voters chat.

Hillary Clinton's 2016 Campaign Kickoff Will Look a Lot Like Her 2000 Senate Run [Emily Schultheis, National Journal, April 10, 2015]

Hillary Clinton's 2016 launch will mimic a number of features of her successful 2000 Senate run.

April 10, 2015 Hillary Clinton's 2008 primary loss looms large at every step of her 2016 campaign, but the Democratic frontrunner's team is looking farther back for lessons from the past, namely to the summer of 1999. That was when Clinton—then the first lady and still living in the White House—embarked on a "listening tour" across the state of New York ahead of the official launch of her 2000 Senate campaign.

Now, as she prepares to officially start her campaign Sunday, Clinton's plans are strikingly similar. Out are the mega-rallies. Instead, the candidate is planning a series of smaller, less-scripted events that allow her to interact one-on-one with voters. And on both her 1999 listening tour and her 2016 kickoff, the goal is the same: build the candidate's credentials as one that connects with voters, knows the issues they care about and makes it clear she isn't taking anything for granted.

"In 1999, it was an introduction to voters, it was an introduction to her as a candidate," said Lee Miringoff, a veteran pollster at Marist College in New York. "That's why it worked for her, because it sort of took on the issue directly that she wasn't from New York and therefore was going to have to do some listening."

Karen Finney, an aide to Clinton at the time and a staffer for her emerging 2016 campaign, said the former secretary of State is "very good at making the people who she's talking with very comfortable and at ease." In thinking about the current campaign, Finney added that Clinton herself will play a big role in how comfortable and connected voters feel at events like these.

That will be critical for Clinton to right the problems that sundered her 2008 effort. Then, as now, she was the frontrunner bolstered by a massive campaign funding apparatus and a legion of political connections. But she didn't build the personal connection with Democratic voters that then-candidate Obama rode to victory.

Among the biggest questions about the up-close-and-personal approach is whether Clinton will be to create events that actually feel intimate, given the political and media circus that already track her every move. Some say that true one-on-one interaction for her is near impossible. "It's a tremendous challenge to be an average person when 200 people follow you everywhere," said veteran New York Democratic strategist Hank Sheinkopf.

Ann Lewis, a longtime Clinton adviser who was involved in the 2000 Senate effort, said that with increased national attention to presidential politics, they've become more "ceremonial"—making it hard for voters to see the actual human being behind the celebrities presidential hopefuls become. "It gets harder, obviously with the size of the press corps and the size of the attention," she said. "My guess is there will be a certain tension in there between what the campaign hopes to achieve, and just the reality of how much attention it is likely to get."

In 1999, Clinton kicked off her listening tour at the Pindars Corners, New York, farm of retiring Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan, whom she was running to replace. According to The Washington Post at the time, protesters stood outside with signs like "Hillary Listen: Go Home!" or "A New Yorker for New York."

The carpetbagger issue was one she addressed directly that day. "It's a fair question," she told reporters there. "I have some work to do to demonstrate that what I'm for is as important if not more important than where I'm from."

After the farm, her tour took her outside of New York City and its suburbs, which make up the Democratic core of the state, and into all of the state's 62 counties—including significant time in the traditionally Republican upstate. And mainly, the 1999 tour was about proving that she could handle New York issues and had a genuine interest in the state and its people. The events varied: Some were small meet-and-greets at a diner or a farm; others involved a speech to a bigger group, aides from the 2000 campaign said, with Clinton shaking hands and meeting voters on the rope line afterward.

In her 2003 memoir Living History, Clinton described it as "getting a nonstop crash course in New York and its issues," adding that it took time before voters stopped viewing her as "a curiosity" and started having "real conversations about the issues that mattered to them."

It wasn't immediate: the initial listening tour events weren't quite as small as the ones that later became a big part of her campaigning style. And even then, Clinton's star power meant she traveled with a large press corps in tow—the New York press corps can be large and unruly, and the level of interest in a First Lady running for office brought national reporters along for the ride too. Events near New York City tended to succumb more to the political circus, former aides said; ones far upstate were often far smaller and felt more intimate. ("What a lot of us really enjoyed about going upstate is that you could do those kinds of events," Finney said.)

At events, Clinton would listen, nodding her head and taking notes in the notebooks she carried with her to events—her way of showing she was really paying attention, aides say. "She would come back to the campaign office with notebooks full of notes," Lewis said, adding that "you could watch in her early years in the Senate" as ideas she'd written down in the notebooks made their way into policy proposals. (Her body language didn't go unnoticed by the press: "Now Playing In Our Area: Nodding Hill," said one Newsday headline out of the tour, in a play on the 1999 movie "Notting Hill.")

Though she had a few slip-ups along the way, Clinton generally received high marks for the tour—and on the whole, it did what it set out to do. "Something like that can achieve the goal even if she flubs a line here and there, because the notion, by its title, it suggests that you're reaching out and taking in," Miringoff said.

Hillary Clinton, First Lady, on Gay Marriage: A Case Study In Opacity [Sasha Issenberg, Bloomberg, April 10, 2015]

A trove of papers released yesterday at the Clinton library shows that, even before homebrew e-mail servers were an option, Hillary Clinton's operation had mastered low-tech workarounds to avoid leaving a paper trail of her real-time views on controversial subjects.

LITTLE ROCK — A trove of papers released yesterday at the Clinton library shows that, even before homebrew e-mail servers were an option, Hillary Clinton's operation had mastered low-tech workarounds to avoid leaving a paper trail of her real-time views on controversial subjects.

Even though the First Lady maintained her own correspondence office, in at least once instance, her staffers punted an inquiry about her views on a timely controversial issue then dividing Democrats to her husband's staff.

"We have received a few letters on the subject of same-sex marriage," Alice J. Pushkar of the first lady's staff wrote to Kyle M. Baker, on her husband's side of the White House, on September 18, 1996. "I think that it would be more appropriate for a response to come from the President on this than the First Lady. Would it be possible to get a First Lady version of the P-323?"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"What DOMA did is at least allow the states to act."

Later that day, Baker's office generated a form letter, which is among the hundreds of thousands of previously unreleased papers made public. "Thank you for contacting Hillary regarding marriages of couples of the same gender. She has asked me to respond on her behalf," read the letter approved for Bill Clinton's auto-pen signature. "In 1992, I stated my opposition to same-gender marriage, and recently, when the issue was raised in Congress, I said that if a bill consistent with my previously stated position reached my desk, I would sign it."

A little more than 24 hours after that letter was prepared, Clinton did sign the Defense of Marriage Act, ignominiously doing so past midnight in an empty White House without any cameras present. In a contemporaneous signing statement, a belated effort to placate liberal supporters he knew abhorred the bill, Clinton expressed worry that it could serve to "provide an excuse for discrimination."

Hillary Clinton appeared to get through the election season without having to commit to a position of her own. In an interview earlier that year with the San Francisco Examiner's Carla Marinucci, she had said that her "preference is that we do all we can to strengthen traditional marriages" but did not share her view of same-sex unions. Promoting her book It Takes a Village, Clinton told Marinucci that "children are better off if they have a mother and a father," but also that "there are people who are able to fulfill the functions of child rearing who don't fit into the traditional pattern."

As a Senate candidate, Clinton couldn't maintain the ambiguity. In January 2000, she said she would have voted for the Defense of Marriage Act and, despite supporting some rights for same-sex couples, she did not believe that they should be entitled to marry. "Marriage has got historic, religious and moral content that goes back to the beginning of time and I think a marriage is as a marriage has always been, between a man and a woman," she said then.

In 2013, after she left the State Department, Clinton said she had changed her position and now favored recognition of gay marriages. But even last year, fifteen months after her husband conceded in a Washington Post op-ed that he had come around to the view that the Defense of Marriage Act had always been unconstitutional, Hillary appeared to be still defending the bill, at least on practical grounds.

"What DOMA did is at least allow the states to act," she told NPR's Terry Gross in an interview that turned contentious when Clinton was asked to trace her change of opinion on the gay marriage. "It wasn't going yet to be recognized by the federal government, but at the state level there was the opportunity. And my husband, you know, was the first to say that, you know, the political circumstances, the threats that were trying to be alleviated by the passage of DOMA thankfully were no longer so preeminent and we could keep moving forward, and that's what we're doing."

Hillary Clinton threatens to steal Marco Rubio's thunder [Daniel Lippman, POLITICO, April 10, 2015]

Hillary Clinton's campaign launch could steal some of the media coverage of Marco Rubio's own campaign announcement.

Marco Rubio's parade is in danger of getting rained on. His advisers had closely monitored Hillary Clinton's possible announcement date to ensure that the Florida senator could own the news cycle for his own launch.

Looks like their forecasts were off.

For their part, the Rubio camp and independent GOP strategists are saying they are not worried about bad timing, and believe it could even help him by creating a split-screen effect in which Rubio is paired up with Clinton instead of the whole Republican field.With Clinton expected to kick off her presidential campaign on Sunday with a social media announcement, the Florida senator could see his own launch event in Miami on Monday evening overshadowed by the Hillary media coverage.

"To the extent that Hillary's entrance is going to increase interest in the 2016 race, we welcome that," said Rubio spokesman Alex Conant.

"I have no concerns," he added. "Not a single reporter has said that they're not coming because Hillary Clinton is going to announce a web video."

He said that Rubio's message that the American dream is being threatened is independent of who else is in the race and the timing of their announcements. To keep Rubio in the spotlight, they've scheduled several network interviews over the course of the week, and Fox News' Sean Hannity plans to interview Rubio on Monday night after his speech.

"We really like the contrast the American people are going to see over Sunday and Monday," Conant said.

GOP strategist Ben Porritt said the timing may not be ideal for Rubio, but that his camp shouldn't be overly worried. He said Rubio and Clinton clearly have different audiences.

"If you had to go back in time, and you're Sen. Rubio, you would love to have the whole day to yourself, but you can't," Porritt said.

And media attention is far from the only metric that determines the success of a kick-off. Money is critical too, Porritt said, and Rubio's announcement should lead to a "huge boom in fundraising" in the 48 to 72 hours after his speech.

GOP operative Ana Navarro tweeted on Friday that "Anybody who thinks a Hillary video on Sun will overshadow a Marco speech on Mon, has either never seen a Hillary video or a Marco speech…"

Republican strategist Doug Heye said there was "enough oxygen for both announcements to get a lot of coverage" and Clinton can be the "best foil" that a Republican like Rubio could have.

But Heye said Rubio would be wise to tweak his speech with fresh barbs against Clinton, using her own words from the day before against her.

Hillary Clinton Is the Perfect Age to Be President [Dr. Julie Holland, TIME, April 3, 2015]

At 67, Dr. Julie Holland argues that Hillary Clinton is the perfect age to be President.

At 67, Hillary Clinton is now a "woman of a certain age." So much emphasis and worry are put on physical aging in women that the emotional maturity and freedom that can come at this time are given short shrift. That robs everyone of a great natural resource. For women of a certain age, it is our time to lead. The new standard for aging women should be about vitality, strength and assertiveness.

One of the largest demographics in America is women in their 40s to 60s, and by 2020 there will be nearly 60 million peri- and post-menopausal women living in the U.S. Because women's average life expectancy is currently 81 years, we're easily spending a third of our lives postmenopausal. That is a great opportunity for growth and change.

Estrogen is a stress hormone that helps a woman be resilient during her fertile years. Its levels rise and fall to help her meet her biological demands, which are often about giving to others: attracting a mate, bearing children and nurturing a family. When estrogen levels drop after menopause, the cyclical forces that dominated the first half of our lives have been replaced with something more consistent. Our lives revolve less around others and become more about finally taking our turn.The long phase of perimenopause is marked by seismic spikes and troughs of estrogen levels, which can last for more than a decade in many women. But afterward, there is a hormonal ebbing that creates a moment of great possibility. As a psychiatrist, I will tell you the most interesting thing about menopause is what happens after. A woman emerging from the transition of perimenopause blossoms. It is a time for redefining and refining what it is she wants to accomplish in her third act. And it happens to be excellent timing for the job Clinton is likely to seek. Biologically speaking, postmenopausal women are ideal candidates for leadership. They are primed to handle stress well, and there is, of course, no more stressful job than the presidency.

In my new book, Moody Bitches, I look at how women are taught from an early age that moodiness is a problem to be fixed. That is simply wrongheaded. Women's moods are our body's intelligent feedback system. If we learn to manage them properly, they are a great resource and a tremendous source of power. They show us when we are primed for certain challenges and opportunities.

And the postmenopausal emergence, if you will, coincides with the point at which most women will have a fair amount of experience under their belts. (Perhaps they've already served as a U.S. Senator and Secretary of State, for instance.) This is often the right time to make a push, to take more of a leadership position, enter a new arena or strike out on one's own. My mother was a great role model in her perimenopause, taking her symptoms in stride and referring to her hot flashes as "power surges." She got another degree and switched careers; that appealed to me as a teenage girl. Now I see this rise in power as a way to channel new energy and even new anger. It's a chance to make changes that should've been made decades ago. This may also be the time when children — adolescents in particular — are ready to take on more responsibility, so perhaps there is a benefit for everyone in changing that family dynamic.

"I will not make age an issue of this campaign. I am not going to exploit, for political purposes, my opponent's youth and inexperience," said a 73-year-old Ronald Reagan of 56-year-old Walter Mondale. Hillary would begin her presidency at exactly the same age Reagan did, but her life expectancy would be longer than that of any other President in recent times. And she would have all the experience and self-assurance of a postmenopausal woman, ready to take her rightful place at the table — or in the Oval Office.

Hillary to Launch Campaign This Weekend With 'Insane' Fundraising Push [David Freedlander, The Daily Beast, April 10, 2015]

In a few days, Clinton will at last announce the obvious—she's running for president. And she'll use her first week as a candidate to raise "an insane amount of money," an insider says.

In a few days, Clinton will at last announce the obvious—she's running for president. And she'll use her first week as a candidate to raise "an insane amount of money," an insider says.

After the announcement comes the deluge.

Hillary Clinton is expected to announce her presidential campaign this weekend, most likely on Sunday, sources in the Clinton operation tell The Daily Beast.

After that, the nascent campaign will embark on a fundraising push that the Clinton camp says will dwarf anything seen in the history of presidential politics.

"They are going to raise in one week what some Republican presidential candidates are going to raise the entire cycle," said one Clinton aide.

On Saturday afternoon, Ready for Hillary, the super PAC that has been a Clinton campaign-in-waiting in the years since Clinton left the State Department, will host what is likely a final fundraising push at SouthwestNY, a sleek Tex-Mex restaurant steps from the rebuilt World Trade Center.

From then on, Ready for Hillary will encourage its 3.6 million supporters to give to Clinton's real campaign while the super PAC quietly dissolves.

Ready for Hillary has raised close to $15 million from nearly 150,000 donors, and Clintonistas believe that those same donors alone could give as much as 10 times that amount to a Clinton campaign.

They are expected to be joined in this fundraising by Clinton allies like EMILY's List, the organization dedicated to electing pro-choice women to office that is viewed as central to Clinton's 2016 chances.

Regardless of when she announces, the plan, one Clinton insider told The Daily Beast, was to do a massive fundraising push through her website and with allied organizations to raise "an insane amount of money" right out of the starting gate.

A Clinton spokesman did not return a request for comment.

"They are going to raise in one week what some Republican presidential candidates are going to raise the entire cycle."

Clinton is likely to announce her run for president on Twitter, linking the announcement through a variety of social media platforms.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton has been unusually active on Twitter in recent weeks to generate an audience for her expected announcement.

Since the last week of March, she has tweeted twice: in support of the Affordable Care Act and against an Indiana law that some say would discriminate against gays. She has also weighed in on the shooting of an unarmed black man in South Carolina—"Praying for #WalterScott's family. Heartbreaking & too familiar. We can do better—rebuild trust, reform justice system and respect all lives."; paid tribute to retiring Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid; and come out against "payday lenders."

After Clinton announces her candidacy, she will likely jet off to the early primary states of Iowa and New Hampshire early next week. While most presidential campaigns strategize over how to get media attention, Clinton operatives are trying to figure out how to wrangle a ballooning press corps that for weeks has competed over such small-bore issues as which empty Brooklyn loft space will house her campaign headquarters and looked for meaning in every Clinton facial expression and utterance since 2012.

Bill and Hillary Clinton have always been prodigious Democratic fundraisers, but they will enter the 2016 election cycle as newcomers to the post-Citizens Unitedworld of campaign finance. Super PACs associated with Sen. Ted Cruz (R-TX), for example, have raised $31 million since he announced his campaign last week. And former Florida governor Jeb Bush has embarked on a "shock and awe" fundraising blitz to overwhelm his Republican rivals.

Hillary Clinton intends to upstage them all.

A contest, or a coronation? [The Economist, April 10th, 2015]

Hillary Clinton will have to overcome her past in order to compete effectively in 2016.

FOR five seconds Hillary Clinton's voice cracked and her eyes grew damp. It was in January 2008 in a coffee shop in Portsmouth, New Hampshire. A sympathetic voter had just asked her how she coped with the hardships of running for president. "How do you do it?" asked Marianne Pernold Young, a local portrait photographer, mentioning that Mrs Clinton's hair always looked perfectly coiffed. "How do you keep upbeat and so wonderful?"

Pundits rushed to analyse the moment. Mrs Clinton was exhausted, they intoned. The former First-Lady-turned-senator knew that her younger rival, Barack Obama, was walking away with a race for the Democratic nomination that had once seemed hers to lose.

As the media juggernaut gathered speed, the strange intensity of America's relationship with Mrs Clinton was laid bare. Supporters hailed the fleeting display of emotion as proof of their heroine's humanity, often hidden by her discipline and caution on the campaign trail. Opponents recalled Edmund Muskie, a Democrat whose presidential bid was derailed in 1972 when he teared up in the face of harsh press attacks, and wondered if the 2008 primary was now over. Back inside the Café Espresso, suspicious journalists surrounded Mrs Pernold Young. Betraying the toxic state of Mrs Clinton's relations with the press pack, many asked if she was a planted campaign stooge.

The candidate herself cornered a press aide and fretted that voters might think her weak, and not ready to be commander-in-chief. Mr Obama took a different view. Watching footage of his rival as he trundled across New Hampshire in a campaign bus, he thought it a worryingly touching moment. "I don't like this. I actually think this could really help her," David Axelrod, the political guru at Mr Obama's side, later recalled muttering.

Seven years on, as America waits to see how Mrs Clinton will conduct a second bid for her party's presidential nomination, that flash of vulnerability is still cited in New Hampshire, the state that next January will host the first primary elections (and the second vote, after the Iowa caucuses) of the 2016 presidential cycle. This time it inspires a consensus: Mrs Clinton needs more such moments.

New Hampshire voters expect to meet candidates in diners and veterans' halls, and to hear them speak in a neighbour's sitting-room. They have a record of dethroning front-runners who take the state for granted. Mrs Pernold Young still lives in Portsmouth, and jokes that "The woman who made Hillary Clinton cry" will be carved on her tombstone. Over breakfast at the Café Espresso, she says she will back Mrs Clinton this time round, after supporting Mr Obama in the 2008 primary. Appalled by the "quagmire" in Washington, and disappointed by how long it took Mr Obama to learn the ways of government, she likes the idea of electing a worldly insider like Mrs Clinton, sighing: "I don't want another trainee." But she does not want a coronation either. She notes that some friends roll their eyes at another Clinton presidency, especially as no serious Democratic rival has yet emerged. "I'd like to see Hillary be challenged," she says.

Such views are widespread, and have been heard within the Clinton camp. Two close advisers, Robby Mook and Marlon Marshall, visited New Hampshire and Iowa just before Easter, meeting local Democratic power-brokers. One of these was James Demers, a strategist and lobbyist who was one of Mr Obama's first big backers in New Hampshire. The message from Mrs Clinton's inner circle was that the former secretary of state will run as though she faces a bitterly contested primary, Mr Demers says. She will use the race to explain to America why she wants the presidency, while building the sort of campaign machinery that propelled Mr Obama to the White House in 2008. Whether her primary involves one, two or ten candidates, Mrs Clinton "knows that she has to earn every vote".

As one of the most famous people in the world, constantly watched by the Secret Service, it will be hard for Mrs Clinton to campaign in the traditional New Hampshire way, says Terry Shumaker, a lawyer who co-chaired both of Bill Clinton's campaigns in the state. But he thinks she must try, using the "intimacy" of the state to communicate with the whole country. He describes his old friend as an economic centrist, who sees government as a positive force but believes that business is the engine of the economy. In 2016 she can add domestic and global experience to the mix. "There is a huge hunger for Washington to work again," he says. And with Islamic State fanatics on the prowl, voters have a "visceral" need to feel safe.

Not all Democrats are convinced. Martha Fuller Clark, a state senator and big Obama backer in 2008, notes that New Hampshire Democrats are not "100% for Hillary". She herself remains uncommitted, noting that a potential rival, the former governor of Maryland, Martin O'Malley, has been active in the state. In her telling, New Hampshire Democrats want a candidate who will fight against inequality and for the middle class. They worry about climate change, and are unhappy that so much outside money is flowing into their state, notably since the Supreme Court eased the rules on political spending. They want to hear from Mrs Clinton how to "move from a plutocracy back to a democracy", says Mrs Fuller Clark.

Sisters are doin' it for themselves

That echoes complaints from other Democrats, such as Gary Hart, a former presidential contender, who recently said it should "frighten every American" that the Clinton machine reportedly intends to raise $1 billion. Once the real campaigning starts, the former secretary of state needs a strategy to engage and excite the broader electorate, especially the young, Mrs Fuller Clark adds: not least because she thinks that female politicians are judged more harshly than men, which makes it hard to be accessible. "Women really want to do a good job, something that constrains them from engaging more freely with voters."

After years worrying about the Middle East and Russia, Mrs Clinton will be grilled about health care, or the lack of full-day kindergartens in half the towns in New Hampshire, predicts Colin Van Ostern, a member of the state's Executive Council. He thinks this will do Candidate Clinton much good: "What Hillary Clinton needs is exactly what New Hampshire demands."

The challenges of a fresh Clinton candidacy were summed up by Bill Clinton, the man with the potential to be the campaign's greatest asset and worst liability. No living ex-president enjoys higher approval ratings, as Americans forget the scandals of the 1990s and remember the economic growth, balanced budgets and bipartisan reforms of the welfare system that were achieved on Mr Clinton's watch. Yet in 2008 an ill-disciplined Mr Clinton caused chaos in his wife's campaign.

The former president recently told Town & Country magazine that he was not sure he was any good at campaigning any more because "I'm not mad at anybody," citing the mellowing effects of being a grandfather. Despite that disclaimer, Mr Clinton could not resist analysing his wife's putative campaign in some detail, noting that it is hard for any party to hold the White House for longer than two terms, and arguing that should his wife run, she should "go out there as if she's never run for anything before and establish her connection with the voters."

The problem is that the Clintons have run for many things before. Mrs Clinton first entered the governor's mansion in Arkansas in 1979, and has been in the public eye ever since. This makes connecting with ordinary folk a challenge. In a speech last year to a convention of car dealers, she confided that: "The last time I actually drove a car myself was 1996." The fact that she typically received six-figure sums for such speeches does not help either.

Republicans may be expected to paint her as part liberal-elitist, and part big-government statist. Playing on lingering public disapproval of the Obamacare health reforms, Republicans may try to revive memories of Mrs Clinton's failed attempts at expanding health coverage during her husband's presidency.

Republicans will also try to use her record as secretary of state from 2009-13 against her. It is common to hear them talk of a world made more dangerous by a naive, feckless "Obama-Clinton foreign policy". Mrs Clinton is blamed on the right for her role in offering Russia a "reset" in relations, for clashing with the Israeli government of Binyamin Netanyahu, and for generally squandering her time as America's top envoy. Of her boast of having travelled to 112 countries, one putative

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republican challenger, Carly Fiorina, a former boss of Hewlett-Packard, scoffs that: “Flying is an activity, not an accomplishment.”

Without a scrap of evidence, many conservatives remain convinced that Mrs Clinton chose out of political calculation not to protect an American mission in Benghazi, leading to the deaths of America’s ambassador to Libya and three aides, then sought to cover up her blunders. Such suspicions have not been allayed by the recent revelation that Mrs Clinton used a private server throughout her time at the State Department, preserving for the archives only the e-mails that she deemed relevant and deleting the rest. And she will face queries about donations from foreign governments, some less than democratic, to the Clinton Foundation, a family charity that also serves to keep her in the public eye.

The Democratic grassroots have their own gripes with the Clintons. They have not forgotten that Mrs Clinton voted for George W. Bush’s Iraq war as a senator. It took her until March 2013 to come out for gay marriage. But mostly the left of the party worries that the Clintons are too soft on capitalism. They recall Mr Clinton’s presidency as a time when the rules on Wall Street banks were loosened, in their view setting the scene for the later financial crash. It remains an article of faith among trade unions that the North American Free Trade Agreement signed by Mr Clinton with Mexico and Canada sucked jobs out of the American heartland.

Standin’ on their own two feet

Though no credible Democratic challenger has emerged, many Democrats see (or want to see) a vacuum to Mrs Clinton’s left. Mr O’Malley, who as governor of Maryland was hardly a socialist banner-waver, now sides with groups who insist that America can afford to increase federal benefits for the old, breaking with years of broad consensus that Social Security is doomed to insolvency unless benefits are eventually curtailed and taxes raised.

Lots of leftists still long for Senator Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts to make a populist bid for the presidency, demanding tougher regulation of Wall Street, fewer free-trade deals and more redistribution to the middle class. Mrs Warren says she is not running, but the clamour continues. It is in part an attempt to put pressure on Mrs Clinton to tack to the left.

Some critics worry that Mrs Clinton is too old (she would be 69 in January 2017, making her the second-oldest newly elected president, eight months younger than Ronald Reagan). Others fret about her health (she suffered a blood clot on her brain in 2012). She cannot do much about either charge.

She could deal with a different concern—that no one knows what she really believes—but she is in no hurry. Candidates usually take sharply ideological positions during primaries, to woo the die-hard activists who vote in them, before tacking back to the centre as the general election nears. However, if Mrs Clinton faces no real primary challenger, she may not need to do this. Instead, she will need to woo enough Democrats to build a sense of excitement and grassroots involvement, without alienating swing voters. And if she cannot achieve the same stellar levels of support among black and young voters that Mr Obama did, she will need to fill the gap some other way.

She has made her pitch to women clear. She stresses her desire to help more of them into the workforce. She solemnly declares that women should receive equal pay for the same work as men (a position with which no one disagrees). In the past she has campaigned to make it easier for women to sue over alleged discrimination.

A big test involves white voters without a college education, who make up about a third of the electorate, but have drifted from the Democrats since Bill Clinton’s day. Mr Obama only won 36% of their votes in 2012, and might have done still worse if he had not successfully painted his Republican opponent, Mitt Romney, as their worst nightmare of a boss.

Should Mrs Clinton win the general election, she will also need to be ready on Day One to deal with Republicans. There is virtually no chance that Democrats will win the House of Representatives in 2016, and even if they retake the Senate they will not have a filibuster-proof majority.

Expect Mrs Clinton to run to Mr Obama’s right on foreign policy. In interviews since leaving the State Department she has said that she urged him to take a muscular approach to Russia. She has chided Europeans for failing to stand up to Vladimir Putin (she wants them to send arms to Ukraine, for example), while crediting the reset with achieving at least one arms-control agreement and securing Russian help in talks to curb Iran’s nuclear ambitions. She has called the latest draft deal with Iran, brokered by America and other world powers, an “important step”, whatever that means. Last year she signalled that she would be more comfortable with stricter curbs on Iran’s nuclear programme. In a rare overt criticism of Mr Obama, she said in 2014 that the failure to help non-Islamist Syrian rebels fight against Bashar Assad had left a “big vacuum” for Islamic State and other jihadists to fill.

Mrs Clinton has come close to echoing Republican grumbles that Mr Obama is too apologetic about American power. She says that her country cannot solve all problems, “but there’s not a problem that we face that can be solved without the United States.” While ruling out a return to the hubris of the George W. Bush years, she hints that the time has come for America to re-engage with the world.

In domestic forums Mrs Clinton is fluent in the language of the modern business-friendly centre-left. She is keen on public infrastructure, universal education for the youngest children, lowering the cost of college and experimenting with German-style wage-subsidies for the working poor. She likes to see church groups working alongside strong trade unions and community organisations, and uses “evidence-based” as high praise for any policy. In 2008 she sometimes sounded like a deficit hawk, with slogans like: “We’ve got to stop spending money we don’t have.” In 2008 she also called for a “time out” on new trade deals, though as secretary of state she backed new pacts. During primary debates she called herself “committed to making sure Social Security is solvent” and said that the best route to reform lay through bipartisan compromise.

And ringin’ on their own bells

Yet even policy experts invited to private sessions with Mrs Clinton in recent months are not sure where she stands. One centrist policy adviser says that, after being quizzed by her about paths to restoring middle-class prosperity, he thinks (and certainly hopes) that she will say that it is a false choice to argue that fairness and economic growth must be in opposition to each other.

Such centrists would like to hear her thank Mr Obama for saving the economy from disaster after the financial crash in 2008 and praise him for expanding health care. Then she could change the subject, turning the country’s attention to the task of building an economy for the 21st century, harnessing growth to boost middle-class wages. If it sounds to voters more like a third term of Bill Clinton than four more years of Mr Obama, that would suit many Hillary-backers just fine.

Hillary Clinton Can't Coast on Her Belief in Climate Science [Rebecca Leber, TNR, April 10, 2015]

Hillary Clinton will be the only legitimate contender for the White House—declared or presumptive—who embraces the scientific reality of climate change.

This weekend, Hillary Clinton reportedly will announce her candidacy for president. In doing so, she will be the only legitimate contender for the White House—declared or presumptive—who embraces the scientific reality of climate change.

Clinton could coast through the primary with an environmental platform that rests entirely on this fact, and remain vague on her plans for climate action. But she would be blowing a tremendous opportunity.

Environmentalists aren't sure where Clinton stands these days, though she did work to boost her climate credentials in two high-profile speeches months before the official launch of her campaign. At September's National Clean Energy Summit in Las Vegas, Clinton called climate change “the most consequential, urgent, sweeping collection of challenges we face as a nation and a world.” And two months later, in a speech to the League of Conservation Voters, she said, "The science of climate change is unforgiving, no matter what the deniers may say, sea levels are rising, ice caps are melting, storms, droughts and wildfires are wreaking havoc."

But those speeches only signal that she's not, say, Ted Cruz. Little is known about her specific policies on the environment. She’s never tweeted about climate change, and she’s steered clear of debates over the Keystone XL pipeline. "You won't get me to talk about Keystone because I have steadily made clear that I'm not going to express an opinion," Clinton said in Canada the same week the Senate debated a Keystone bill. So far, the most promising sign that her campaign will be aggressive on the environment is her hiring former White House senior adviser John Podesta, who led the Obama administration's recent strategy on climate.

Friends of the Earth President Erich Pica hopes Clinton uses her high profile to elevate the climate debate in America, much like President Barack Obama has.

“I think the real difficulty is whether or not it’s a proactive debate where Clinton is proactively pushing her vision and what it means for the United States and globe if she will be responding in a defensive manner to Obama’s climate plan,” Pica said. “She should model what the president is doing right now. He has the bully pulpit of the presidency and he is trying to steer proactively the climate debate."

Some environmentalists worry she will dodge difficult policy issue, including methane emissions from fracking, leasing public lands to energy companies, and offshore drilling.

“The question isn’t whether or not Hillary Clinton’s talking points are better than those of Ted Cruz, or if she’ll say nice things about renewable energy," 350 Action spokesperson Karthik Ganapathy said. "Rising above climate denial isn’t the bar here; the real question is how her policies stack up against the science, and whether or not they’ll actually keep fossil fuels in the ground to avert the worst impacts of global warming."

Realistically, Clinton will get support from national green groups regardless of what she does. She'll support clean energy and Obama's major climate policies. That's good enough for most supporters.

A few groups, like Friends of the Earth and 350.org , have called out the Clinton Foundation's ties to the oil and gas industry and criticized her past comments about Keystone. In 2010, Clinton hinted she was “inclined” to approve the Keystone pipeline when she was secretary of state. She also aggressively promoted natural gas as “the cleanest fossil fuel available” and hired a former oil industry representative to push the fossil fuel abroad. Environmentalists want to see Clinton temper her support for fracking by acknowledging its problems—that it leaks greenhouse gas emissions, causes minor earthquakes, and contaminates groundwater.

Taking specific stances on environmental issues carries its own risk, but there might be a bigger payoff. After all, Clinton will have to energize the Democratic base in order to win her general-election campaign. “Presidential candidates who propose to aggressively invest in clean energy jobs and reduce climate pollution would enhance their appeal to young and Latino voters, as well as other groups," LCV Senior Vice President for Campaigns Dan Weiss said. It could even help in swing states. "Iowa farmers, for instance, strongly support investments in wind energy. Small business owners in southern Florida would benefit from such policies that reduce the potential of floods from sea level rise," he said.

For too long, Democratic candidates have been content to mock Republican climate-deniers while proudly proclaiming their belief in the science of climate change. In 2016, that will no longer suffice. Obama's recent controversial executive actions ensure that climate change will be an election issue. If an international deal to cut emissions is successful by the end of 2015, then the ensuing debate could dominate the early primaries in 2016. Clinton will have to answer questions about where she stands. She shouldn't wait until then to give us her answer.

Review: ‘Clinton the Musical’ Proves Unimpeachably Amusing [Laura Collins-Hughes, NYT, April 10, 2015]

‘Clinton the Musical’ portrays Hillary Clinton well and is an entertaining show for all.

First came the gnashing of teeth over Hillary Clinton’s private email account, and her soon-to-be announced presidential campaign. Then, with a TED talk, Monica Lewinsky signaled her return to the spotlight. Now a show called “Clinton the Musical” has opened Off Broadway.

A person could be forgiven for wanting to hide under the bed until the 1990s stopped making a comeback.

But cowering would be a mistake. Far better to crawl out from behind that dust ruffle, head over to New World Stages and let “Clinton the Musical” quell your fears.

Smartly silly, hilariously impudent and sneakily compassionate, it is nearly guaranteed to leave you humming a bouncy, exuberant tune called “Monica’s Song” — the lyrics are unprintable — and thinking far more fondly of the eight scandal-plagued years this country spent with a president from a place called Hope. In this frothily satirical political history — which has a book by the Australian brothers Paul and Michael Hodge, and music and lyrics by Paul Hodge — No. 42 is actually two presidents: the urbane, silver-haired WJ Clinton (Tom Galantich) and the louche, rutting Billy Clinton (Duke Lafoon).

“In my whole life I have only ever loved two men,” Hillary (Kerry Butler) says. “And they happen to be the same man.”

So the famous Bill-and-Hillary package deal the country got in the 1992 election is a three-for-one bargain here, with WJ, Billy and brainy, resilient Hillary tussling for dominance in a White House designed by Beowulf Boritt, where the portraits on the walls show past presidents and their amours.

Chief among the enemies waiting to pounce is the deliciously sex-crazed special prosecutor Kenneth Starr (Kevin Zak), who gets his chance when Billy takes up with Monica (Veronica J. Kuehn). The prosecutor and Linda Tripp (Judy Gold), Monica’s predatory confidante, are the show’s only real villains. Newt Gingrich(John Treacy Egan) is more of a buffoon.

Reworked and largely recast since its run last July at the New York Musical Theater Festival, “Clinton” is now directed and choreographed by Dan Knechtges, and its tone is affectionately lampooning. Chelsea Clinton is mentioned by name only once, not cruelly. An occasional appearance by Socks the cat is enough to remind us that a family, not just a presidency, was at stake amid the Lewinsky scandal.

And Hillary? She tells us at the start that this is the story of her first presidency, and she comes off awfully well. In a flattering blue pantsuit by David C. Woolard, with hair designed by Tom Watson that looks consistently great, Ms. Butler makes a peppy, very funny Hillary whose ambitions are huge but whose capability is never in question.

The show's poster art notwithstanding, "Clinton" doesn't pit Hillary and Monica against each other. It's sympathetic to both of them, painting Monica as naïve and terribly young. That lack of meanspiritedness is crucial to its success.

"Clinton the Musical" isn't the sort of show that the real-life subjects are likely to find entertaining, but for the rest of us, it's 95 minutes of healthy catharsis.

Bloomberg Politics Poll: Democrats and Independents Don't Want a Hillary Coronation [John McCormick, Bloomberg Politics, April 10, 2015]

If Hillary Clinton is to become her party's 2016 presidential nominee, independents and even Democrats overwhelmingly want to see her earn the title, according to a Bloomberg Politics national poll that also shows increasing headwinds for her candidacy.

If Hillary Clinton is to become her party's 2016 presidential nominee, independents and even Democrats overwhelmingly want to see her earn the title, according to a Bloomberg Politics national poll that also shows increasing headwinds for her candidacy.

As Clinton prepared to formally announce her candidacy on Sunday, nearly three-quarters of Democrats and independents in the survey said it would be a good thing for the Democratic Party if she were to face a "serious" challenger for the nomination. Democrats and independents hold the same view, with 72 percent of both groups saying her party would be best served by a robust primary.

That presents a potential opening for other Democrats considering bids, including former Maryland Governor Martin O'Malley and possibly Vice President Joe Biden.

"She's not a naive person. She knows the law and has been in government and knows records retention issues."

Leave Little

Facing a serious challenge "would prepare her for debates and things like that against the Republican nominee," said poll respondent Marc Witte, 66, a Democrat and clinical counselor from Poland, Ohio. Yet Witte, who supports Clinton, isn't quite sure he wants Clinton to face an overly combative challenger. "That could be a bad thing," he said.

The poll, taken April 6-8, also indicates that Clinton will confront continued skepticism about whether she has been truthful in saying that she's turned over all e-mails relevant to her time as secretary of state. Fifty-three percent of Americans say they think she purposely withheld or deleted some relevant e-mails from a private account and home server she used while in office. Just 29 percent of respondents said they thought she was being truthful.

Even 26 percent of Democrats believe she has purposefully withheld e-mails or deleted them. That number jumps to 60 percent for independents and 81 percent for Republicans.

Clinton's office said March 10 she gave 30,490 work-related e-mails to the State Department, which is reviewing them for public release. An additional 32,830 e-mails, which Clinton said involved personal matters such as wedding planning or yoga routines, were deleted.

"She's not a naive person," said poll respondent Leake Little, 54, a Democrat who works as a services consultant from San Francisco. "She knows the law and has been in government and knows records retention issues."

Little said the e-mail controversy is the top issue concerning him about Clinton's candidacy, in part because it's the most recent. "It raises a huge character issue for me. It goes to whether I can literally trust her," said Little, a services consultant from San Francisco. "Her actions just don't add up."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The e-mail controversy may be one of the factors depressing Clinton's overall standing. Just 48 percent view her favorably, down four points since December and marking the first time her standing has fallen below 50 percent in Bloomberg polls dating to September 2009. Her high was 70 percent in December, 2012.

More than a quarter of those who view her favorably also say she hasn't been truthful about her e-mails.

And the percentage of Democrats who say they will definitely vote for her if she is the Democratic nominee has dropped a full 10 points, to 42 percent from 52 percent in a Bloomberg poll in June, 2013. Just 18 percent of poll respondents say they definitely will vote for her for president, compared to 23 percent two years ago.

One thing is clear: The historic possibility of a woman becoming president isn't a major influence on attitudes. The vast majority of poll respondents–83 percent–say they wouldn't be more or less inclined to vote for Clinton because she would be the first female president.

"Clinton's strong performance in 2008 seems to have addressed any question of whether a woman could be a capable president. It's a non-issue now," said J. Ann Selzer, president of West Des Moines-based Selzer & Co., which conducted the poll. "At the end of the nomination fight, it was clear she had paved the way for other women with her '18 million cracks' in the glass ceiling. It turns out she may have paved the way for herself."

Women and liberals are more likely than others to say they'd be more inclined to vote for Clinton because of her gender. Seventeen percent of women say the idea of electing the first female president makes them more inclined to vote for Clinton, more than double the percentage of men who say that. Among those who consider themselves liberals, a quarter said Clinton's gender makes them more likely to back her.

"I just think it is time," said Jennifer LaDuca, 43, a full-time human resources management student and part-time thrift shop worker from Ahwahnee, Calif. "I would vote for almost any woman candidate over a male, as long as they weren't too out of line with my political thinking."

LaDuca, who considers herself a Democrat, said she's leaning toward supporting Clinton if she runs. She said her grandmother, who passed away in 2011 at the age of 98, voted for Clinton in the 2008 primary. "I would have loved for her to see Hillary Clinton get elected in her lifetime," she said.

As is typical for Clinton, more women view her favorably than men, 54 percent to 42 percent. Still, her standing with women has dropped 9 points from two years ago.

Her ratings have suffered among independent women, with 44 percent viewing her favorably and 48 percent unfavorably. That's a profound drop since June 2013, when that group viewed her favorably by almost a 2-1 ratio, 60 percent to 33 percent. Clinton's standing among Democrats remains strong at 82 percent, although that number has dropped six points since June 2013.

Like her husband, former President Bill Clinton, Hillary Clinton posts stronger numbers among younger Americans, who may not as well remember the controversies of the Clinton White House. Among those 34 or younger, 52 percent view her positively, compared to 46 percent of those 55 and older. Four in 10 independents view her favorably.

Among Democrats, 42 percent said they would definitely vote for her in a general election, down 10 points since June 2013. For Democratic women, the number isn't much higher, 46 percent. That's down 8 points since June 2013.

Bill Clinton's standing in the poll has dropped only slightly, with 60 percent viewing him favorably compared to 64 percent in a September 2012 Bloomberg poll. That's well above his wife's number. Properly harnessed–and kept on message–he could prove to be a significant asset on the campaign trail.

The poll, which included interviews with 1,008 adults, has a margin of error of plus or minus 3.1 percentage points on the full sample.

What losing in 2008 taught Hillary about how to win in 2016 [Jonathan Allen, Vox, April 10, 2015]

When Hillary Clinton launches her campaign Sunday, she'll do something no other plausible presidential candidate – including Clinton herself – has done before: she'll run like a woman.

If she plays it right, it will be a feature, not a bug, of Hillary for President (2016 remix). The feminine motif will be fully integrated into her persona, her rhetoric, and her platform, according to interviews with a half-dozen sources close to Clinton.

That's a hell of a pivot from her 2008 campaign, when she all but refused to acknowledge what some of her advisers failingly insisted was intrinsic to her story. The new approach also owes to a shift in political atmospherics that favors attention to lower- and middle-class economic concerns, such as early-childhood education and paid time off, that motivate women voters, as well as many of their husbands, fathers, and sons.

"The culture has changed on these issues," said Neera Tanden, the president of the Center for American Progress and a former Clinton policy aide. "Hillary has not changed on these issues."

There's an obvious gap, a window of opportunity, separating women's participation in elections and their power in government. Women made up 53 percent of the electorate in the 2012 presidential election, and yet only 104 of the 535 full voting seats in the House and Senate are held by women. The historic dominance of men in elective office, from the presidency to Congress and the statehouses, has led to a chronic tilt away from the perspectives and priorities of women.

Clinton's strategy weaves together the immutably unique and historic aspect of her candidacy — her gender — with a domestic and foreign policy worldview that emphasizes the ways in which the full participation of women in society leads to greater stability and economic growth. In a similar vein, the cultural shift that Tanden points to can be seen in the Republican field's quick adoption of President Barack Obama's rhetoric – if not his policy choices – on economic inequality.

Ann O'Leary, a former Clinton adviser who has worked with her on the Clinton Foundation's early childhood education program over the past couple of years, says that pattern will repeat itself on family issues of particular importance to women that have become hot topics for men, too.

"Any candidate, whether it's Hillary Clinton or someone on the other side of the aisle, is going to have to take positions on these issues, because there's more demand for it," she says.

Clinton's transformation begins

Clinton's shift began with her concession speech in June 2008: She agreed to talk about herself and her place in the women's movement only after intense pressure from a set of her advisers who had lost out during the campaign. Ultimately, she spoke of the "18 million cracks" her supporters had put in the glass ceiling of the White House with their votes. She echoed Sojourner Truth's famous "Ain't I a woman" speech in weaving together the hopes of women and African Americans that day, and used Harriet Tubman to accomplish the same rhetorical union in her Democratic National Convention speech that same year.

At the State Department, Clinton created the post of ambassador for global women's issues, directed American diplomats to push their foreign counterparts on the rights of women and girls, and established programs such as the "Global Alliance for Clean Cookstoves" a partnership of governments, businesses and nonprofits that is designed to protect women from the deadly fumes of open-fire cooking.

Now she has concluded that running as a woman — and emphasizing issues that bolster the security of women and their families — is a strength that melds her political and policy identities and addresses some of her biggest problems as a candidate.

Still, it's a strategy that even allies acknowledge comes with the risk that Clinton could turn off voters by overplaying the gender card.

"You don't want to get so pigeonholed," one veteran Clinton adviser said. "I don't think she wants to run as the woman candidate just for women."

It's about you and me, not just me

Clinton's at her best when she's the champion of a cause — particularly an underdog constituency — that is larger than herself. The clearest examples come from her equation of women's rights and gay rights with human rights.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But she's been knocked, and fairly, for too often making her political story about herself, like when she kicked off her last campaign by declaring, "I'm in, and I'm in to win." This time, she's determined to connect herself with others first as an advocate and then as a presidential aspirant.

"She needs to explain to people why she wants to do this that is not about her," the veteran adviser said.

That's why she'll start with a listening tour. That's nothing new: Clinton conducted listening tours on proposed changes to Medicare when she was first lady and before her 2000 Senate campaign in New York. When she launched her first presidential campaign in 2007, she did "more talking than listening," the Associated Press observed.

Now she wants to show that her platform is, at least in part, a reaction to public demand. That is, don't expect thick policy briefs to appear online anytime soon.

"She's very much going to be in listening mode before she starts rolling out policies," said O'Leary, the former Clinton aide who worked with her on early-childhood education.

Will the real Hillary Clinton please stand up?

After years of high-profile battles — with Republicans, the press, and even members of her own party — Clinton retreated into a defensive posture in public. That was evident during her book tour and at an uncomfortable press conference after it was revealed that she prevented the State Department from having access to her email.

A byproduct of that defensiveness, bordering at times on paranoia, has been that she has struggled to come off as genuine in the eyes of her detractors and even some of her loyal allies.

Again, running as a woman begins to address that deficiency as a candidate. There's no storyline in Clinton's career that is as consistent as her efforts to advance the causes of women and girls.

From her early work at the Children's Defense Fund through her roles as first lady of Arkansas, first lady of the United States, secretary of state, and philanthropist, Clinton's rhetoric and areas of policy focus — from expanding health insurance to securing human rights for women — have been inextricably tied to a desire to strengthen women's standing in society.

Republicans know both parts of that: that she's been consistent on women's rights, and that she is perceived as less than honest. That's why they made hayof donations to the Clinton Foundation from countries with bad records on women's rights and why Rand Paul, who launched his candidacy on Tuesday, told Politico, "There's a lot of stuff there that is, I think, going to shake the confidence of Americans in her ability to lead in an honest fashion."

The shift: is it about us?

Last but not least, the electorate has shown signs that it's more inclined to support both women candidates and an issue set that Clinton has pushed in the past and that will be emphasized more in this campaign.

Clinton will promote those issues as essential to strengthening families, particularly in the lower and middle economic strata. While some of the specifics may have to wait, they're likely to include moving toward equal pay for women, expanding paid leave for parents, increasing the minimum wage, cutting the costs of childcare, cutting taxes for the middle class, and providing access to pre-kindergarten education across the country.

Clinton will frame the basket of kitchen-table issues as strengthening the economic standing of families, even as many of the policy goals would disproportionately benefit women — and appeal to women voters. That could force Republican candidates into difficult choices about whether to support small-government orthodoxy in the face of increasing demand for policies that help families balance work and home life.

The Republican governors of Indiana, Texas, and New Mexico highlighted their own efforts to boost early-childhood education in their state-of-the-state addresses this year. Yet Indiana Gov. Mike Pence turned down federal funding to expand his state's more targeted plan last year, explaining in an Indianapolis Star op-ed, "I believe Indiana must develop our own pre-K program without federal intrusion."

Ultimately, Clinton and her advisers believe they've found a way to marry the narrative of the nation's cultural shift toward women with her personal story.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Gender will be certainly more of an issue this time than last time, in part because there's going to be a strong effort to talk about who she really is," one longtime Clinton hand said, adding, "The trailblazing doesn't end with her inauguration."

Clinton team courts progressive economists [Alex Seitz-Wald, MSNBC, April 10, 2015]

Clinton's team has been making a concerted effort to reach out to progressives economists and activists, and last week joined a meeting on inequality organized by economist Joseph Stiglitz and the Roosevelt Institute, a progressive think tank, msnbc has learned.

Clinton's team has been making a concerted effort to reach out to progressives economists and activists, and last week joined a meeting on inequality organized by economist Joseph Stiglitz and the Roosevelt Institute, a progressive think tank, msnbc has learned.

The Washington, D.C., meeting included officials from the labor unions SEIU and AFL-CIO, congressional staffers, representatives from advocacy groups like Color of Change, American Women, and the Black Civic Engagement Fund, and others, including former Clinton pollster Stan Greenberg.

The aim was "creating an agenda to combat inequality that goes further than anything we've seen so far and rewrites the rules of how our economy and markets are structured," Roosevelt Institute spokesperson Marcus Mrowka told msnbc.

After the meeting, Stiglitz held a private dinner with three Clinton aides at the restaurant Poste. Clinton was represented by Jake Sullivan, a top State Department aide who is likely to join her campaign's policy team, speechwriter Dan Schwerin, and Anne O'Leary, a senior fellow at the Center for American Progress who also works on a Clinton Foundation-related initiative. Roosevelt President and CEO Felicia Wong was also in attendance.

Dan Geldon, an adviser to Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren, whom some liberals are pushing to run against Clinton, attended the larger meeting, but did not attend the dinner.

Stiglitz is influential among progressives, who view him as one of the Democratic Party's counterweights to the influence of former Bill Clinton Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin. Clinton herself has earned criticism from some on the left for ties to Wall Street and fears she would follow in Rubin's footsteps.

In an essay distributed to attendees, Stiglitz called for an alternative analytical framework to economic growth and equality, which have often been assumed to be in competition with each other. "The increase in inequality and the decrease in equality of opportunity have reached the point where minor fixes — such as modest increases in the minimum wage and continuing to strive to improve education and educational opportunity — will not suffice. A far more comprehensive approach to the problem is required, entailing redistribution and doing what one can to improve the market distribution of income and to prevent the unfair transmission of advantage across generations," he wrote.

Clinton is expected to put inequality at the center of her campaign's economic message, but to address is in a less confrontational manner than Warren. A recent 160-page white paper from the Center for American Progress on "Inclusive Prosperity" gives a hint about her agenda.

Mrowka said the meeting was constructive and that Clinton aides were receptive.

GOP: Clinton announcement won't blunt Benghazi probe [Lauren French, POLITICO, April 10, 2015]

House Republicans investigating the 2012 terrorist attacks in Benghazi and Hillary Clinton's email practices as secretary of state said in interviews that her official entry into the presidential race won't have any bearing on their probes.

House Republicans investigating the 2012 terrorist attacks in Benghazi and Hillary Clinton's email practices as secretary of state said in interviews that her official entry into the presidential race won't have any bearing on their probes.

But the political stakes of the Clinton congressional investigations are about to skyrocket. Both parties will be watching the committee's work intently for ammo to use against Clinton or to call foul on the GOP for attempting to smear a presidential contender.

"Secretary Clinton's decision to seek the presidency of the United States does not and will not impact the work of the committee," said Rep. Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.), chairman of the House Select Committee on Benghazi. "The Committee needs to and expects to talk with Secretary Clinton twice, as ensuring the committee has all relevant material is a condition precedent to asking specifically about Libya and Benghazi."

But Democrats would like nothing more than an ongoing spectacle of congressional Republicans looking like they're tripping over themselves to go after Clinton. Avoiding such an atmosphere amid the heightened attention will be a major political challenge for Gowdy, a former U.S. attorney tapped to head the Benghazi panel and the initial investigation into Clinton's email use.

Democrats are already accusing the South Carolina Republican of "slow-walking" his investigation to coincide with Clinton's presidential bid.

"You knew from day one that she would appear before the committee [so it's] interesting that they need to hear from her now that it's the start of the 2016 election season," said Rep. Linda Sanchez (D-Calif.). "I knew that the select committee was not going to be about the facts and the evidence. My sneaking suspicions was that it was going to be an excuse to go after Secretary Clinton."

The former secretary of state has always been a central figure in the House GOP's investigation of the militants who attacked a U.S. outpost in Benghazi. But Clinton's formal jump into the presidential race will magnify every Republican move on this front. Clinton's campaign kickoff comes just as Gowdy — who has also been informally tapped to head up the House's initial investigation of her email use — is asking Clinton to make her first appearance before the panel. She has been asked to testify before May 1. Gowdy said Friday the committee is still working with Clinton to schedule the hearings.

Ohio Republican Rep. Jim Jordan, another member of the Benghazi panel, said Gowdy is determined not to allow the committee to become a 2016 battlefield.

"Our job has everything to do with the truth and nothing to do with who may or may not be the next president of the United States," said Jordan. "That's our charge, that's our mission and that's solely what we're about. How that impacts the presidential, that's not even the focus of the committee."

Republicans on the committee said the reason Clinton is being asked testify in such close proximity to her campaign announcement is because the State Department took so long to produce documents. The committee has been given access to thousands of pages of emails and evidence but is asking for more.

"This, quote, perception that some may have could have been avoided if the State Department would have given us the documents a year ago," Jordan said. "If we would of had the documents or if the State Department or Secretary Clinton would have told us months and months and months ago that she had a separate account…this could have all been avoided."

The committee became aware that Clinton used a private email late last summer but only discovered the extent to which Clinton kept her emails from the State Department on a private server in March.

Both sides say their general tactics won't change with Clinton about to be an official presidential candidate; her campaign launch is expected this weekend. Republicans are still expecting the former secretary of state to appear at least twice before the panel. Gowdy invited Clinton to testify in a closed-hearing on her use of a private email and server and another public hearing on the Obama administration's response to the Benghazi attacks.

Rep. Elijah Cummings, the top Democrat on the Benghazi Committee, said he would continue to criticize Gowdy's tactics, including holding interviews privately issuing subpoenas without consent.

"It's been a select committee on Hillary Clinton and it will continue to be that. They ought to do what I've said many times, allow her to come into a public forum, a hearing, and let her testify," the Maryland Democrat said.

Cummings added that Clinton indicated to the committee she would be willing to answer questions on her email use and the Benghazi incident during a public hearing. Clinton reportedly told Cummings last year she was prepared to testify as early as December — before her email use was made public - on the Obama administration's response to Libya.

Gowdy has said he offered Clinton the private hearing on her emails to avoid the appearance of politicizing the committee and has repeatedly stressed that the committee is concerned only with correspondence related to Benghazi.

"Our Committee has no interest in any emails related to the Secretary's personal, private matters nor is our Committee seeking documents unrelated to Libya and Benghazi during the relevant time periods," Gowdy said last week. "The Committee is, however, committed to reviewing and considering every document related to the work the House of Representatives charged us with doing."

But Sanchez said Democrats' hands are largely tied because of the committee's broad mandate from Speaker John Boehner (R-Ohio.)

"There is not a lot we can do because…the select committee pretty much has a blank check. There is unilateral power to subpoena so there is not a lot we Democrats can do," she said.

Still, Rep. Adam Schiff (D-Calif.) said Democrats will still be watching closely to debunk what they see as myths about Benghazi and step in if Republicans try to turn the committee into a campaign tool.

"She's been their target all along. In that sense, nothing has changed [because of her likely announcement] about the degree that they've turned the select committee into an arm of the NRCC," he said.

President Obama's Quiet Case for Hillary Clinton in 2016 [Devin Dwyer, ABC News, April 11, 2015]

President Obama has praised Hillary Clinton in the run-up to the 2016 presidential election.

In her final days as secretary of state, Hillary Clinton said goodbye to President Obama over a lunch of fish tacos in the dining room off the Oval Office. As a parting gift, she gave her former rival 20 pages of recommendations for what to do in his second term.

"Tearing up, I hugged the president and told him again how much our work and friendship meant to me," Clinton writes of Obama in the new epilogue of her book "Hard Choices." "And that I'd be on call if he ever needed me."

As the 2016 presidential campaign kicks into gear, Obama needs Clinton more than ever before – a message he's made increasingly clear over the past two years, without having to pick up the phone.

Obama has heaped more effusive praise on his former secretary of state than just about any other high-profile Democrat, including his own vice president, Joe Biden, who has also aspired to the nation's top office.

Obama has declared Clinton "a world figure" and an "extraordinary talent." He said in a joint interview with "60 Minutes" that she was "one of the most important advisers" he's had, and a "strong friend."

"If she's her wonderful self, I'm sure she is going to do great" in the campaign, Obama said in an interview this week.

The accolades and encouragement are a far cry from the lukewarm "likable enough" description Obama affixed to Clinton during a 2007 primary debate. White House officials told ABC News that the president "thinks very highly" of Clinton as a candidate and that she has a "strong case to make" to become his successor.

To be sure, President Obama remains coy about an explicit primary endorsement and, officials say, will likely keep a low profile in the early stages of the campaign. He told CBS News in an April 2014 interview that Biden would also be a strong candidate as "one of the finest vice presidents in history."

"I don't necessarily want to jam them up," Obama said of his potential involvement with the candidates in the early Democratic field.

'Clinton the Musical' Looks Back, Just in Time for 2016

Still, as Clinton formally launches her second presidential bid this weekend as the dominant Democratic front-runner, Obama is quietly banking on her to be the defender of his legacy.

He's cited her discipline, stamina, thoughtfulness and "ability to project" their shared values as factors that make her "extraordinary" in his eyes.

On Twitter, Clinton has given an unabashed embrace of her former boss's policies, defending Obamacare and his immigration executive action. She's also defended the administration's sweeping reforms of the financial system and the president's economic blueprint outlined in his State of the Union.

Ties to the Obama White House already run deep. The Clinton campaign apparatus is stuffed with former top Obama administration policy makers and strategists, including former White House communications director Jennifer Palmieri, former Obama senior counselor John Podesta, and former Michelle Obama aide Kristina Schake.

Administration officials deny any planned direct coordination between the Obama White House and the Clinton campaign on messaging or legislative agenda, but do not rule it out.

“I’m confident that there will be a lot of agreement between the priorities that she articulates and the kinds of priorities this president has been fighting for the last six years,” said spokesman Josh Earnest late last month.

Obama, Clinton Remain Allies

On a personal level, Obama and Clinton have maintained in close touch, holding occasional in-person meetings and regularly exchanging email messages,officials say. They last met together in the Oval Office in late March when they discussed their families, current events and politics, aides said.

“Are there going to be differences? Yeah. Deep differences? Of course,” Clinton told “60 Minutes” in the 2013 joint interview. How those play out on the stump will be a difficult balancing act. Obama and his policies remain highly popular among Democratic voters, but much more contentious among independents and Republicans.

Forty-seven percent of Americans approve of President Obama’s work in office, according to the latest ABC News/ Washington Post poll. The same number disapprove.

For now, the soon-to-be-candidate Clinton is signaling that her focus will be on the overlap in interests and priorities with Obama – revealing less daylight than many pundits had initially expected.

Will we see President Obama and Hillary Clinton exchange another bear hug on stage? Maybe not soon – but don’t rule it out.

“As it relates to the president’s intentions to wade into a Democratic primary, that’s not something that he often does,” Earnest said. “But we’ll see. A long way until the Democratic convention.”

NRA convention becomes Hillary Clinton roast [John McCormick, Bloomberg Politics, April 10, 2015]

Prospective 2016 Republican presidential candidates and the leaders of the National Rifle Association focused more on Hillary Clinton than President Barack Obama on Friday as they criticized their gun-control views and other policies.

NASHVILLE—Prospective 2016 Republican presidential candidates and the leaders of the National Rifle Association focused more on Hillary Clinton than President Barack Obama on Friday as they criticized their gun-control views and other policies.

"We're onto her. She's been coming after us for decades," NRA Executive Vice President Wayne LaPierre told the group's annual convention. "Hillary Clinton hasn't met a gun control bill she couldn't support."

In a sprawling ballroom at the Music City Center convention center, LaPierre took members of the nation's largest and most powerful gun organization on a stroll down memory lane of Clinton controversies, saying the former secretary of state, senator and first lady "has more 'gates' than a south Texas cattle ranch."

Clinton is poised to announce her second bid for the presidency as early as this weekend.

"We will stand and we will fight with everything we're got and in 2016, by God, we will elect our next great president of the United States of America and it will not be Hillary Rodham Clinton," LaPierre said.

Senator Ted Cruz of Texas, who announced his candidacy last month, made a reference to a cannon involved with the Texas Revolution in the 1830s, as he noted Clinton's pending entry into the race.

"This weekend, Hillary Clinton is announcing for president," he said. "Well, I'll tell you, if Hillary Clinton is going to join with Barack Obama and the gun-grabbers that come after our guns, then what I say is come and take it."

Former Florida Governor Jeb Bush called the Second Amendment "the original Homeland Security Act," as he pitched his record on guns.

“I’ve been in the trenches with you. And when I was governor, we were passing laws and creating protections for gun-owners that set the bar for other states to follow," he said. “I will match my record against anyone else’s when it comes to the support and defense of the Second Amendment."

Senator Marco Rubio of Florida kept his criticism directed at Obama. "Strong defenses, both on the national and the personal level, are means of preventing violence, not of promoting it," he said. "Weakness, on the other hand, is the friend of danger and weakness is the enemy of peace. President Obama has been a weak president. The only thing President Obama has strengthened over the last six years has been his own, unlawful power."

Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker criticized Obama's unsuccessful efforts to tighten gun regulations. "Mr. President, last time I checked, the Second Amendment is part of the Constitution," he said. "You don't get to pick and choose which part of the Constitution you like and which part you don't."

Walker said his support for the NRA and less restrictive gun laws isn't just because his state has a strong hunting heritage. "When we signed into law concealed carry, it was about freedom," he said.

Bobby Jindal, governor of Louisiana, arrives at the podium.

Louisiana Governor Bobby Jindal, looking out onto the audience at the start of his remarks, made a Clinton reference as well. "I think all of us are what Hillary Clinton once called the 'vast right wing conspiracy,'" he joked.

Jindal called the NRA the "most effective civil rights organization" in the U.S. "It is our duty to not only exercise our freedoms, but to defend the freedoms of all Americans," he said.

Former Texas Governor Rick Perry, who is known for jogging with a firearm, told the gathering that he had "hung out the 'open for business' sign for gun manufactures." The best defense against crime is an "armed citizenry," he said.

Ben Carson, a neurosurgeon-turned-conservative-activist, sought to assure NRA members about a 2013 statement he made about semi-automatic weapons. "I've learned how to express myself better," he said. "I am extremely pro-Second Amendment."

Despite what he has seen on the streets and in emergency rooms, Carson said he remains solidly pro-gun. "I spent many a night operating on people with gunshot wounds to their heads," he said. "It is not nearly as horrible as having a population that is defenseless against a group of tyrants who have arms."

Former Arkansas Governor Mike Huckabee ended his speech with a "God bless the NRA," after arguing that guns are central to the nation's self-defense. "We will not disarm and America will never fall," he said. "It will not fall because we will not let it."

Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina kept his focus on Obama, as he said that virtually all of the Republicans likely to run for president are supportive of gun rights. "The next time you vote for president, make sure they've at least run a lemonade stand, they're proud of their country in terms of being exceptional and they know somebody who owns a gun," he said.

In total, almost a dozen prospective Republican candidates spoke Friday afternoon, near the start of a three-day convention that organizers say will draw about 70,000. Absent were New Jersey Governor Chris Christie and Senator Rand Paul of Kentucky, who weren't invited.

Christie, who once criticized the NRA after the group featured Obama's children in a video, received a marginal grade (C) from them before of his successful 2013 re-election.

Paul, who opposes gun control legislation and has been an outspoken on the Second Amendment, is in the midst of a four-state tour following his Tuesday presidential campaign announcement.

With the exception of Christie, nearly all of the prospective Republican candidates are opposed to new limits on the purchase or use of guns. Their NRA ratings range from A-plus to an A-minus.

The Hillary Clinton steamroller rumbles to life [Harry Enten, FiveThirtyEight, April 10, 2015]

Hillary Clinton boasts a historic lead in the 2016 Democratic primary.

Let's do something a little unusual. Instead of going through all the reasons that Hillary Clinton is so likely to win the Democratic nomination (and she is) and then tucking a caveat-laden paragraph at the bottom of this article, let's start with one big caveat:

Presidential elections aren't baseball. They take place just once every four years, so we don't have thousands of at-bats to analyze. Clinton, who will reportedly officially announce her campaign Sunday, could lose the primary. Perhaps there's some scandal we're unaware of. Perhaps she'll have to drop out because of some health issue. Maybe Martin O'Malley will straight-up beat her; stranger things have … well, OK, maybe not.

Clinton's primary campaign is by far the most dominant for a non-incumbent president since nominations began to be determined by caucuses and primaries in 1972. The best predictors we have all say Clinton is going to be the Democrats' 2016 presidential nominee.1

Endorsements

Clinton has pretty much already won the endorsement primary, the all-important pre-voting race to lock up party establishment support.2 Last time she ran for president, Clinton lost the endorsement primary. By this point in the 2008 campaign, she had only one senator endorse her publicly. According to a CNNcount in February, Clinton has already secured endorsements from 27 of 46 Democratic senators. That's a ton of support so early in the campaign.

Clinton's strength is unique. Most years, the campaign is barely underway in early April. And in the years in which endorsements come quickly, elected officials usually wait at least until a candidate formally declares.

But here's the more amazing thing about those 27 endorsements: That total would still be impressive even if no one else were to endorse Clinton. Only George W. Bush's 2000 machine picked up more senator endorsements (33), and it took him the entire primary campaign. He didn't reach 27 until November 1999. The only other two campaigns to come close to 27 were Bob Dole's in 1996 and Al Gore's in 2000; each picked up 26. Like Bush, Dole and Gore rolled over the competition.

Just as important as the number of endorsements is where they are coming from on the ideological spectrum. Clinton is earning endorsements from the left, center and right of the Democratic caucus. In this kernel density function of endorsers plotted against their congressional voting record, we see that the senators who have endorsed Clinton look ideologically very similar to those who haven't (more negative scores are more liberal):

Unlike in 2008, Clinton has her left flank well-covered. She has the endorsement of liberal stalwarts such as Sens. Tammy Baldwin and Elizabeth Warren. Clinton also has the endorsement of moderate senators such as Joe Manchin and Claire McCaskill.

Polling

Clinton also has the most dominant poll numbers of any candidate at this point in the election cycle in the modern era. Early primary polling is not the be-all and end-all, but candidates who are polling very well across the board early tend to win their nominations. In an average of polls taken since the beginning of the year, Clinton is above 50 percent in Iowa, New Hampshire and nationally. No other non-incumbent in the modern era has done that in the first half of the year before the primaries began.

It's only in Iowa where Clinton doesn't have an outright claim to the strongest polling average in recent history. But she's still in a strong position at 62 percent — about where Gore was in early 1999. Gore went on to win Iowa with 63 percent of the vote and every single primary after that. Dole was the only candidate besides Clinton and Gore to hit at least 40 percent in early Iowa, New Hampshire and national polling. He won 44 states and easily took the 1996 GOP nomination.

Clinton is in a far stronger position than she was last time around. Back in 2008, she was trailing in early Iowa polls. She earned only a third of the vote in early New Hampshire polls and was below 40 percent nationally.

Nor are there any real holes in her support. According to YouGov pollingconducted in March, 68 percent of Democrats believe she is “about right” ideologically.3 Only 12 percent of Democrats would not consider voting for her, according to a February CBS News survey. In the latest Marist College survey, she earns more than 60 percent among liberal,4 moderate and conservative Democratic primary voters.

Clinton’s early polling tells the same story as the endorsements: Democrats don’t seem open to other options. It’s not a situation likely to tempt a formidable Democrat to jump into the race. Which brings us to the third point …

The (lack of) competition

Clinton looks like she’ll have perhaps four competitors for the nomination: O’Malley, Lincoln Chafee, Bernie Sanders and Jim Webb. Sanders is the only one who currently holds elected office. Only O’Malley has ever been elected as a Democrat to any office for more than one term.

Chafee, who is from Rhode Island, has never won a Democratic primary for any office. He served in the U.S. Senate as a Republican and was an independent governor. The only time he could have won a Democratic primary (for governor), he bowed out because he faced a bruising campaign. He frequently had an approval rating of around 30 percent in blue Rhode Island.

O’Malley’s turn as governor of deep-blue Maryland went so far south that a Republican succeeded him, which is a fate that didn’t even befall Chafee. As I’ve written previously, O’Malley’s ideological record and donor base do not suggest that he can successfully challenge Clinton from the left.

Although Sanders caucuses with Democrats in the Senate, he’s a self-described socialist. If he ends up running, he’ll win some plaudits on the left, but that’s about it.

Webb, like Chafee, is a former Republican with little history with the Democratic Party. That might be forgivable if he were actually a mainstream Democrat, but he was the fourth-most-conservative Democratic senator during his final term in Congress.

When you look at the board, there is no Barack Obama waiting in the wings. Warren has endorsed Clinton and has given every indication that she is not going to run.

At this point, Clinton’s path to the nomination looks easier than anything we’ve seen before.

O’Malley aiming for late May announcement on ‘colossal undertaking’ [John Wagner, WaPo, April 10, 2015]

With the announcement of Hillary Rodham Clinton’s 2016 presidential bid close at hand, Martin O’Malley says it could be late May before he shares his decision about moving forward.

DES MOINES, Iowa -- With the announcement of Hillary Rodham Clinton’s 2016 presidential bid close at hand, one of her potential Democratic rivals, former Maryland governor Martin O’Malley, says it could be late May before he shares his decision about moving forward.

O’Malley said in an interview Thursday night that there are “fewer and fewer” factors left for him to weigh and that he continues to hear from fellow Democrats that “our country’s looking for new leadership.” But O’Malley said he remains engaged in conversations with friends and family about what would be “a colossal undertaking.”

“You have to allow the time to give your friends the ability to tell you whether they think you’re crazy or whether they’re on board," O'Malley said. "You have to give your family the ability to tell you that as well. And that requires an amount of time and patience.”

[More bad news for Hillary Clinton’s fiercest rival]

O’Malley, who is barely registering in early polls but has been warmly received by Democratic audiences, spoke following an event Thursday night where close to 150 people packed into an Irish bar in the Beaverdale neighborhood here. After delivering a speech laced with populist themes, O'Malley, who has a side career as a musician, picked up a borrowed acoustic guitar and played a folk song, as he has in several other recent appearances in early nominating states.

[In Iowa, O'Malley sounds a lot like a Democrat liberals love: Warren]

Asked in the interview if Clinton's entrance into the race will affect his thinking, O'Malley said: "Not any longer."

"My sense, having traveled around the country now over the course of the last year, is that Americans … feel that their politics has been very badly damaged, that the rules have been unfairly manipulated in ways that threaten the future of our American Dream and of a growing American middle class," he said. "And people in our party, I think, are looking for new leadership that will break with the failed policies of our past and create a new and better day for our country. That's my sense."

Running for the presidency, he added, is "a colossal undertaking, and you have to be equipped to climb the mountain and not fight the mountain. You have to be prepared to climb it, and that takes a lot of work. That takes a lot planning, and that takes a lot of thought."

The former governor is in the midst of a two-day swing through Iowa that also included appearances Thursday before the House and Senate Democratic caucuses of the state legislature and at a fundraiser in Indianola for state Rep. Scott Ourth.

On Friday, O'Malley is booked to appear here at a Polk County Democrats awards dinner, along with another potential Democratic presidential candidate, former senator James Webb of Virginia.

During remarks at Ourth's fundraiser, held at a local winery, O'Malley referenced his work in Iowa during the 1984 presidential cycle for the campaign of "a little-known, 1 percent candidate named Gary Hart."

Hart faced a formidable front-runner that year in former vice president Walter Mondale. After beating expectations in Iowa, Hart went on to upset Mondale in New Hampshire and became his chief rival for the Democratic nomination, eventually falling short.

"I know how seriously you take your responsibility," O'Malley told the Democratic activists in the room. "I know that you have the ability to actually change the course of history."

In Iowa, Martin O'Malley lays out vision for Democratic Party [Ari Melber, MSNBC, April 10, 2015]

Martin O'Malley says if he runs for president, he will try to pull the Democratic Party back to its populist roots.

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley says if he runs for president, he will try to pull the Democratic Party back to its populist roots.

"You know what it's about? It's really about calling our party back to its true self," he said in a wide-ranging MSNBC interview airing Friday. "Our politics has been greatly impacted, for the worse, by big money and the concentration of big money."

O'Malley, in Iowa this week for meetings and a local Democratic Party event, took a break to talk about his potential 2016 challenge to former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton at Smokey Row Coffee, a bustling coffee shop on the West side of Des Moines. Clinton is expected to begin her presidential campaign as early as this weekend.

Widely known as number-crunching technocrat, O'Malley sounds pretty blunt when criticizing what he calls Wall Street's growing dominance of campaigns and government – including some members of the Obama administration.

"For 30 years we've followed this trickle-down theory of economics that said, 'Concentrate wealth at the very top, remove regulation and keep wages low so we can be competitive – whatever the hell that means," O'Malley says.

"What it led to was the first time since the Second World War where wages have actually declined, rather than going up – where almost all of the new income earned in this recovery has gone to the top 1%," he says, invoking the famous phrase from the Occupy Wall Street protests.

"It doesn't have to be this way," he continues, arguing, "these things are not effects that blew in on a gulf stream or on a polar vortex – these are the products of the policy choices we made over these 30 years."

O'Malley says the system is rigged "in many ways" – a concern pressed by the "Elizabeth Warren wing" of the Democratic Party – and contends middle class priorities should be "at the center of our economic theory."

Asked whether President Obama has appointed the wrong people to the Securities and Exchange Commission and Justice Department, O'Malley responds, "Yes, I would say that." He laments that no bank executives went to jail for "wrongdoing" in the financial crisis.

"I think that the S.E.C. has been pretty feckless," he says, "when it comes to reigning in reckless behavior on Wall Street."

O'Malley has clearly honed his campaign lines on this theme.

While his op-eds are peppered with references to the S.E.C.'s civil liability standards and the Depression-era Glass-Steagall bank regulation, he has more relatable examples at the ready in Iowa.

"There are more repercussions for a person being a chronic speeding violator in our country," he argues, "than there is for a big bank being a chronic violator of S.E.C. rules!" O'Malley posts similar lines and videos on his social media accounts. He also tries to channel the anger against Wall Street into an argument for a stronger federal government.

"We can't expect Wall Street to police itself – that's why we have a federal government," he declares.

O'Malley freely admits most Iowans he meets haven't heard of him, but he believes they are receptive to his economic focus – and they aren't all ready for Hillary.

Many Iowans want to literally "meet every candidate" before they decide, he says, and they don't accept "the inevitability or the punditry or whatever the polls happen to say."

O'Malley should know. He got started in politics working on Gary Hart's 1984 presidential campaign in Iowa, and he believes history shows there's really no such thing as inevitable candidates.

"There is an 'inevitable' front-runner who remains 'inevitable' right up until he or she's no longer inevitable," he says. "And the person that emerges as the alternative is the person that usually no one in America had heard of before – until that person got into a van and went county to county to county."

O'Malley is careful not to criticize Hillary Clinton by name, but her presence clearly looms over his possible candidacy.

Her perceived dominance in the Democratic Party constrains the momentum of any potential challenger. From O'Malley to Vice President Joe Biden, the would-be alternatives are treated by politicos and reporters as little more than the negative space in Clinton's painting, and yet it's the very prospect of anointing a nominee that seems to animate O'Malley's rationale for running.

On the stump and in our interview, he talks about the need for a real race, an "alternative" choice and a "contest of ideas" – paeans to the democratic process that can be read as Clinton code words.

Asked about the dynasties that could compete in the presidential race, O'Malley says the presidency shouldn't be a "hereditary right."

He has hit that theme before, telling George Stephanopoulos last month that the White House shouldn't simply "pass back and forth between two families." The line speaks to Bush and Clinton fatigue, but isn't exactly a substantive disqualification for higher office. (Former Sen. Lincoln Chaffee, by contrast, said this week that Clinton should not be president because of her vote for the Iraq War.)

O'Malley looks like a politician out of central casting – piercing green eyes, close cropped hair, crisp suit – he was even part of the basis for the ambitious mayor in "The Wire," which dramatized the drug trade and extreme poverty O'Malley confronted as the mayor of Baltimore. Yet his conventional appearance belies some pretty liberal politics – voters may find activist tendencies under that Brooks Brothers suit.

"I've actually done the things on a state-wide basis," he argues, that national Democrats "only talk about doing." And he ticks off a battery of liberal reforms like a proud father.

“We made it easier for people to vote not harder. We passed marriage equality. We made it easier for new American immigrants to get driver’s licenses so they can travel to and from work, and take care of their families.”

“We made it easier for people to vote not harder,” he says. “We passed marriage equality. We made it easier for new American immigrants to get driver’s licenses so they can travel to and from work, and take care of their families. We raised the minimum wage. We passed a living wage. We made bigger investments in improving the education of our children and made our schools No. 1. We made bigger investments in infrastructure, water, wastewater, cyber and the rest – and created a better rate of job creation than our neighbors north or south of us.”

He continues, “So look, these are the things that actually make our economy grow and make our middle class stronger. And it is why the U.S. Chamber of Commerce named our state No. 1 in innovation and entrepreneurship three years in a row. It is why we maintain the highest median income of any state in the nation over these last eight years. So these are the differentiators. People want leaders who have the ability to get things done.”

If that weren’t wonky enough, O’Malley is also eager to explain his numerical approach to governing, the idea that “the things that get measured get done.”

He established statistical measuring programs – Citi-State and Comp-Stat – to focus law enforcement and government services. Some dubbed it “Moneyball” for government.

Reflecting on that approach, O’Malley says any organization can use metrics, accountability and technology to improve results, including the federal government.

He rattles off tools that would make most people’s eyes glaze over – “performance management” and “graphical information technologies” – insisting these dry concepts helped stop drug dealers from murdering children. “We achieved the biggest reductions in crime of any major city in America,” he says.

The statistics themselves have been in some dispute in Maryland, but even conservative estimates showed robberies and aggravated assaults down over 30%, while successful homicide investigations rose from 54% to 80%.

Unlike many traditional urban crackdowns, however, O’Malley took on violent crime while advancing criminal justice reforms, including repealing the death penalty and harsh marijuana laws.

The federal death penalty is back in the news after a jury convicted Dzhokar Tsarnaev in the Boston Marathon bombing case this week, and O’Malley says he remains opposed to capital punishment even in cases of domestic terrorism.

“I’m opposed to the death penalty; I don’t believe that it works,” he says. “In the case of this individual, I probably think killing’s too good for him – he should rot in prison for the harm that he’s done to so many people and children.”

O’Malley also argues the U.S. is also in the wrong camp on this issue internationally.

“The countries on this globe that are responsible for the greatest numbers of public executions are places like Yemen, North Korea, Iraq, Iran, communist China,” he says. “I don’t believe our country belongs on that list.”

That’s an unusual position for an aspiring national Democrat. Ever since Michael Dukakis was pilloried for being “soft on crime” and opposing the death penalty, the party’s presidential nominees have supported it. (Clinton and Obama firmly backed it, while Kerry revised his opposition in 2004 to support capital punishment for terrorists.)

O’Malley’s critiques of the criminal justice system also provide common ground with at least one Republican presidential candidate, Sen. Rand Paul. At his presidential campaign launch this week, Paul said the U.S. should repeal “any law that disproportionately incarcerates people of color.”

O’Malley says he agrees with Paul’s statement – and as a chief executive he tried to change the “different standards of justice” for crimes occurring “in poor neighborhoods, neighborhoods of color” or “wealthier neighborhoods.”

O’Malley has also faced criticism, however, for using the kind of aggressive policing that led to the arrest of one out of every six Baltimore residents in a single year. The NAACP and American Civil Liberties Union filed a suit alleging police harassment on his watch, but he counters that Baltimore faced an emergency, and he still built a multiracial mandate for policing.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"In our city, when I was elected mayor, [we] had sadly allowed ourselves to become the most violent and addicted city in America," O'Malley says. "I was elected on a campaign that promised that we would recover all of our neighborhoods from the 24/7 drug dealer occupation and appallingly high homicide rates. And so that's what we set out to do. And in re-election – I was re-elected with 88% of the vote.

"All along the course of that – we had to keep a precious consensus together to save lives," he continues. "And there is no issue more difficult to bring people together around over racial divides than the issue of law enforcement. But we managed to do it. We made our police force more diverse. We reduced, during my time in office, police-involved shootings. We also reduced violent crime, and the city is moving in a much better direction."

It's the kind of thoughtful, evidence-based answer that could appeal to Democratic voters concerned about racial divides and policing in America today – if there is room and time for that debate.

O'Malley's greatest political vulnerability, however, may be the belief that voters will analyze their choices the way he does – methodically, rigorously, even dispassionately. Yet without a larger disruption in the Democratic primary, it's not clear whether that debate will begin this year.

Hillary Clinton Team Holds Off-The-Record Journalist Meeting Ahead Of 2016 Announcement [Michael Calderone, HuffPost, April 10, 2015]

Hillary Clinton's campaign team held an off-the-record dinner Thursday night in Washington, D.C., for roughly two dozen journalists and staff members at John Podesta's house. The team will also hold a private event for journalists Friday evening.

NEW YORK -- Hillary Clinton's campaign team held an off-the-record dinner Thursday night in Washington, D.C., for roughly two dozen journalists and staff members at John Podesta's house, according to sources familiar with the matter.

The dinner signals that the Clinton team is trying to engage with top reporters in the days before the former secretary of state's expected announcement of a 2016 presidential run. It also suggests the new campaign team is looking to change course from the toxic relationship with the press that plagued the 2008 race.

Podesta, the campaign chairman and a seasoned cook, made a pasta with walnut sauce for the dinner guests, which included reporters from The New York Times, The Washington Post, Politico, The Wall Street Journal, The Associated Press and several major TV networks.

A Huffington Post reporter attended the dinner, but did not discuss it with this reporter.

The guests also enjoyed a shrimp appetizer, homemade cookies, and a selection of wine and beer -- including, appropriately, Brooklyn Lager.

Several key Clinton staffers, including Campaign Manager Robby Mook, Communications Director Jennifer Palmieri and top aide Huma Abedin, also attended.

A Clinton spokesman declined to comment on the gathering.

Clinton has long had a fraught relationship with the media, going back to scandals and controversies during her husband's presidency in the 1990s. But in recent months, Clinton sources have promised that the 2016 campaign would be different.

She took questions from the press for about 15 minutes last month following revelations that she exclusively used a private email account for government business throughout her four years as secretary of state, but hasn't since given an interview.

During a journalism awards ceremony late last month, Clinton suggested she wanted a fresh start with the Fourth Estate.

"I am all about new beginnings," Clinton said. "A new grandchild, a new email account. Why not a new relationship with the press? So here it goes. No more secrecy. No more zone of privacy. But first of all, before I go any further. If you look under your chairs, you'll find a simple nondisclosure agreement."

Hillary Clinton team woos reporters [Dylan Byers, POLITICO, April 10, 2015]

On Thursday night, Hillary Clinton's chief of staff John Podesta held a private dinner at his Washington home with campaign reporters.

On Thursday night, Hillary Clinton's chief of staff John Podesta held a private dinner at his Washington home with campaign reporters, part of a larger Clinton-team effort to build a rapport with the men and women who will spend the next 18 months covering Clinton's bid for the White House, POLITICO has learned.

That effort is seen as a necessity for a candidate who, in the early months of 2015, has had no safe harbor in the media. To date, The New York Times alone has published more than 40 articles related to Clinton's use of a private email account while secretary of state, and many other news outlets, including POLITICO, have come forward with revelations of their own. Meanwhile, right-wing media outlets criticize her daily and left-wing outlets are unabashed in their desire for a more liberal alternative.

Just last month, Clinton herself acknowledged that her relationship with the media was "complicated," but said she wanted to build "a better relationship." Without a formal campaign in place, however, she has been forced to assume a defensive posture. Now, with the launch of her campaign just around the corner, political strategists say the candidate and her team are set to wrest control of the narrative and go on offense.

"Politics, especially political reporters, abhor a vacuum, so media outlets are going to hunt and peck for stories that create the dynamic of the campaign being a yet-unannounced HRC presidential vs. the august members of the Fourth Estate," Chris Lehane, the Democratic communications strategist and Clinton White House alum, told POLITICO. "Once the campaign is off and running like Usain Bolt, based on the big idea she offers as her rationale, it will develop specific reporters and outlets that take a franchise interest."

The current state of Clinton-press relations reflects "the natural lay of things. She's not a candidate, there's not an affirmative message yet, and there's not yet an apparatus fully capable of combatting [these stories]," said Nick Merrill, a Clinton spokesperson. Merrill confirmed that the Clinton team had media outreach plans in the works, but said he was not in a position to discuss them.

Being able to go on the offensive is especially important for a candidate like Clinton, who has few sympathizers in the media. Supporters have long grumbled that the Times and its mainstream brethren are especially tough on Clinton — the newspaper's executive editor Dean Baquet calls the coverage "aggressive and fair" — but the past six weeks have only increased their fears. Meanwhile, right-wing media outlets have been using the new revelations to relentlessly attack her, while left-wing publications have been busy pushing their own populist alternatives.

The trifecta of right-wing attacks, left-wing angst and mainstream scrutiny has already made for a far rockier campaign rollout than Clinton likely anticipated. Though a mid-March CNN/ORC poll had her beating every potential Republican challenger by double digits, a new Quinnipiac University poll released this week shows that her support has been "wilting" in the key battleground states of Colorado, Iowa and Virginia. In each state, a majority of those surveyed said that Clinton's private email use was either "very important" or "somewhat important" to their vote in 2016, and well more than a third of voters in each state said the issue made them less likely to vote for Clinton.

While the formal launch of a campaign will allow Clinton to take some control into her own hands, the absence of a viable primary challenger could pose its own problems, strategists said. With no real competitor, the media will be all the more eager to assume an antagonistic role.

"In the absence of a primary opponent, the press may feel obliged to fill that role, giving her the scrutiny and vetting normally provided by an opponent," Paul Begala, the political consultant and chief strategist for Bill Clinton's 1992 campaign, said. "If so, there is not much Hillary can do about it, nor should she try."

Of the three sectors of American political media, it is the mainstream that has emerged as Clinton's greatest obstacle. The fact that the hardest-hitting Clinton coverage has come from the Times, The Washington Post, POLITICO and other mainstream sources — rather than, say, The Weekly Standard or Washington Free Beacon — has revived concerns among her staff about Clinton's poor relations with mainstream reporters.

"We have been aggressive and fair," Baquet, the Times executive editor, said of his newspaper's coverage of Clinton. "I'd say that's been the same for coverage of all the candidates. Some of the Republicans have gone so far as to say they don't read us. If everyone thinks you're tough, you're doing something right."

In the past few weeks, Gawker and ProPublica have opened a new vein of Clinton coverage. On March 27, the two sites reported that longtime Clinton confidant Sidney Blumenthal supplied intelligence to then-Secretary Clinton "gathered by a secret network that included a former CIA clandestine service officer." Days later, Gawker reported that Blumenthal and another Clinton official had secretly lobbied Clinton "on behalf of a billionaire in the former Soviet state of Georgia who was seeking closer ties with Putin's Russia — seemingly in violation of a federal law designed to prevent foreign powers from covertly wielding influence within the United States."

Critical coverage in outlets like the Times and ProPublica is far more dangerous to Clinton's campaign than that of partisan outlets, strategists say, because the scrutiny is driven by reporting, rather than ideological analysis (there are exceptions with Gawker, which can be quite opinionated). Weeks of Fox News roundtables about Benghazi conspiracy theories don't pack nearly the punch that a groundbreaking report from the Times can.

Merrill, the Clinton spokesperson, said he didn't have a problem with the Times' aggressive approach to the email scandal, especially since they broke the story. He was less forgiving of the Gawker-ProPublica report: "ProPublica, to be honest, I think my response to somebody who asked me that was just, 'Seriously?'" (ProPublica editor-in-chief Stephen Engelberg did not respond to a request for comment regarding Merrill's criticism.)

The drumbeat of investigations from the Times and other mainstream outlets might be more tolerable if Clinton had more allies on the left. Unfortunately for her, liberal pundits like Rachel Maddow and Chris Hayes, and progressive publications like The Nation and The New Republic have seem more interested in floating alternatives like Elizabeth Warren or Bernie Sanders.

Late last year, The Nation made it its stated mission to find a populist challenger. Katrina vanden Heuvel, the magazine's editor, told POLITICO that Clinton "would be better served if she has competition." In Harper's, Doug Henwood slammed Clinton as a hawkish centrist, a charge that has been echoed directly or indirectly across the liberal blogosphere and even on MSNBC.

"The Elizabeth Warren piece of it does make it tough for her with Chris Hayes and Rachel Maddow and those guys," said Bill Burton, the Democratic strategist and former Obama deputy press secretary. "It is a challenge."

Then there are the right-wing publications, which attack Democrats as a matter of course. To date, however, right-wing attacks on Clinton have been relatively muted, in part because several conservative sites are focused on the Republican primary. Behind the scenes, however, Republican groups are building a massive opposition effort, much of which will be leaked to conservative and mainstream outlets over the course of the next 18 months.

Clinton may never be able to quell the right, but by launching her campaign, she can at least make progress on the left and the mainstream, the strategists said.

"[The] campaign will convert some of the current entities by (a) being on the offensive and creating the conflict that drives coverage on its own terms; (b) filling the cup so that reporters can provide their daily quota of inches, clicks, tweets and retweets; and (c) demonstrate [the] capacity of the candidate where she can look like a giant towering over the sea of leprechauns across the aisle," Lehane explained.

"In this day and age," he added, "the ability to develop a national online network will provide a bulwark of support and be available to serve as both a sword to push out her candidacy and a shield to deflect the incoming."

Of course, not everyone is so bullish.

"You do get the sense that it's coming at her from all sides," said one Democratic strategist who asked not to be quoted by name. "You do wonder if at some point she's taking so much water that it all falls apart."

Library documents show revisions on Hillary Clinton's image, identity [Rebecca Ballhaus, WSJ Washington Wire, April 10, 2015]

While the Clintons were in the White House, Hillary Clinton's advisers worked hard to strike a balance between portraying the first lady as a mother and wife and as a political figure in her own right.

LITTLE ROCK, Ark.—While the Clintons were in the White House, Hillary Clinton's advisers worked hard to strike a balance between portraying the first lady as a mother and wife and as a political figure in her own right.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As such, a 1997 Q&A with Mrs. Clinton for a Scottish newspaper, the Press and Journal, came under plenty of scrutiny.

Edits to Mrs. Clinton's answers reflect her staffers' efforts to show the first lady's admiration of Bill Clinton as a president but also as a husband. In one draft, a reference to Mr. Clinton as "my President" is changed to "my husband." In the same draft, a section in which Mrs. Clinton described the president as "optimistic" and "determined" received a key addition: "On a more personal level, I think he is a great father and husband."

The drafts were found in a folder containing the records of Michael O'Mary, who was a speechwriter in the first lady's office. The documents were part of a trove of paper records released this week by the William J. Clinton Library. Unlike releases made last year, these files weren't released in electronic form.

The author or authors of the edits aren't clearly identified, and the exact sequence of the drafts isn't clear.

One section on how the Clintons met received particular scrutiny. Copies of several drafts show repeated changes to the story, which appeared to waffle between a variation of these two narratives:

"I met my husband at Yale Law School. We met at the library, where, after I caught him looking at me, I introduced myself to him. Later, he joined me in a long line to register for classes, and we talked and talked. Before we knew it, we had walked all the way to the university art museum, where Bill showed me some of his favorite sculptures."

And:

"I met my husband at Yale Law School. We met at the library where I introduced myself to him. Later, he joined me in a long line to register for classes, and we talked for an hour. When we got to the front of the line, the registrar said, 'Bill, what are you doing here? You already registered?'"

Staffers also struggled with how to answer the question, "What is your greatest ambition?" What appears to be an early draft answered: "To be a responsible and loving mother and wife and to instill values in my daughter that will serve her well as she grows up and has to navigate through a complicated world." Scribbled underneath was another line geared more toward portraying Mrs. Clinton as a political figure: "Second, to live up to the American ideal of citizenship."

Similarly, the answer to "How would you best like to be remembered?" was expanded to portray Mrs. Clinton not just as a supporter of her husband but as a champion of human rights. One draft showed this answer: "For using this rare opportunity to support my President and his vision of where to take our country on the eve of a new century." In what appears to have been a later draft, this was added: "I also hope to use the platform I have to speak out for people on the margins of society, especially women and children, who too often don't have a voice in the political, social, economic and civil life of their countries."

Among the questions Mrs. Clinton and her staff declined to answer: "What is the first thing you would do if all your numbers came up in the Lottery?" and "What is the most embarrassing situation you have found yourself in?"

The edits reflect the tension for Mrs. Clinton's staff in representing a first lady who was markedly different than her predecessors. Mrs. Clinton is a graduate of Yale Law School and became the first female law partner of a law firm in Arkansas after graduating. She became a U.S. senator after leaving the White House and is expected to announce her own presidential campaign as soon as this weekend. Her immediate predecessor, Barbara Bush, by contrast, dropped out of college and didn't have a professional career before becoming second and then first lady.

Previous documents released by the Clinton Library have demonstrated the struggle her staffers faced in improving Mrs. Clinton's image. In 1995, a memo detailed her advisers' suggestions—including Mrs. Clinton appearing as a guest on the TV show "Home Improvement"—for how to make the first lady appear "likeable." In a 1999 memo, as Mrs. Clinton was preparing her Senate campaign, a memo advised her: "It's important that people see more sides of you, and they often see you only in very stern situations."

The impossibility of Hillary Clinton 'going small' [Chris Cillizza, WaPo The Fix, April 10, 2015]

Hillary Clinton's campaign cannot feasibly take a "go small" approach.

The Hillary Clinton for president campaign is coming. For real, this time.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

How do I know? Because since late Thursday afternoon when Business Insider reported that Clinton would make an announcement over the weekend, the political world has been ablaze with attempts to nail down the second that this event-we-have-known-was-coming-for-the better-part-of-the-last-year was actually going to happen. The Guardian reported later Thursday that the announcement would come via Twitter Sunday at noon -- followed by a trip to Iowa. Then, early this morning, CNN confirmed that the announcement was coming Sunday, potentially with a video published on social media. Then the Post confirmed it. And NBC. And everyone else.

The feeding frenzy was officially on.

The furor created by the exact date and time Clinton would announce her candidacy speaks to the total and complete impossibility of Clinton carrying off a "going small" strategy that she and her team seem set on pursuing. Wrote Dan Balz and Anne Gearan in the Post:

The approach — described by Democratic strategists and advisers familiar with her plans — is intended to address some of the key shortcomings of Clinton's 2008 run for the White House, when she often came off as flat and overly scripted before large crowds. The go-slow, go-small strategy, these advisers say, plays to her strengths, allowing her to meet voters in intimate settings where her humor, humility and policy expertise can show through.

Look, I absolutely get the logic behind the strategy. Clinton ran as "Hillary Clinton" in 2008, to her detriment. Her campaign seemed to believe that voters in places like Iowa and New Hampshire would vote for her simply because of her political celebrity. They believed that Clinton didn't need to do the grip and grin sort of campaigning that other candidates did because she was a beloved member of the first family of Democratic politics.

Unsurprisingly to everyone but those in the Clinton campaign, it didn't work. Clinton came off as aloof and entitled -- two very bad character traits for someone running for president. People had no sense of how or why she wanted the job or how hard she was willing to work to get it. (Sidebar: One of the reasons her tearing-up moment in New Hampshire in 2008 was so powerful was because it drove home for many voters that she did actually care deeply about the race.)

Because all campaigns are in ways large and small reactions to the campaigns that came before them, you can understand why the "go small" approach makes sense to the Clintons this time around.

And yet, it's almost certainly an impossibility for Clinton and her campaign to truly go small -- for reasons almost entirely out of her control. Clinton is the biggest non-incumbent frontunner to be a party's presidential nominee in the modern era of politics. She is one of the most famous politicians in the country if not the world. She is part of one of the most famous families in the country if not the world.

"Going small" is as hard for Clinton to do as it would be for Taylor Swift. Let's say, for example, that T-Swift just wanted to play a few intimate gigs for her most loyal fans with no publicity. No matter what she did to keep it small, word would leak out that Taylor Swift was playing at some hole in the wall club in fill-in-the-blank town. A mob scene -- fans, media, assorted gawkers -- would immediately assemble. Intimacy gone.

The same goes for Clinton. Because of who she is and where she stands in the presidential race, she will be followed around by an ever-present local, national and international media horde. Wherever she goes, there will be crowds who just want to see her -- take a picture of her, shoot a Vine of her, tweet about her, SnapChat about her. No matter how small Clinton tries to make the campaign, it will always be big -- because of who she is.

That is not to say that Clinton can't more effectively show voters than she did in 2008 that she is running to help them, that her campaign is centered on what they want rather than what she thinks they want. Clinton will do everything she can to make that the central message of this race and, because of that focus, she'll likely do a better job of conveying that message than she did seven years ago.

But, the idea of Clinton going small is a fallacy. It cannot be done.

David Axelrod compli-sults Hillary Clinton [Aaron Blake, WaPo, April 10, 2015]

David Axelrod took to Twitter to give his take on the low-key campaign rollout that has been reported ahead of Sec. Clinton's announcement.

OK, we're guessing that David Axelrod was trying to be nice to Hillary Clinton with this tweet.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

@davidaxelrod: Learning the lessons of 2008: HRC rollout plans stress humility. No Clinton Inc., the "inevitable" juggernaut that left voters behind.

Another reading would be that the former top Obama adviser is doing a little seven-year-old victory dance celebrating Team Obama's against-all-odds victory in the 2008 primary and ribbing Clinton for running a poorly conceived campaign. It's classic compli-sult behavior.

But how against-all-odds was it really? We've dealt with this question before, and our conclusion was that the Obama-ites and others suffer from a little bit of revisionist history when it comes to just how "inevitable" Clinton was back then.

To wit, our own Philip Bump posted this:

...her lead in 2016 is substantially larger than what she enjoyed eight years ago. By way of example. Here's how the polling looked in the Democratic primary in New Hampshire in 2008, via Real Clear Politics.

Clinton led, often by a wide margin. Her largest lead was just over 21 points. (The numbers above are the Real Clear Polling average, incidentally, not raw poll numbers.)

Iowa was much closer. In fact, Clinton often trailed other candidates, including former North Carolina senator John Edwards.

Her largest lead in Iowa was 7.2 points.

Now compare that to 2016 polling -- which is still early, but a poll taken today is only about 50 days before the start of the polls above.

Hillary Clinton was the front-runner in 2008, ahead of Edwards and Obama, until she wasn't. Clinton is the front-runner for 2016, as well, ahead of a healthy dose of empty space and then Vice President Joe Biden and Sen. Elizabeth "No, Really, I'm Not Running" Warren (D-Mass.). It's a whole different race.

However, that can change.

For all talk about how Clinton was SO inevitable in 2008, we had a hard time finding people who actually said this back then -- much less Team Clinton itself.

From my post:

Going back to 2006 and 2007, we could find very little evidence of anybody publicly calling Clinton the "inevitable" nominee. Here's what we found when we searched in LexisNexis for "Hillary Clinton" and "inevitable":

The Boston Globe's Joan Vennochi, in March 2005: "So, case closed? No other Democrats need apply? That is ridiculous."

Michael Reagan, in December 2006: "The common wisdom holds that it is all but inevitable that Hillary Clinton will be the Democratic presidential nominee in 2008, and that she'll be a formidable if not unbeatable candidate."

Fox News's Brian Wilson, in February 2007: "There was a piece, I forget where, saying that Republicans think that the nomination of Hillary is inevitable. I don't think they believe that."

TNR's Jonathan Chait, in February 2007: "But is Clinton really the front-runner for the nomination? Only if you look about one inch deep. So before we cancel the primaries, it's worth exploring how this wisdom came into circulation."

So basically there were maybe a few examples of people suggesting she might be inevitable, and slightly more people ascribing that view to unnamed other people (who might or might not have existed or been willing to speak on the record).

And then came the New York Times's Adam Nagourney, in April 2007:

"For Senator Clinton, Democrat of New York, the situation is not so seemingly dire, but any hope she had of Democrats embracing her candidacy as inevitable has been dashed by the rise of Senator Barack Obama of Illinois, the continued strength of John Edwards of North Carolina, and obvious discomfort in some Democratic quarters of putting another Clinton in the White House."

That's right, as of April 2007, just two months after Obama launched his campaign, whatever inevitability bubble existed had pretty much burst. What would follow was a whole bunch of hand-wringing about how some of those people had declared the primary over way too early.

All despite the fact that there is very little evidence that those people were anything amounting to a chorus.

So to whatever extent the inevitability idea existed, it was gone by, well, right about this point in the race.

Now, it's fair to suggest that perhaps Team Clinton was a little too big for its britches early in the 2008 campaign. But that's generally what campaigns try to do at this point, through fundraising and other things.

And we're sure that's what it looked like from Axelrod's viewpoint. Whatever the case, it's pretty clear he's still hanging on to it.

Bloomberg falls for fake Nancy Reagan report [Hadas Gold, POLITICO, April 10, 2015]

Bloomberg Politics published a report about Nancy Reagan based off fake news site NationalReport.net

Bloomberg Politics published a report about Nancy Reagan based off of fake news site NationalReport.net

The piece, headlined "Nancy Reagan gives her endorsement to... Hillary Clinton," quoted a supposed "Drudge Report" saying that the former first lady told the History Channel series "First Ladies In Their Own Words" that it's time for a female president.

The problem is: Reagan never said such a thing in the series. The report seems to have come from NationalReport.net, a spoof news site that has tricked many a politician and news organization in the past. The piece was then posted to a website called DrudgeReport.com.co , which doesn't seem to be connected to the actual Drudge Report.

The piece, which was published just before 5 p.m. on Friday, was deleted within minutes.

We've reached out to a Bloomberg spokesperson for comment and will update here accordingly.

Jeb Bush's Emails: Why Are So Many Key Episodes MIA? [Pema Levy & Sam Brodey, Mother Jones, April 10, 2015]

Bush's own published email archives reveal little about key episodes that occurred during his governorship.

When the New York Times revealed that Hillary Clinton used a private email address as secretary of state, GOP presidential candidate-in-waiting Jeb Bush pounced. "Transparency matters," he tweeted, linking to the archive of his own emails that he had made public a month earlier.

But Bush is hardly in a position to take potshots at Clinton over her emails. Like Clinton, he conducted government business using a personal email account (two of them, actually). He released only a portion of his correspondence from his time as governor of Florida. And it took Bush more than seven years to hand over his self-selected emails, as required under a Florida public records law.

Moreover, Bush's email archive, which includes more than 250,000 messages, has produced no piercing insights or major news stories about his gubernatorial stint. There are an immense number of emails from constituents weighing in on the issues of the day. But when it comes to the major issues of his governorship, there are—curiously—very few, if any, emails between Bush and his aides. This email archive is not easy to search. It is comprised of 248 separate files and is hardly user-friendly. But employing the most obvious search terms for key episodes that occurred during his governorship, as well as combing messages covering certain time periods, we mounted an extensive review of this gigantic collection of correspondence and looked for emails about the most important moments of Bush's eight years leading the Sunshine State.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This search yielded little correspondence revealing Bush's actions and decisions regarding pivotal events. It turns out that what's most notable about Bush's email trove is what's not in it.

THE 2000 ELECTIONS

When the 2000 presidential election between George W. Bush and Al Gore came down to Florida, Jeb Bush and Secretary of State Katherine Harris found themselves at the center of the political universe. Bush's email archive contains reams of messages that poured in from constituents during the controversial recount process, but there are barely any notes between Bush and his aides.

The day after the election—which ultimately took 36 days, several Florida court rulings, and a final intervention by the US Supreme Court to resolve—Bush officially recused himself from the election certification process. But an investigation by theLos Angeles Times found that Jeb Bush's office and top aides were in contact with his brother's legal team and other top members of George W. Bush's staff during the recount. Jeb officially handed the state's 25 electoral votes to his brother on November 26, while court battles over the recount were still underway, andindicated he would sign legislation to preempt the courts and give the election to his brother. But if Bush and his top aides were discussing these important decisions or communicating with George W. Bush's team, it does not show up in Jeb's email archive. The archive does include Jeb Bush's responses to a few constituents. When one emailed to ask Bush to certify the election, he responded: "I am doing what i can within the laws of our state."

ELIÁN GONZÁLEZ

On Thanksgiving Day 1999, five-year-old Elián González was rescued off the coast of Florida after fleeing Cuba in a small boat with his mother and other refugees. Elián's mother had drowned during the trip, setting off a months-long international custody battle between the child's relatives in Miami and his father in Cuba. In emails to constituents throughout the saga, Bush supported allowing state courts to adjudicate the issue; he opposed the Clinton administration's decision not to grant Elián asylum and denounced the federal raid in April 2000 that removed Elián from the custody of his Miami relatives. Yet internal deliberations about this high-profile matter between Bush and his staff are scarce in the email archive.

One email thread does show Bush looking for a way to intervene after the commissioner of the US Immigration and Naturalization Service announced that Elián should be returned to his father. On January 6, 2000, he forwarded a constituent email to his general counsel, Carol Licko, asking, "Carol, I think we should ask that ATTY General Reno overturn the INS decision and allow a custody proceeding take place in state court. We should do this manana. what do you think?" And that's about it for Bush emails on this dramatic subject.

Several media outlets have scoured Bush's email archive for clues about his actions during this episode. Beside his back-and-forths with constituents, they've turned up almost nothing.

VOTER PURGE, PART I

When Bush became governor in January 1999, the state was working on a project to purge felons from its voter rolls. Before Bush took office, the state had hired a company named Database Technologies Inc. (DBT) to cross-check criminal records against the state's 8.6 million registered voters. The list of about 100,000 supposed felons that DBT generated was deeply flawed; it included thousands of misdemeanor offenders and Floridians with no criminal records. It disproportionately singled out minorities, particularly African Americans.

At the urging of Florida officials after Bush took office in January 1999, DBT conducted an overly broad search for potential felons. "[W]e want to capture more names that possibly aren't matches and let [county election] supervisors make a final determination rather than exclude certain matches altogether," a lawyer at the Florida Division of Elections told the DBT project manager in March 1999, according to a 2001 investigation by the Los Angeles Times. The Times concluded that the flawed list could have affected the outcome of the 2000 election—which came down to just 537 votes—by disenfranchising more black voters, who largely vote Democratic.

A search of key terms, relevant officials names, and variations of key phrases such as "felon list" came up largely empty, except for news articles that were circulated around about the scandal.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

VOTER PURGE, PART II

In May 2004, another presidential election year, Jeb Bush's administration once again sought to purge its voter rolls of convicted felons. Owing to the previous controversy with DBT, the state Legislature decided that the Department of Elections should create its own list. Once again, the process was flawed. When the list became public in July 2004, a major error became readily apparent: Of the 48,000 people on the new purge list, 22,000 were African Americans but only 61 were Hispanic. African Americans vote heavily Democratic while Hispanics, at that time in Florida, largely voted Republican. This prompted speculation that Jeb Bush's administration was at best incompetent and at worst, playing politics with its purge list. Facing widespread criticism, it agreed not to use the list.

The Bush email archive holds little material on this major controversy, and we found no messages discussing how to deal with the issue or discover what went wrong. Only a few emails stood out on the voter purge issue. On August 19, 2003, Bush received an email from a county elections supervisor, Kay Clem, on voter purge efforts. "Talked to [Secretary of State] Glenda Hood about purging voter rolls today. She said she had just returned from a meeting with you and your staff," Clem wrote. A few hours later, Bush forwarded Clem's email to his chief of staff and Hood, writing, "we need to discuss." As the scandal was swirling in July of 2004, Bush noted to the CEO of Accenture, the outside consulting firm that developed the formula used for the purge, "we have issues regarding the felons voting list work that you company have done." There's not much else.

TERRI SCHIAVO

In 2003, Bush confronted one of the most contentious battles of his governorship: whether to allow Terri Schiavo to die after 13 years in a persistent vegetative state. Her husband, Michael, was fighting to take her off life support, while her parents were battling to keep her alive. Following a court order in September 2003, Schiavo's feeding tube was removed. Bush and the Republican Legislature in Florida responded by quickly enacting what was called "Terri's Law," which allowed the governor to overrule the courts with an executive order to reinsert her feeding tube. The Florida Supreme Court unanimously ruled Terri's Law unconstitutional in September 2004. Schiavo died on March 31, 2005, after all the legal options pursued by her parents, Bush, and Republicans in Washington and Florida had run out. An autopsy later confirmed that Schiavo had been completely brain dead with no chance of rehabilitation.

Bush's email archive contains thousands of Schiavo-related messages from people around the country, but this collection reveals little about Bush's decision making as a key player in one of the culture wars' biggest battles. There are a few emails of note, however. When Bush officially entered the legal battle in the fall of 2003, his administration hired attorney Ken Connor as the outside counsel on the case. The archive shows nothing about the decision to hire Connor, but Bush's aides did circulate "Ken Connor talking points" and his biography for Bush to use in media interviews. There are also emails from Bush's legal team throughout the years-long saga providing updates on the case.

After the Florida Supreme Court ruled against Terri's Law, the emails do show Bush and his aides looking for other legal avenues. On October 21, 2004, Bush forwarded to his general counsel an email from a constituent, who pleaded for Bush to take action. "We cannot open a criminal investigation? Are we sure that the statute of limitations applies?" Bush asked. No, his top lawyer replied: "for anything that happened to cause her current condition, S/L [statute of limitations] ran a long time ago." The general counsel also noted that even accusations of recent abuse against Michael Schiavo weren't enough to warrant state intervention in the case: "am looking into criminal penalties for abuse or exploitation as a vulnerable adult (within past 5 years or so), but law requires that it be referred to local law enforcement and local state attorney, neither of which have shown a disposition to do anything. have not found anything yet that bumps up to state law enforcement level, but still looking but we can't yet be out there announcing anything."

Despite this advice, Bush did use accusations of abuse to launch an unsuccessful, last-ditch effort to keep Terri Schiavo alive. The Schiavo case raised a host of vexing legal, policy, and political questions over nearly two years of Bush's term. But the email trail is rather thin.

MANATEES

The gentle manatee—the cuddly, blubbery sea cow—is beloved in Florida, where the creatures lull and graze in warm, shallow waterways. For decades, both Florida and the federal government listed manatees as endangered species. Jeb Bush, who has called the manatee his favorite mammal, pledged to protect the species when he took office. But manatees, often struck by boaters in Florida, continued to die by watercraft. Floridians were sharply divided over whether Bush was doing too much or not enough to help the manatees.

To avoid what the New York Times said could become a campaign issue, the governor in 2001 requested that the US Fish and Wildlife Service delay federal mandates for manatee protection and hand the issue to the state. The agency agreed, a move that raised eyebrows in Florida among those who felt the governor's brother was doing him a political favor. A federal judge ultimately overturned the decision.

Bush's archive show manatees were a popular topic among constituents. But it contains no email exchanges between Bush and advisers on the question of federal involvement to protect manatees.

CYNTHIA HENDERSON

When he took office in January 1999, Bush appointed Cynthia Henderson—a Florida attorney and former Playboy bunny—to oversee the state agency in charge of business regulation. By December of that year, she faced investigations by the state's chief inspector general and state Ethics Commission for a host of allegations, including giving plum government jobs to friends. She was also accused of attending the Kentucky Derby on the dime of a restaurant business she regulated. The allegations against this appointee became a major headache for Bush.

In September 2000, Bush finally removed Henderson from her post, transferring her to the state's Department of Management Services; he denied that the ethics charges had anything to do with the shakeup.

Bush's email archive includes no correspondence between Bush and his aides regarding the politically explosive allegations levied against Henderson. But Bush did respond to constituents who were concerned with Henderson's alleged behavior. "If i felt that Cynthia was unethical or incompetent, I would ask her to leave. I don't believe that it is the case," he wrote to one constituent.

Jeb Bush backed background checks at gun shows [Benjy Sarlin, MSNBC, April 10, 2015]

Jeb Bush has previously supported instituting background checks.

NASHVILLE, Tennessee – After months defending his conservative bona fides on immigration and education, the National Rifle Association's annual meeting must have come as a relief to Republican Jeb Bush. He has plenty to brag about to Second Amendment groups: He earned an A+ rating from the NRA as Florida governor and signed the "stand your ground" law that gained national attention after the Trayvon Martin shooting.

"I've been in the trenches with you and when I was governor, we were passing laws and creating protections for gun owners that set the bar for other states to follow," Bush said in his speech on Friday. "I will match my record against anyone else's when it comes to the support and defense of the Second Amendment."

But on one issue that has since become a top cause for gun control advocates (and the enemy of groups like the NRA), Bush's policy choices may be out of step: background checks for gun purchases.

In 1998, then-candidate Bush backed a Florida law instituting background checks for firearms bought at gun shows, a type of purchase that is not covered under federal law. The issue was part of a broader fight with Democratic opponent Buddy MacKay, who backed a constitutional amendment to allow individual counties to institute their own background check and waiting period laws. MacKay ran ads at the time arguing Bush "sides with the gun lobby and opposes criminal background checks," perThe Miami Herald, a charge Bush rebutted to the local press by pointing to his support for a statewide law.

"A simple rule would simply say that anybody that buys a gun at a gun show should get an instant background check," Bush said in a debate. "And so you would take out the criminals."

MacKay lost, but the amendment authorizing counties to expand background checks passed via referendum in the same election with 72% of the vote.

At the time, background checks for private sales were less controversial in the GOP – even NRA leader Wayne LaPierre testified that he could support them in 1999.

Background checks became a partisan lightning rod after the mass shooting at Sandy Hook Elementary School in Connecticut took the lives of 20 children and six adults, and President Obama urged Congress to pass a federal law closing the gun show loophole. LaPierre and the NRA lobbied hard against the proposal along with Senators Ted Cruz, Rand Paul and Marco Rubio – all likely 2016 candidates. The gun control measure ultimately failed.

Former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee told msnbc as he shopped for a birthday gun for his wife at the NRA exhibition hall that he opposes the expanded background checks as well.

"I just have a real fear any time the government wants to get involved in the process of knowing who I am and why I have a firearm," he said. "There's too much history that gives me pause."

A spokeswoman for Bush, Kristy Campbell, did not directly answer a question on whether Bush still supports background checks at gun shows, but attested to his overall gun rights record.

"[As] demonstrated by his A+ rating from the NRA, Governor Bush's strong record on protecting and supporting second amendment rights is clear," Campbell told msnbc in an e-mail.

As LaPierre's past support for closing the gun show loophole indicates, Bush's position is a case of the political ground moving beneath his feet since he left office in early 2007, rather than a lurch to the left. But this is a phenomenon that could be a recurring issue for a presidential hopeful whose political rise, unlike almost every one of his expected rivals, took place entirely in the pre-Obama era of the party.

In South Florida, Jeb Bush and Marco Rubio are forcing locals to pick sides [Ed O'Keefe, WaPo, April 10, 2015]

With both Jeb Bush and Marco Rubio mounting presidential bids, Florida natives are forced to pick sides.

MIAMI — Marco Rubio was raised in West Miami and still lives just a few blocks south of "Calle Ocho," the famed boulevard where Cuban Americans often gather to protest the Castro brothers. The Florida senator's parents immigrated here from Cuba in the 1950s — a familiar history for many locals. His presidential bid will be announced Monday at the iconic Freedom Tower, which long served as an immigrant reception center.

About 12 minutes east is Coral Gables, where Jeb Bush lives. He came to South Florida in the 1980s to launch a real estate business and move his Mexican-born wife closer to her mother and sister. The couple raised three children, and Bush used his leadership of the local Republican Party to launch a political career that resulted in two terms as governor.

Never before in modern political history have two presidential candidates claimed the same hometown at the same time. But now Miami — better known for its beaches, its sports teams and as a hub of Latin American commerce and culture — is poised to become a major center of national Republican presidential politics.

Geographically and otherwise, Rubio and Bush represent different parts of Miami. The senator is a product of the city's powerful and tight-knit Cuban American community, which Rubio supporters believe will get behind his bid. Bush, the transplant, has moved a few times across the city, but now lives in a traditional upper-class enclave.

The rise of Bush and Rubio, whose political careers are inextricably linked, is a testament to the growing importance of Florida in presidential elections. Their bilingual and bicultural backgrounds will bring an urban feel to a race packed with rivals from rural states. Local Republicans say that both have what the GOP needs to win the White House.

"We're in a presidential love triangle," said Jessica Fernandez, president of the Miami Young Republicans. "Who doesn't want to be in a presidential love triangle?"

Some here are backing Bush out of personal allegiance to him or his family. They see Bush, 62, as a seasoned manager and like that he embraced his wife's Latino heritage. Others identify with Rubio's life story and admire how the 43-year-old senator has risen through the ranks so quickly.

"A South Florida Republican is in large part a Republican that's really significantly influenced in one way or another by the Bush experience," said Jorge Arrizurieta, a longtime Bush friend and donor. "To those who've been active Republicans, they've been inevitably exposed in one way or another to a Bush campaign of some sort."

The coming decision "marks a coming of age for South Florida — not only the politics, but the culture, the Pan-Americanism, the melting pot of sorts," said Armando Ibarra, another member of the Miami Young Republicans. "I like both of the candidates; Jeb was a great governor, Marco Rubio was a great senator. Personally, I just really believe in the transformational qualities of a Marco Rubio candidacy."

There is the possibility of a real Bush-vs.-Rubio battle in Florida next year. If both men run for president and perform well in early primary states, they would face off in Florida's winner-take-all primary in mid-March. They might be joined by other potential candidates who also live in the state. Former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee has a home near Destin in the state's Panhandle, and Ben Carson, the retired neurosurgeon and conservative activist, lives in West Palm Beach. Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Tex.) might also enjoy support here because of his Cuban American heritage.

But the focus is on Bush and Rubio. Anticipating a brawl, the Tampa Bay Times has already dubbed its 2016 coverage "Jebio" — a combination of "Jeb" and "Rubio." Early polling gives Bush an edge over Rubio in a primary.

"It's a massive decision that I can't even begin to think about," said Nelson Diaz, chairman of the Miami-Dade County Republican Party, a position once held by Bush. "I can't imagine how difficult a decision it would be for some people."

Diaz met Rubio in 1996, when the future senator was running Bob Dole's presidential campaign in South Florida. At the time, some other guy named Rubio was running for local office. So as a joke, Diaz took the man's pink "Rubio" sign, cut it in half, took a "Bob Dole for President" sign, cut it in half and taped them together: The new sign read "Rubio for President." Sadly, he didn't keep it.

Jorge Luis Lopez, a Miami-area lobbyist, was one of the 200 Floridians who traveled with Bush to New Hampshire in 2000 to hand out oranges and campaign for his brother, George W. Bush. But Lopez is closer in age to Rubio and appreciates that the senator is drawing new, younger people into the process.

"The bulk of the people we're talking to, they're a different group," he said. "They're aware of politics, but not engaged, and this is an interesting opportunity for them to get engaged."

[In drive to be 45th president, Jeb Bush faces legacies of 43rd and 41st.]

As he prepares for his announcement, Rubio has been selling a chance to win tickets to his campaign kickoff for $3.05 — a tribute to Miami's 305 area code. At the start, Rubio is expected to divide his campaign operations between South Florida and Washington, where most of his top aides and their families reside, aides said.

Later this month, Jeb Bush will host his top fundraisers at a two-day conclave at the swanky 1 Hotel in South Beach. Once Bush announces, he's expected to open a campaign headquarters here. Top aides, including campaign manager-in-waiting David Kochel, are relocating to Miami in anticipation of a run.

In West Miami, Rubio's house is at the end of a cul-de-sac, where his large, gray Ford pickup truck sits in the driveway. He briefly put the home up for sale last year for nearly $696,000.

Rubio is a frequent customer at the CVS pharmacy a few blocks away, where signs in each aisle are printed in English and Spanish. "He comes all the time — weekends, during the week, with the kids, the wife," a shift manager said recently.

The pharmacy is on Calle Ocho (or "SW 8th St." on street signs) amid locally owned print shops, medical clinics and tax accountants whose signs urge customers to "Preparé los taxes aquí." When his top aides are in town, they like eating at La Palma Cafeteria, one of several family-owned Cuban restaurants in the neighborhood.

Much of Rubio's free time is absorbed by a devotion to football and the Miami Dolphins. He's been a devout fan since the age of 6, when he started developing an encyclopedic understanding of the game. Colleagues gifted him two years of Dolphins season tickets when he left the Florida House in 2008. He still attends games with his children.

[From 2011: Marco Rubio's compelling family story embellishes facts]

Bush's home is on a tree-lined street, just a few blocks from buildings housing the regional offices of HBO, Bacardi and Del Monte produce. Bush and his wife, Columba, are fans of a nearby restaurant, Talavera, which serves meals inspired by Mexican street markets and some of Mexico City's top restaurants.

Until recently, Bush shared an office with his son, Jeb Bush Jr., at the luxurious Biltmore Hotel, where they based their investment company. The father and son often play golf together on the hotel's course on Sunday mornings.

He drives a Ford Fusion hybrid and recently told a crowd in Iowa last month that he shops at a Publix supermarket near his home for “Iowa beef.” During a recent visit to the store, workers behind the deli counter conversed with customers in English and Spanish. In the back aisle, meat and poultry are labeled in both languages — but there is no sign that the beef comes from Iowa.

A few blocks away is the Church of the Little Flower, one of the region’s oldest Catholic parishes. The Bushes are members.

On Sundays, Bush “is like clockwork, he comes in about five minutes beforehand, he gets his seat in a certain spot in our church and does what everybody else does,” said the pastor, the Rev. Michael W. Davis.

Rubio also has ties to the church. It was where he married his wife, Jeanette, in 1998. The couple and their four young children regularly attend Christ Fellowship, a local evangelical church. But they attend services at Little Flower around the holidays, Davis said.

Ninoska Pérez Castellón, a talk-show host on the local “Radio Mambi,” remembers meeting Bush in the 1980s when she used to lead marches protesting the Castro regime. Despite not being Cuban or originally from Miami, “he really felt like these were his people,” she said.

Rubio has been a frequent guest on Pérez’s weekday show, and she said her audience feels a personal bond with him.

“One time he came by and was late,” she recalled. “He showed up and said, ‘I’m sorry I’m late, but you know how it is. The kids . . . and the washing machine broke.” Within minutes, “we had 22 calls from people who repair washers calling, saying that they wanted to repair his washer,” she said.

Secret Money Group Tied to Marco Rubio Super PAC Has Been Researching Presidential Primary Voters [Scott Bland, National Journal, April 10, 2015]

A secret-money group linked to Marco Rubio's new super PAC has existed for over a year, during which time it commissioned extensive research on early-state primary voters.

April 10, 2015 A secret-money group linked to Marco Rubio's new super PAC has existed for over a year, during which time it commissioned extensive research on early-state primary voters.

The nonprofit—whose existence has never been revealed and whose name matches the recently announced pro-Rubio super PAC—commissioned a minutely detailed, 270-page political research book on early-state primary voters last year, and the report was prepared by a firm on Rubio's own political payroll.

The research contains a trove of information on voter demographics and policy positions in states that, at the time of its publication, were expected to host the first five nominating contests of the 2016 Republican presidential primaries: Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina, Nevada, and Florida.

Political data this detailed is often expensive to produce, and closely guarded. But nonprofits and other outside groups are not allowed to coordinate with campaigns, and by posting the research publicly, the group has made its findings available free of charge to Rubio or anyone else who might want to use it.

The report was prepared for a nonprofit, called Conservative Solutions Project Inc., which was incorporated in Delaware in January 2014, according to state records. Just this week, Rubio allies publicized a super PAC that will support Rubio for president next year. It is called Conservative Solutions PAC. While the super PAC will have to disclose its donors and expenses regularly, nonprofits do not have to disclose donors.

"Absolutely, the two groups are related," Conservative Solutions PAC spokesman Jeff Sadosky told National Journal Friday. "But they are separate and distinct entities. One is focused on supporting Marco Rubio's potential presidential campaign, and one is focused on issue education."

Sadosky said the nonprofit was established by Warren Tompkins, who is also heading the super PAC, as well as fellow Republican operatives Joel McElhannon and Pat Shortridge. The research was published publicly, Sadosky said, to "make sure everyone's advocating and communicating, as effectively as possible, the conservative ideals Conservative Solutions Project wants to push forward."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

According to the report cover, the research book was drafted by 0ptimus Consulting, a Republican data analytics firm that started working for Rubio's leadership PAC in 2013. Rubio's PAC paid 0ptimus $200,000 in 2013 and 2014 for data and analytics consulting, according to federal campaign finance disclosures. The report was published in December 2014 and is available on Conservative Solutions Project's website. It is also on the 0ptimus website, where a description says it was produced "in conjunction with the Conservative Solutions PAC," though the report itself is branded with the nonprofit's name.

Elements of the book seem tailor-made to aid a Rubio presidential campaign in particular (if, as expected, he announces Monday that he will run for the 2016 Republican nomination). In addition to exhaustive breakdowns of voter attributes and historical data in the five states, the research includes detailed findings about voters' views on issues like immigration reform—which Rubio championed in the Senate in 2013—as well a muscular, Rubio-style foreign policy.

The report goes into particular detail on how voters in Iowa, the first caucus state, view immigration reform. Rubio's sponsorship of bipartisan immigration reform legislation in the Senate two years ago damaged his standing with some conservatives. The research showed Iowans overall, but not Iowa Republicans, supporting immigration reform.

In Florida, the research found that Republican primary voters were supportive of the idea "the future success or failure of the party" depended on performance with Hispanic voters—an argument echoed by Rubio advisers like pollster Whit Ayres, who recently argued that Rubio could be "transformational" in expanding the GOP's appeal. The report showed Republican primary voters accepted the premise at about the same rate as the general population.

Forming nonprofit outside groups, which don't have to disclose donations, is a growing trend in presidential politics. The nonprofits, which often have similar names to affiliated super PACs, cannot spend all their money on political purposes, but they can work hand-in-hand with super PACs and other outside groups on things from policy research to airing their own "issue ads" on TV. Last month, the Washington Post reported an ally of former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush established a nonprofit, Right to Rise Policy Solutions, to back a potential Bush campaign—along with Bush's Right to Rise PAC and Right to Rise Super PAC.

"The reality is there are now ways to fund activity that's very helpful to candidates and do so on a secret basis so no one knows who's funding it, no one knows it's happening until much later, and types of money can be used that could not otherwise be used in an election," said Campaign Legal Center President Trevor Potter, a former chair of the Federal Election Commission and Republican election attorney.

Alex Conant, a spokesman for Rubio, and Scott Tranter, a partner with 0ptimus, did not respond to questions about the nonprofit and its links to Rubio's political operation.

"In sum, the three sections of this report provide unique data, original insights, and wide-ranging analysis of the American electorate that should provide a valuable educational resource of interest to many," the report's introduction reads.

The only known donor to Conservative Solutions Project is a political group: Super PAC for America, an organization once led by Michael Reagan and Dick Morris that raised and spent millions of dollars in the 2010 and 2012 elections but spent down its remaining money last year. The super PAC's campaign finance reports include a $10,000 donation to Conservative Solutions Project in June 2014.

In late 2014, commenters on online forums made note of robocalls from a Las Vegas-based number asking respondents to complete a survey for "Conservative Solutions Project." A Nevada politics blogger wrote that in addition to the policy question, the call also asked for opinions about potential presidential candidates, including Rubio. The Conservative Solutions Project report does not include any findings about individual politicians.

Hedge-Fund Magnate Robert Mercer Emerges as a Generous Backer of Cruz [Eric Lichtblau & Alexandra Stevenson, NYT, April 10, 2015]

Hedge-fund titan Robert Mercer has emerged as a top donor and supporter of Ted Cruz.

WASHINGTON — The two men share a passion for unbridled markets, concerns about the Internal Revenue Service and a skeptical view of climate change.

Now the two — Senator Ted Cruz, Republican of Texas, and Robert Mercer, a Wall Street hedge-fund magnate — share another bond that could link them through November 2016: Both want to see Mr. Cruz elected president.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Mercer, a reclusive Long Islander who started at I.B.M. and made his fortune using computer patterns to outsmart the stock market, emerged this week as a key early bankroller of Mr. Cruz's surprisingly fast campaign start. He is believed to be the main donor behind a network of four "super PACs" supporting Mr. Cruz that reported raising $31 million just a few weeks into his campaign.

The emergence of rich and relatively low-profile donors like Mr. Mercer could single-handedly jump-start a presidential campaign, said Trevor Potter, a campaign finance lawyer who served as a Republican member of the Federal Election Commission.

"It just takes a random billionaire to change a race and maybe change the country," Mr. Potter said. "That's what's so radically different now."

Mr. Mercer does not have the name recognition of fellow Republican financiers like the Koch brothers or Sheldon Adelson, but he has spent more than $15 million since 2012 in support of conservative political campaigns and causes, donating to a number of candidates who had never even met him. Both moderate Republican candidates and Democrats in states like Iowa, New York and Oregon have found themselves in the cross hairs of expensive attack ads that he financed.

Mr. Mercer "is a very low-profile guy, but he's becoming a bigger and bigger player," said Bradley A. Smith, a campaign finance expert who was a Republican appointee on the Federal Election Commission. Mr. Mercer's financial support for Mr. Cruz "sends the message to other donors that Cruz is a serious guy," Mr. Smith said, "and that brings in other donors."

Rep. Peter DeFazio, Democrat of Oregon, remembers with some bitterness Mr. Mercer's opposition to his re-election campaign in 2014 when he spent about $650,000 on attack ads and other efforts in support of a conservative challenger.

"I don't think the guy had ever even been to Oregon," Mr. DeFazio said. He said he believed Mr. Mercer targeted him in part because of legislation Mr. DeFazio sponsored that threatened higher taxes for hedge funds like Mr. Mercer's fund, Renaissance Technologies.

"He's a patron for ultra-right-wing causes," Mr. DeFazio said, "and in a Republican presidential race, being an ultra-right-wing millionaire from Wall Street isn't going to hurt you."

He is also an example of how wealthy donors have been empowered by the Supreme Court's 2010 decision in the landmark Citizens United case, which paved the way for super PACs. Unlike candidates, super PACs can accept unlimited amounts of money from individuals and corporations to support a candidate so long as they do not officially "coordinate" with the campaign. Many moneyed Wall Street veterans enjoy playing the political game, hosting fund-raisers and speaking publicly about the horse they are backing. Mr. Mercer is not one of them. A computer scientist by training, he is more at ease crunching numbers than pressing the flesh. Mr. Mercer declined to comment.

He prefers to stay quiet about most things. After receiving a lifetime achievement award from the Association for Computational Linguistics at an event last year, Mr. Mercer told the audience he was daunted by the prospect of speaking there for an hour, "which, by the way, is more than I typically talk in a month so it's quite a challenge."

Intensely private, he has been described as "an icy cold poker player" whose boss once jokingly called him "an automaton," according to a description in "More Money Than God," a book about the hedge fund industry by Sebastian Mallaby.

Before joining Renaissance Technologies, Mr. Mercer, 68, worked at I.B.M.'s research center, where he specialized in computerized translation of languages.

While little of his private life has been made public, some details have emerged in recent court cases. In 2013, a group of former workers at his house sued him for not paying overtime. They also accused him of deducting money from their semi-annual bonuses as a form of punishment for, among other things, failing to replace shampoos, close doors and change razor blades. "The matter has been resolved amicably," Troy L. Kessler, a lawyer for the employees, said.

In 2009, Mr. Mercer sued RailDreams, a toy train manufacturer, and its president, Richard Taylor, for overcharging him $2 million for a contract to build and install a model train and railway set at his home.

Mr. Mercer has said nothing publicly about his financial backing for Mr. Cruz's campaign or how he came to support him. But his daughter, Rebekah Mercer, who started a bakery in Manhattan called Ruby et Violette, has been more vocal. This week she held a fund-raiser for Mr. Cruz at her Manhattan apartment.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When James H. Simons, the billionaire founder of the Renaissance hedge fund, hired Mr. Mercer in 1993, the company was more university campus than Wall Street firm. Mr. Simons, a mathematician and former code-breaker for the National Security Agency, brought in astronomers and physicists to analyze reams of data, using computer programs to search for patterns that could be used to inform trading decisions. Mr. Simons has been a major political backer of Democrats, donating $8.3 million in 2014.

The hedge fund's strategy has been tremendously successful. The firm's flagship Medallion fund, which manages money only for employees today, has earned average annual returns of 35 percent for two decades. Over all, the firm manages $25 billion, much of it employees' money.

Renaissance was also able to increase returns by borrowing large sums of money, but the practice eventually caught the attention of Washington and government agencies. Last year the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations accused Renaissance of using complex financial structures that allowed it to underestimate how much it owed the Internal Revenue Service by $6 billion.

Taxpayers "had to shoulder the tax burden these hedge funds shrugged off with the aid of the banks," Senator Carl Levin of Michigan said at a hearing last summer.

The I.R.S. has been investigating Renaissance for at least six years. A spokesman for the firm said its tax practices were legal and appropriate.

Mr. Cruz's campaign did not respond to a request for comment about Mr. Mercer's support for his candidacy or his hedge fund's $6 billion tax issue.

But the candidate, like his new Wall Street backer, has his own concerns about the I.R.S., which might have gotten Mr. Mercer's attention. Last month, he called for the agency to be abolished altogether.

As Scott Walker addresses NRA, concealed carry shifts surface [Matthew DeFour, Wisconsin State Journal, April 10, 2015]

Gov. Scott Walker was for permitting concealed carry of handguns before he was against it -- until he was for it again.

Gov. Scott Walker was for permitting concealed carry of handguns before he was against it -- until he was for it again.

Walker's shifting position on the law he championed, but also voted against in 2002 as he ran for Milwaukee County executive, surfaced Friday as he was set to address a National Rifle Association convention in Nashville.

The likely 2016 presidential contender has come under fire for shifting his position on various issues, including immigration, right-to-work, abortion, ethanol subsidies and the Common Core education standards.

"Add concealed carry to the list of issues Walker has changed his position on just to benefit himself," said Jason Pitt, a spokesman for the Democratic National Committee. "If we've learned anything from Scott Walker over the past few months it's that his constant pandering on issues has defined him as one of the least trustworthy candidates among the 2016 GOP field."

A spokeswoman for Walker's political nonprofit did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

In 1999, Walker cosponsored a concealed carry law as a member of the state Assembly. But in 2002, he voted against a similar bill that passed the Assembly. It died in the Democrat-controlled Senate. Democratic Gov. Jim Doyle, who was elected that same year, vetoed subsequent iterations of the bill.

Walker signed the law in 2011 after it won bipartisan support in the Republican-controlled Assembly and Senate.

His support for concealed carry has been a constant theme in his speeches to Republican activists across the country, starting at the Iowa Freedom Summit in late January.

At the Conservative Political Action Conference he told NRA News Network that he supports eliminating a 48-hour waiting period for handgun purchases.

"We've been the leader when it comes to freedom over the last four years," Walker told NRA News in highlighting the concealed carry law.

Walker is scheduled to speak at about 1:30 p.m. CDT. Also on the program are nine other potential presidential candidates, Texas Sen. Ted Cruz, who is running for president, and Milwaukee County Sheriff David Clarke, a Democrat who has been building a national profile in conservative circles as a stalwart second amendment supporter.

Liberal group One Wisconsin Now highlighted Walker's stands on concealed carry Friday.

"At that time he thought that concealed carry did not play well in Milwaukee County, so he voted against it for that short-term gain," Scot Ross, OWN's executive director, said of Walker's earlier opposition.

The Best Reason to Take Rand Paul Seriously Has Nothing to Do With His Politics [Jim Rutenberg, NYT Magazine, April 10, 2015]

It's the boring details of the organization that Paul is building that provide the best reason to take him seriously. If Paul's views are unusually idealistic, the ground game that his team is planning is pure realpolitik. His staff is focused on the delegate math and party rules that could determine the next Republican nominee — a game-theory style of presidential politics at which the Paul team is particularly adept.

Although Rand Paul — who declared his bid for the presidency on Tuesday — has spent several years now inching toward the Republican mainstream, there is still a tendency among the political classes to view him as a sideshow candidate. The crankiness of his announcement-week interviews certainly suggests that he's still getting a handle on retail politics. And though his policy views — calls for more rational sentencing guidelines, a less intrusive national-security apparatus and a restrained foreign policy — give him potential appeal with young, minority and libertarian-leaning voters, they also make him an outlier in the field of declared or likely Republican contenders.

Paul's (relative) unorthodoxy makes him that rare candidate whose policy views draw gobs of media attention: He's teaming up with Democrats to scale back mandatory-minimum drug sentencing and likens the war on drugs to Jim Crow? (The same Rand Paul who once said he opposed parts of the Civil Rights Act?) He's in the same party as Senator John McCain, and yet he opposed arming the Syrian rebels?

But in fact, it's the boring details of the organization that Paul is building that provide the best reason to take him seriously. If Paul's views are unusually idealistic, the ground game that his team is planning is pure realpolitik. His staff is focused on the delegate math and party rules that could determine the next Republican nominee — a game-theory style of presidential politics at which the Paul team is particularly adept.

The process by which presidential candidates are nominated is, at its most basic level, a race toward a magic number of party delegates — in the Republican Party's case, 1,235 required to win — amassed state by state and, in some cases, congressional district by congressional district. Getting them depends not only on the speechifying, door-to-door vote-hunting and million-dollar ad buys we associate with campaigning, but also on a bewildering array of procedural minutia: obscure national bylaws that overlay a mind-bending patchwork of local rules that can vary drastically from state to state, some of which award delegates not based on votes received in primary elections but on back-room wrangling at local party conventions and meetings that take place weeks or even months after votes are cast.

You would think that mastering these arcana would be a priority for campaigns, given their importance. But even the best-funded, most-inevitable-seeming candidates mess them up all the time — and long-shot candidacies have been made, or at least sustained, by getting them right. Barack Obama's Democratic primary victory in 2008 came in large part because his strategists understood the way delegates were being doled out state by state — even to the losing candidate, based on his or her share of the vote — better than Hillary Rodham Clinton's team did.

In 2012, Rick Santorum employed a novel strategy of focusing his resources only on states where he stood to gain the most delegates. He left other states uncontested and later tried to steal delegates from Mitt Romney in states where delegates were awarded at the state and local conventions and caucuses. It wasn't enough to take him to the general election, but it propelled a remarkable run as the primaries' pre-eminent spoiler — he kept Romney fighting for the nomination until April — by a candidate whom few took seriously at first.

Santorum is expected to make another run in 2016 — but unfortunately for him, two of the main strategists who worked for him in 2012 are now working for Paul. One of them, Mike Biundo, was Santorum's campaign manager and co-piloted his cross-country hopscotching strategy. The other strategist, Paul's national political director, John Yob, was part of Santorum's later-stage delegate-hunting efforts. (Santorum's chief strategist, John Brabender, told me this week that if

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Santorum runs, he will be just fine without Biundo and Yob and will build a "more sophisticated" operation than the one he had four years ago). With Santorum, Biundo and Yob learned the rules and the ins and outs of the electoral map in a way few others had. Only one campaign knew them still better: Ron Paul's.

The elder Paul's team first showed that it knew its way around the primary rules in 2008, when it took McCain's campaign by surprise by showing up in force at state conventions to push the election of Paul-friendly convention delegates long after McCain thought he had vanquished all of his Republican rivals. "We weren't ready for the intensity and organization they put together," Ryan Price, a McCain national deputy political director who helped run his delegate strategy that year, told me.

The McCain team — on which Yob served as a political director — was able to keep the damage from Paul's efforts to a minimum. Mitt Romney had less luck in 2012, when the Paulites used the knowledge they had gained from 2008 to win a plurality of delegates in several states long after their primaries and caucuses — none of which Paul actually won — were over. "They were very sophisticated about the chess match," says Katie Packer Gage, Romney's 2012 deputy campaign manager. "They definitely caused a lot of headaches." As I wrote last month, Paul's success prompted party leaders to enact new rules to discourage candidates from repeating his insurrection, which Rand Paul's team is scrutinizing now in hopes of figuring out how to work around them.

Ron Paul, of course, never came close to winning the nomination. But if his son can mount a bigger, more credible campaign than that of his father, as he is expected to do, he could use the same apparatus and approach to expertly navigate the rules and cause more than just headaches. "If they can bring all of that with them, then it would be very, very beneficial," Gage told me. But she added a caveat: "I just wouldn't make the assumption that his team is going to have it just because his dad's team had it."

The family legacy is mixed for Rand Paul. His team does have several veterans of the Ron Paul campaigns, starting with the candidate himself; Ron Paul's Iowa vice chairman, A. J. Spiker; and Ron Paul's former campaign manager — and grandson-in-law — Jesse Benton (though Benton is heading to a Paul-supporting "super PAC" and, once that happens, will have to cease direct contact with the official campaign under federal elections law). But as Paul seeks to build a broader base than his father had, he is alienating some of the hard-core, grass-roots Ron Paul loyalists — the same people who were so galvanized by his father's candidacy that they mastered the minutiae of their state party rules and infiltrated local Republican committees on his behalf.

And all of the Paul team's savvy at counting delegates and working state rules will only take him so far if another candidate — a Jeb Bush, say, or a Scott Walker — builds early momentum and wins a series of primaries out of the gate. A truly inevitable candidate does not need to worry about the small stuff or try to game the rules. Great victories bring great caches of delegates.

But in a close-fought, state-by-state contest between two or more competitive candidates, the campaign that best understands the intricacies of delegate allotment will have a real edge — and at this point, that campaign is almost certainly Paul's. Like Obama in 2008, Paul is a first-term senator who, aware of his underdog status, is spending the campaign's early days planning for all the scenarios it can envision.

When I asked Yob — a second-generation Michigan Republican who knows better than to show any kinship with Obama — about the parallels, he laughed off the question. "We are simultaneously building early-state organizations that are the strongest in the field while also preparing for the possibility of a nominating process that extends to the caucuses and state conventions, where convention delegates will ultimately be selected," he told me. "It is safe to say, I like our chances in caucus systems and conventions across the country."

Jeb Bush hires two new foreign policy advisers [Ed O'Keefe, WaPo, April 10, 2015]

Bush has tapped Robert S. Karem and John Noonan to join his growing policy shop, according to aides familiar with the hires.

As Jeb Bush inches closer to running for president, he's hired two new advisers to help develop his foreign policy agenda.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush has tapped Robert S. Karem and John Noonan to join his growing policy shop, according to aides familiar with the hires.

Most recently, Karem was a top policy adviser to House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy (R-Calif.) and former House Majority Leader Eric Cantor (R-Va.). He also worked for former vice president Dick Cheney as a researcher on his memoir and as a member of his national security staff.

Noonan is leaving his role as spokesman for the House Armed Services Committee, and once advised Mitt Romney's 2012 presidential campaign on defense policy.

Aides said that Karem and Noonan are expected to help Bush track world affairs on a daily basis and work with him on his foreign policy agenda. They'll work alongside Justin Muzinich, who will serve as Bush's policy chief should he launch a formal campaign, as expected. Muzinich is a former New York-based investment firm manager.

One of the most sensitive tasks Karem and Noonan are expected to tackle is facilitating conversations with Bush's 21-member advisory team of veteran GOP foreign policy experts.

The team, which he unveiled in February, reflects a broad cross-section of GOP thinking, including two former secretaries of state, George Shultz and James Baker; two former CIA directors, Porter Goss and Michael Hayden; former attorney general Michael Mukasey and Paul Wolfowitz, a former deputy defense secretary and lead architect of the Iraq war.

There are no current plans for the group to ever formally meet in person with Bush -- such a gathering might be too awkward given the members' intensely differing views. And given his early fundraising prowess, his standing in early public opinion polls and his family history, it's no surprise that jockeying to advise Bush has been intense, according to some people familiar with the process.

The Wall Street Journal reported this week that an early casualty of the jockeying was Elbridge Colby, a fellow at the Center for a New American Security, who was being considered as one of Bush's foreign policy aides.

But Colby said in an e-mail to The Post that he was never formally offered the job.

Bush aides strongly disputed the reports of infighting and said that Bush welcomes the group's differing views on the world, and that he's been interacting with the experts frequently via e-mail as he develops a broader understanding of foreign affairs.

How Rand Paul Can Get Better at Interviews [Alan Rappeport, NYT First Draft, April 10, 2015]

Sen. Rand Paul has given several interviews recently over which his temperament has been called into question.

Senator Rand Paul’s penchant for prickly interviews has ruffled feathers during his first week as a presidential candidate, leaving some wondering if this is a deliberate strategy or just a hot temper.

After a contentious back and forth with NBC’s Savannah Guthrie this week, and the “shush” of a female CNBC anchor in February, Mr. Paul said on Thursday that he is an “equal opportunity” curmudgeon when it comes to losing his patience with the media.

Seeming to prove that point, Mr. Paul walked away during an interview on Friday with a male reporter from The Guardian when pressed for specifics on the issue of criminal justice.

As Mr. Paul is likely to do many more interviews as he seeks the Republican nomination, First Draft checked in with a media coach to see how the Kentucky senator can improve.

“The advice I would give to him is to always remember the interview is not with the reporter,” said Brad Phillips, president of Phillips Media Relations. “The reporter is the conduit to the audience you want to reach out to.”

Mr. Phillips said candidates and politicians can be successful with an aggressive approach toward the media until it begins to erode their likability. Taking a “happy warrior” approach, smiling more and giving off a warmer vibe, Mr. Phillips said, would behoove Mr. Paul as voters start to pay more attention.

“If somebody who gives the perception as being peevish were to get the nomination, the historical trend makes clear that person would be running at a disadvantage," he said.

Trying to cool perceptions about Mr. Paul's temper, his team said on Friday that they did not turn off the lights on his interview with The Guardian. And to prove that Mr. Paul has nothing against female journalists, his aides made sure to say he was rushing to do an interview with Dana Bash of CNN.

Ted Cruz: 'Jihad' Was Waged Against Religious Freedom Bills [Daniel Strauss, TPM, April 10, 2015]

Sen. Ted Cruz argued that opponents of a pair of controversial religious freedom laws had been waging a jihad against those proposals.

Sen. Ted Cruz (R-TX) argued that opponents of a pair of controversial religious freedom laws had been waging a jihad against those proposals.

"We look at the jihad that is being waged right now in Indiana and Arkansas going after people of faith who respect the biblical teaching that marriage is the union of one man and one woman," Cruz said during a panel moderated by conservative radio host Steve Deace on Thursday. "We need to bring people together to the religious liberty values that built this country."

Cruz's comments come after Indiana Gov. Mike Pence (R) was forced to clarify a controversial religious freedom law aimed at allowing businesses to refuse to serve same-sex individuals based on religious objections. Arkansas Gov. Asa Hutchison (R), sent similar legislation back to his state's legislature in response to national criticism as well.

Cruz, and most of the likely 2016 Republican presidential candidates, have expressed strong support for both laws. Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal (R) recently threw his support behind similar legislation that in certain ways is broader than the Indiana or Arkansas bills.

Cruz added that "it wasn't long ago when this was an area of bipartisan agreement."

Marco Rubio Assails Obama but Not Clinton at N.R.A. Forum [Nick Corasaniti, NYT First Draft, April 10, 2015]

Misfire: The crowd gave a hesitant response to Mr. Rubio's mention of legislation he introduced that would keep local officials in Washington from enacting gun laws, which has not received much attention.

"Cold Dead Hands" Moment: None, really.

Other Ammo: Mr. Rubio criticized Mr. Obama for his response to the Paris attacks, the president's "line in the sand" comments on Syria and what he perceived to be a "weak" American foreign policy.

Cross Hairs: He focused entirely on Mr. Obama and did not mention Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Pump Action: Mr. Rubio drew laughter for jokes about Mr. Obama's golf game and his State of the Union water bottle moment.

White House: Iran deal requires phased sanctions removal [Jim Kuhnhenn, WaPo, April 10, 2015]
President Obama's Foreign Policy advisor, Ben Rhodes, has pushed back on the notion that demands for the immediate suspension of sanctions has imperiled the potential deal.

PANAMA CITY — The White House pushed back Friday against declarations from Iran's leaders that any nuclear deal must include an immediate lifting of sanctions, indicating President Barack Obama will walk away from negotiations unless sanctions are removed over time.

Obama foreign policy adviser Ben Rhodes portrayed the tough stance by Supreme Leader Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei and President Hassan Rouhani as a reflection of internal pressures from Iran hardliners and said the development doesn't mean a final agreement is unattainable. But Rhodes pointed out the framework agreement that Iran and the six powers reached last week to curb Tehran's nuclear activities allows for sanctions to be removed over time, not at once.

"It's very clear and understood that sanctions relief will be phased," Rhodes told reporters traveling with Obama in Panama for the Summit of the Americas. "The fact of the matter is, we have framework. The president has said if the details don't bear out, we won't have a deal."

In his first comments on the framework, Khamenei told a gathering of religious poets on Thursday that he "is neither for nor against" it. But he said the punitive "sanctions should be lifted completely, on the very day of the deal." He said because the agreement was only the framework and not the accord itself, "nothing has been done yet."

The deadline for a final deal is June 30.

Rouhani, a relative moderate, sent the same message during a ceremony Thursday marking Iran's nuclear technology day, which celebrates the country's atomic achievements.

"We will not sign any agreement unless all economic sanctions are totally lifted on the first day of the implementation of the deal," Rouhani said.

Rhodes said Khamenei and Rouhani had to deal with internal politics, but that their statements should not be taken as a test of what the final deal will look like.

"They have their own hardliners who are skeptical of this deal," Rhodes said. "The test of whether or not that framework can be memorialized is not a comment on any given day by an Iranian leader, the test will be if by the end of June we have a document."

The framework says sanctions put in place over Iran's nuclear program will be suspended once international monitors verify that Tehran is abiding by the limitations spelled out in the agreement. Rhodes said the International Atomic Energy Agency will have to inspect military sites.

An essential part of the deal, he said, is "having the IAEA ability to inspect suspicious sites, no matter where they are."

The West has long feared Iran's nuclear program could allow it to build an atomic bomb and that Tehran has used uranium enrichment — the key point of contention in the negotiations — to pursue nuclear weapons. Iran denies the charge, saying its nuclear program is for peaceful purposes only, such as power generation and cancer treatment.

New Sea Drilling Rule Planned, 5 Years After BP Oil Spill [Coral Davenport, NYT, April 10, 2015]

The Obama administration is planning to impose a major new regulation on offshore oil and gas drilling to try to prevent the kind of explosions that caused the catastrophic BP oil spill in the Gulf of Mexico, administration officials said Friday.

WASHINGTON — The Obama administration is planning to impose a major new regulation on offshore oil and gas drilling to try to prevent the kind of explosions that caused the catastrophic BP oil spill in the Gulf of Mexico, administration officials said Friday.

The announcement of the Interior Department regulation, which could be made as soon as Monday, is timed to coincide with the five-year anniversary of the disaster, which killed 11 men and sent millions of barrels of oil spewing into the gulf. The regulation is being introduced as the Obama administration is taking steps to open up vast new areas of federal waters off the southeast Atlantic Coast to drilling, a decision that has infuriated environmentalists.

The rule is expected to tighten safety requirements on blowout preventers, the industry-standard devices that are the last line of protection to stop explosions in undersea oil and gas wells. The explosion of the Deepwater Horizon oil rig on April 20, 2010, was caused in part when the buckling of a section of drill pipe led to the malfunction of a supposedly fail-safe blowout preventer on a BP well called Macondo.

It will be the third and biggest new drilling-equipment regulation put forth by the Obama administration in response to the disaster. In 2010, the Interior Department announced new regulations on drilling well casings, and in 2012, it announced new regulations on the cementing of wells.

The latest regulation, a result of several years of study, will be imposed on all future offshore drilling equipment and will be used by the administration to make the case that it can prevent a BP-like disaster as oil exploration expands in the Atlantic. The Interior Department is also reviewing a proposal from Royal Dutch Shell to drill in the Arctic's Chukchi Sea, off the coast of Alaska.

"We're coming on five years, and we've been working tirelessly in the regulation division since it happened," said Allyson

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Anderson, associate director of strategic engagement in the Interior Department's Bureau of Safety and Environmental Enforcement. "We've doubled down on building a culture of safety,"

But environmentalists remained highly skeptical.

"Making sure the design, operation and maintenance of the blowout preventer is the best it can possibly be is imperative, no question," said Bob Deans, a spokesman for the Natural Resources Defense Council and co-author of the book "In Deep Water," an investigation of the cause of the spill. "Industry and government have taken measures over the past five years to reduce some of the risk in what is an inherently dangerous operation at sea. That's a far cry from saying it's safe. And the last thing we need is to expose Atlantic or Arctic waters to a BP-style blowout."

Environmentalists also noted that a panel appointed by President Obama to investigate the spill concluded that the chief cause of the disaster, which left the Gulf Coast soaked in black tar, was not the blowout preventer but a broad systemic failure of oversight by the companies involved in drilling the well and the government regulators assigned to police them.

Five years after the spill, the number of accidents and injuries per oil-producing well has increased, according to Interior Department statistics. Between 2009 and 2014, the overall number of oil- and gas-producing wells dropped about 20 percent, and accidents and incidents associated with drilling in the Gulf of Mexico dropped 14 percent. But during that period, accidents and injuries per producing well increased by about 7 percent.

A report last year by the Chemical Safety Board concluded that the blowout preventer's blind shear ram, an emergency hydraulic device with two cutting blades, punctured the pipe and sent oil and gas gushing to the surface. The study found that the drill pipe had buckled under the tremendous pressure of the oil and gas rising from the well from the initial blowout.

That report warned that another disastrous offshore oil well blowout could happen despite regulatory improvements in the four years since the BP well explosion.

"The new regulation is important," said William K. Reilly, a co-chairman of the presidential panel that investigated the spill, and the administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency under the first President George Bush. "The signal from the department that it is attending to each of the systems is more important. The blowout preventer is the last-ditch preventer. It was activated too late in Macondo. If you get to the point where it's all you've got, it better be good. But the system process we identified — attention to management, process design, adherence to the system — those are really vital long before you ever get to the point where you have an emergency."

Mr. Reilly blamed Congress for some of the continued systemic problems, saying that lawmakers should have appropriated funds to increase programs for safety training and inspection.

Administration officials say that since the spill, the Interior Department has initiated the most aggressive and comprehensive offshore oil and gas regulation and oversight in history. The agency has nearly doubled the number of safety inspectors in the Gulf of Mexico, from 55 at the time of the spill to 92 today. After the accident, the Interior Department was restructured, separating the agency charged with overseeing safety from the one charged with overseeing the collection of revenue.

The agency has also put in place a requirement that any company performing deep-water drilling in the Gulf of Mexico must have access to containment dome technology — essentially, a dome that can be put over an exploded well to contain gushing oil. At least two ports in the Gulf of Mexico now store containment domes that can be used in emergencies.

While the oil industry typically opposes regulations, it has followed some of the recommendations made by the presidential panel. The big oil companies created and funded the Center for Offshore Safety, an institute intended to promote and disseminate best practices in drilling.

"The industry's overall safety record was strong before Macondo, and the co-chairs of President Obama's national spill commission were absolutely right when they said that offshore drilling is now even safer," said Jack N. Gerard, president of the American Petroleum Institute, which lobbies for the oil industry. "We will continue to build on these achievements because our goal is zero accidents and zero spills."

General Electric to sell bulk of its finance unit [Andrew Ross Sorkin & Michael J. de la Merced, NYT Dealbook, April 10, 2015]

General Electric plans to sell off most of its finance arm within two years, redefining the multinational conglomerate as it seeks to complete a transformation begun amid the tumult of the financial crisis.

General Electric plans to sell off most of its finance arm within two years, redefining the multinational conglomerate as it seeks to complete a transformation begun amid the tumult of the financial crisis.

In addition to the huge planned sales of assets outlined by the company on Friday, General Electric will take other major steps, including bringing back about $36 billion in cash that currently resides overseas.

Rapidly shrinking the finance arm, GE Capital — once the most powerful driver of the company's earnings until it rocked the parent company after the fall of Lehman Brothers in 2008 — will erase one of the most prominent legacies of G.E.'s former chief executive, Jack Welch.

But it could also release the company from one of its biggest burdens: strict regulatory requirements that come with GE Capital's being regarded as a financial institution that is too big to fail.

General Electric's plan is that by 2018, its core industrial businesses — ranging from jet turbines to heavy energy equipment to sophisticated medical devices — will account for more than 90 percent of its earnings, up from 58 percent last year.

To Jeffrey R. Immelt, the company's chairman and chief executive, corporate legacy has not deterred him from a plan to shrink a huge and sometimes unwieldy collection of businesses. The conglomerate has already sold divisions like its small appliances unit that became too small to affect its sales, which stood at $148 billion last year.

"We're not sentimentalists," he said in an interview.

The conglomerate's ambitious plan will begin with the sale of most of GE Capital's real estate assets for $23 billion to the Blackstone Group and Wells Fargo, as well as other buyers.

All that will remain by the end of the sales process are any financing businesses closely tied to the conglomerate's core industrial businesses. G.E. estimates that those remaining assets will be valued at about $90 billion, a fraction of the $363 billion of GE Capital assets held as of year-end.

Friday's announcement represents the final stage of what Mr. Immelt has called a "simplification" campaign aimed at making one of the country's biggest corporations smaller and safer.

The plan will come with a substantial initial cost, with the company planning to take an accounting hit of $16 billion in its first fiscal quarter this year, most of which will be a noncash charge.

Moreover, the company will also pay about $6 billion in taxes on earnings it brings back from overseas.

Many American corporations continue to hold significant sums of money overseas — Apple for example, holds roughly $158 billion in foreign subsidiaries — in hopes of a change to the United States tax laws.

But G.E., which has been criticized in the past for its tax avoidance strategies, said it had chosen to move quickly.

"We decided not to wait for tax reform," said Keith S. Sherin, the chairman and chief executive of GE Capital.

The severe downsizing of the finance unit is a sea change for General Electric. For much of its 123-year history, the company had a finance division, though the business traditionally served as a support for its parent's manufacturing arms. Under Mr. Welch, however, GE Capital swelled in size, scope and willingness to take on risk, becoming one of the most prominent lenders in the country.

Yet that immenseness badly wounded General Electric in the wake of Lehman's demise, when the market upheaval left the conglomerate hard-pressed to borrow debt for its day-to-day operations.

Since the financial crisis, the conglomerate has taken steps to shrink its finance operation, selling off smaller pieces over the years. In one of its most notable moves, it spun off its private label credit card arm — now known as Synchrony Financial — in a $2.9 billion initial public offering last year.

Still, Mr. Immelt said, the company focused on moving carefully, its board careful "not to burn stuff out" at fire sale prices.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But the success of Synchrony — its stock has risen 30 percent since it began trading — helped prod Mr. Immelt and his team, including advisers at JPMorgan Chase and Centerview Partners, to consider moving more quickly.

At the same time, Mr. Immelt said in the interview, G.E.'s mainstay industrial operations were performing well.

Now is a "perfect time to be a seller," he said. Moreover, he added of potential asset buyers, "people are lining up at the starting line."

First up came a potential sale of GE Capital's real estate assets. As G.E.'s management team and advisers weighed potential partners, one name quickly came to mind: Blackstone and its huge real estate arm.

"We thought there was only one buyer who can do this: Jon Gray at Blackstone," Mr. Sherin of GE Capital said. "We told him, 'If you can hit this bid on an exclusive basis, it's yours.' "

Despite not putting the real estate assets up for a competitive auction, which may have fetched a higher price, Mr. Sherin declared himself happy with the result. Moving this way assured G.E. of both a speedy and certain transaction.

"Both parties think they got a fair price," he said.

General Electric said it would remain an acquirer of businesses as well, though its deals will be aimed at bolstering industrial operations. Last year, it paid $13.5 billion for the energy operations of the French industrial company Alstom.

Selling the bulk of GE Capital could bring significant benefits for G.E. shareholders, by the company's reckoning. It estimates that it could return more than $90 billion to investors by 2018, through special dividends, stock buybacks and other financial moves. About $35 billion of that alone will come from the GE Capital asset sales.

Perhaps one of the most notable potential consequences of the drastic move is that G.E. will be able to shed its designation as a "systemically important financial institution." Such status comes with high requirements to keep capital on hand, potentially limiting its financial returns.

So significant is the label that MetLife, the big insurer, has sued regulators to try to remove the designation.

"We're probably the most heavily regulated company in the world," Mr. Immelt said. But he added, "Regulation doesn't scare us."

The conglomerate has already begun discussions with government regulators, though is hoping to formally apply for the removal of the so-called Sifi designation by next year.

Tackling America's Police Abuse Epidemic [Michael Hirsh, Politico, April 10, 2015]

Outrage continues over the shooting of Walter Scott and the larger implications the incident has on the status of racial and criminal justice.

It was so automatic—so chillingly casual. That was the most frightening thing, say some criminal-justice experts, about Michael Slager's actions in North Charleston, S.C., last week. It's all there on the videotape: The victim, Walter Scott, starts to run, slowly. Without a pause, Officer Slager raises his gun and begins to fire at Scott's back. One shot. Two. Three. Four. Five. Six. Seven. Slager pauses briefly, then squeezes off the eighth shot. Scott crumples to the ground. Slager radios: "Shots fired and the subject is down. He took my Taser." Then Slager walks deliberately over to the mortally wounded man lying on his face, cuffs Scott's hands behind him but does not administer any aid. Equally casually, Slager drops what appears to be his Taser next to Scott's body.

The North Charleston video, which was replayed constantly on TV and video this week, put sharp new pressure on the federal government to increase its scrutiny of what many experts believe is endemic police abuse across the country, especially in black communities—an unseen decades-old abuse that is only now being rendered visible by a new generation of citizen-documentarians, average people equipped with cell-phone cameras.

"The secret is out now. We've pulled back the curtain," says Bowling Green University Professor Philip Stinson, author of Police Integrity Lost: A Study of Law Enforcement Officers Arrested, a recent survey that found that, apparently thanks to decades of inbred collaboration between local police departments, prosecutors and court systems—all of which tend to benefit mutually from arrest fees, ticket fines and so forth—almost no police are ever convicted of wrongly killing anyone or other abuses. By canvassing news databases, Stinson found only 59 arrests of on-duty police on charges of aggravated assault with a gun recorded in the entire country in the seven years from 2005 to 2011. Just 13 of those resulted in convictions.

“What’s so striking is the casualness of it,” says David Harris, a criminal law professor at the University of Pittsburgh and a leading authority on racial profiling, of the North Charleston incident. “For the officer it’s literally a walk in the park. It’s ‘Of course I’m gonna shoot him.’ He doesn’t pause, he doesn’t make any hesitation. What it says to me is that in the culture of that police department this is no problem. And everybody knows that without that video, that officer would be out driving around in a patrol car right now. The ongoing assumption, without that piece of film, would be ‘He threatened me and I had to defend myself.’”

The cases seem to keep multiplying: Ferguson, Staten Island, Cleveland, Las Vegas, Albuquerque, and more. Vanita Gupta, acting head of the Justice Department’s civil rights division, told POLITICO on Thursday that the DOJ does not yet plan an investigation into whether there is a pattern of police violence or abuse in North Charleston—as it did in Ferguson—but she says a “perfect storm” of incidents and outrage has made the relationship between law enforcement and communities “front and center in the country in the way they haven’t been until recent times.”

Despite more than doubling the number of its investigations into police departments over the past five fiscal years—to more than 20 nationwide now—the Department of Justice has failed to keep up with these police abuses and address them as a national problem, critics say. Typically summoned only in sporadic cases surrounded by public furor—like the shooting of Michael Brown in Ferguson—almost every DOJ probe has found a systemic problem of police and court abuse of minority communities, says Alec Karakatsanis, co-founder of Equal Justice Under Law, a nonprofit civil rights law firm.

But, he asks, what about the rest of the cities in the United States? “Where has the DOJ been in uncovering this? Where have the lawyers been? Where has the legal profession been? Under Obama, the DOJ has spent $80 million per year prosecuting medical marijuana cases, and not very much on crime by police.”

Indeed, out of the DOJ’s nearly $26 billion budget, the Civil Rights Division was allotted just $147 million in fiscal 2015; and of that, just $12.2 million was allotted to staff working on “effective and democratically accountable policing.” The Office on Violence against Women got $414 million. Drug enforcement got $2 billion. The prison system received $6.9 billion.

Only last month President Obama was in Selma, Ala., praising racial progress since the Bloody Sunday marches to Montgomery. But Sam Brooke of the Southern Poverty Law Center says that his organization found problems analogous to Ferguson’s in nearby Montgomery, where police set up harassing traffic stops in black neighborhoods. Such programs, he suggests, helped Montgomery consistently report municipal traffic ticket revenues three to four times that of other cities in Alabama.

Gupta, who worked on a number of police abuse cases as an attorney at the American Civil Liberties Union before taking over as acting head of the DOJ’s civil rights division six months ago, says it’s simply not true that the Justice Department has been out of step. “The number of investigations into police departments under this attorney general is vastly higher than what it has been in previous years,” she explains. “I think he has done more for criminal justice reform in recent years than I could have possibly hoped for … from really reinvigorating the civil rights division to the Smart on Crime initiative, his leadership has been quite transformative.”

Much of that work, she says, predates Ferguson.

Of its 20 investigations, the Justice Department has entered into 15 agreements with law enforcement agencies, including nine consent decrees, to correct abuses. Cities as varied as New Orleans, Seattle, Detroit and Albuquerque, as well as smaller municipalities like East Haven, Connecticut, and Warren, Ohio, have all agreed to consent decrees to address glaring police abuses. And under a new program started in 2011, its Office of Community Oriented Policing Services has offered technical assistance to bring police departments closer to their communities in towns and cities as far afield as Spokane, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Baltimore, Fayetteville, N.C., and Salinas, Calif., says the Justice Department’s Mary Brandenberger.

Still, among the Justice Department’s critics today is Gupta’s former boss, ACLU executive director Anthony Romero, who says that despite the promises made early on by an African-American president and his African-American attorney general, far too little has changed. “The Department of Justice of Eric Holder came later to criminal justice reform than I would have liked,” Romero says. And even when it did, announcing the Clemency Project in January 2014, it’s moved very slowly in reviewing files of federal prisoners—hardly more than 20 have been released. “We’re all kind of scratching our heads saying what’s taking them so long,” says Romero. On the contrary, the Justice Department has actually stood against early release of prisoners who have been found serving longer sentences than are warranted in other cases, he adds.

Others say Justice Department is doing the best it can with a problem that is still fundamentally a local and state issue. “They cannot be everywhere at once, and the DOJ comes in only if there is a pattern of practice or constitutional violation,” says the University of Pittsburgh’s Harris. “Given what they have in resources I think they do a spectacular job of finding the cases that matter the most.”

The systemic police abuse and violence, driven largely by a lack of accountability, often comes in the form of draconian policies of arrests and summons in minority communities, which are used as hapless cash cows for the police and justice system. It may have been no accident that Walter Scott was initially stopped by Officer Slager for an alleged broken brake light on his car, or that after the killing of Michael Brown in Ferguson, Mo., a federal investigation found that blacks there were being arrested, ticketed and fined into poverty.

According to a 2012 class-action lawsuit filed in Alabama, one private probation company used by 110 cities is used to extract revenue cost-free to the city—often from the poor who can’t afford good legal defense. Then, when they can’t pay, they’re charged huge fees. Danny Evans, the attorney who filed the lawsuit, says, “What happened in Ferguson is the blueprint for what’s going on in Alabama, and you have the same problem in Georgia, Florida and other states. These cities think they can turn their courts into revenue generators.”

A Justice Department probe into police abuses in Newark, N.J. found that 93 percent of all police stops of citizens were unjustified, says Karakatsanis. “If that’s correct, that’s 80,000 crimes. All of those stops are assaults committed by police.”

Police abuse is a problem that’s often politically complicated for the Justice Department to highlight, Karakatsanis says, because of its inherent conflict of interest in working with state and local law enforcement. As he says, “To view DOJ as a beacon of accountability is not correct. They depend on these cops to make arrests. All these local cops are part of DOJ-led federal task forces.”

Reliable data on police abuse is almost impossible to come by, and here too the federal government has failed to step up. In response to public outrage after the 1991 Rodney King beating, Congress passed a 1994 law that mandated an annual report on police violence. At the Justice Department’s request, the International Association of Police Chiefs (IAPC) conducted a pilot study. But according to John Firman, director of development of the IAPC, after a year the Justice Department shut it down after only 600 out of about 18,000 police departments in the country reported back. The law had no means of forcing cooperation, Firman added.

A Department of Justice spokesperson said that to comply with the 1994 law, the NIJ and Bureau of Justice Statistics later developed something called the Police Public Contact Survey, which is “designed to understand the nature and characteristics of citizen contacts with the police.” But that does nothing to ascertain when police use force incorrectly, says Stinson, who adds that he developed his own national database on police arrests and convictions using Google News’ search engine.

Now all of Washington may soon be forced to awaken to the issue, says the ACLU’s Romero. “We’ve never seen a moment of criminal justice like this,” he says. “We’ve been working on criminal justice for decades. The Miranda decision was our case. Police brutality was always a part of our experience. Now each of these incidents is a moment: Trayvon Martin. Michael Brown, South Carolina. The whole country just stops.”

The “Black Lives Matter” protests that swept the nation last fall and winter underscored the resonance of these issues in many communities. And, in Washington, D.C., a new left-right coalition is already emerging over skyrocketing financial and social costs of swelling prison and jail systems.

As Romero says, “I think it’s a moment where mainstream America is finally reckoning with the carnage of our criminal justice policy.”

Subject:	[big campaign] Tracking Clip of the Day: McCain brushes off 3 Mi Island and Chernobyl, says "we've never had a serious accident" on a nuclear sub Enjoy!

JOHN MCCAIN: I want to say a word about nuclear to you. And I'm very familiar with Three Mile Island, and I'm very familiar with Chernobyl. But I'm also familiar, as I hope you are too, that we've been sailing Navy ships around the world for 60 years with nuclear power plants on them, and we've never had an accident. We've never had a serious accident! So we need to store spent nuclear fuel, and we need to reprocess.

[...] You know, you pick up the paper and you listen to these various pundits and all that, and they says we can't solve the nuclear problem, we can't reprocess, we can't store it; we can't develop a electric car that'll take someone 200 miles or 100 miles before you have to plug it in. We can't. Everybody's saying we can't. That's not America! America's a country that has met and overcome every challenge we have ever faced, and we can do this one. We have the ability, innovation and the technology that we will become independent of foreign oil. (Town Hall; York, PA 08/12/08)

Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain's Cuban Independence Day Remarks in Miami, FL

Hello Big Campaign,

Just off the phone with our tracker Jacob who made it into today's event. Below are the notes from our call.

BIG HIGHLIGHTS: McCain attacks Obama on his policy toward Cuba, McCain attacks Obama and Clinton on free trade with Columbia; McCain answers questions about Guantanamo, Haiti, Iran, the Economy; in response to a question about Chavez, McCain says "I think that that doesn't mean that we go around invading countries, it doesn't mean we use force of arms."

Miami, FL: McCain's Cuban Independence Day Remarks

Background Details:
- For an event that was billed as public with no RSVP information, our tracker was surprised to find that at first only those with tickets were gaining entry into the event. Eventually, those without tickets were allowed in (as was our tracker). After some asking around, our tracker learned that tickets were previously handed out to local Republican groups and those with tickets were given priority seating.
- Charlie Black was there -- behind the risers, out of site of camera shots
- Meghan McCain was in attendance
- McCain was introduced in Spanish by a gentleman who was held prisoner and tortured under Castro's regime
- Press outlets included Good Magazine (which is based in New York); French outlet, France 24 was there; the usual national networks and traveling press; lots of local affiliates -- especially Latina TV and newspapers; Miami Herald also present
- Audience was approximately 3-400 in size. Most in the audience were Hispanic/Latino.
- McCain was frequently confused trying to locate questioners in the audience during the Q and A period
- McCain used three giant telemprompters

Speech Highlights:
Full Remarks: http://www.johnmccain.com/Informing/News/Speeches/c6208dbe-e868-4917-b4e6-f56c363d20c7.htm

Attack on Obama:
"Just a few years ago, Senator Obama had a very clear view on Cuba. When asked in a questionnaire about his policy toward Cuba, he answered: "I believe that normalization of relations with Cuba would help the oppressed and poverty-stricken Cuban people while setting the stage for a more democratic government once Castro inevitably leaves the scene." Now Senator Obama has shifted positions and says he only favors easing the embargo, not lifting it. He also wants to sit down unconditionally for a presidential meeting with Raul Castro. These steps would send the worst possible signal to Cuba's dictators – there is no need to undertake fundamental reforms, they can simply wait for a unilateral change in US policy. I believe we should give hope to the Cuban people, not to the Castro regime. My administration will press the Cuban regime to release all political prisoners unconditionally, to legalize all political parties, labor unions, and free media, and to schedule internationally monitored elections. The embargo must stay in place until these basic elements of democratic society are met."

Attack on Obama and Clinton:
"We have made progress toward this vision by expanding the benefits of free commerce, through NAFTA, the Central American Free Trade Agreement, and our free trade agreements with Peru and Chile. But the progress has stalled; our longstanding bipartisan commitment to hemispheric prosperity is crumbling. We see this most vividly in Barack Obama's and Hillary Clinton's opposition to the free trade agreement with Colombia. The failure of the Congress to take up and approve this agreement is a reminder why 80 percent of Americans think we are on the wrong track. Congress can find time to pass a pork-filled farm bill, but it cannot stir itself to support a key ally and further American prosperity."

NOTE: CNN reports that Obama will be giving a speech in response to McCain's attacks at 4pm EST today.

Question and Answer:
1) Q: Thanks MCCAIN for talking about Colombia and Uribe. Gives gift.
MCCAIN: Restates support of Colombia free trade agreement. Shouldn't turn down your best friend. They're helping us beat our enemies. Promises we will enact free trade agreement.

2) Q: On prosecution of Cuban officials, would that include Raul and Fidel Castro for their persecution of Cuban lawyers?
MCCAIN: Yes. But I would also have the AG investigate the plane that was shot down.

3) Q: Letter from a freedom fighter like you that needs to be helped. Please read it.
MCCAIN: I will read it absolutely immediately.

4) Q: We ask the Communist Cuban government for freedom. But there are 6 young people that because they hijacked a plane for liberty are in jail. Why are these young people in jail. We need your help for freedom.
MCCAIN: Thank you. I will learn more about it.

5) Q: As a POW – and we have several POWs here – what are we going to do for the freedoms and right to justice for prisoners in Guantamo? (BOOS)
MCCAIN: We have to move them to Leaventown. Some of these people are the most evil people you've ever encountered. But at the same time, there need to be procedures. I think they can be given trials, not the same trials American citizens receive. E.g. Nuremburg trials. Some people may be determined to get real trials. We haven't made enough progress.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

6) Q: What are you going to do to stop the communist governments from supporting terrorists?
MCCAIN: Get closer to countries who are our allies, e.g. Chile, Mexico and other Central American countries. Pay a lot of attention, treat them as equals.
- Free trade agreements / exchange of goods. Stop letting sugar come into our country at outrageous costs. Sugar-base ethanol can be imported from Brazil without tariffs. Hemispheric trade agreements. I don't believe in subsidies.
- Mexican economy, e.g. is still controlled by oligarchs. They'd be better off if they brought in more competition. We've got to have better economic conditions in those countries so people can live and work and get educated there.
- They are our friends. President should travel and have meetings with these countries. Emphasizes: those that are our friends, not those that are inimical to our values.

7) Q: Haiti could be a strong ally to US. Your thoughts on strengthening Haiti?
MCCAIN: I am by naturally optimistic about every country in the world. And I am optimistic about bettering conditions. But it's a tragic story. We've sent US troops in, OAS troops in, supplies in, we've held elections. Good nations of good will have tried to relieve the pressing problems. We've not been successful and there are thousands sitting in garbage dumps trying to find something to eat. I have faith in current govt of Haiti, but I've had faith in past governors and been disappointed. We need to keep the pressure on.
- MCCAIN defers to Mario and ?
- Other surrogate – the Haitian community here is one of the most hard-working and has been a great asset to US.
- MCCAIN: Haitians are industrious, hard-working, love their families and obviously deserve a lot better.

8) Q: couldn't hear question ... but McCain began talking about Iran
- Angry McCain: "Hold on! Hold on!"
- MCCAIN: It's dangerous to sit down and talk to our enemies. I won't do it. Obama will. There are times in the past where we've done it and there've been very serious consequences.

9) Q: The economy is bad. What are you going to do about it?
MCCAIN: First of all, we have to ensure people can stay in their own homes. That means they can go and get FHA 30-year loan. When sold years later, 1/3 go to owner, 1/3 to bank and 1/3 to lender. Obviously we don't want to reward the speculators, but we do have an obligation to help homeowners.
- We have to become independent of foreign oil. There are people who believe we can't. I'm sure there were people who believed we couldn't put a man on the moon or invent the internet. The technology and innovation are there. Nuclear power must be part of any solution. Right now there's about $500b / year when you buy gasoline, some of which goes into hands of terrorists. We can do it! We can't keep borrowing money from China. We've got to balance our budget; stop wasteful pork-barrel spending. I promise I will put us on the road to independence from foreign oil.

10) Q: In our Presidential agenda, what priority will political liberation of Cuba have, and human rights?
MCCAIN: Quotes Declaration of Independence – says right to life liberty and pursuit of happiness "by the way also applies to protection of human life" – we've gone to all corners of the world and shed blood and treasure usually in the pursuit of others' freedom. We should try all means necessary first, but military needs to be an option. Freeing political prisoners is important; so, too, is addressing human trafficking. Let me also add internet child porn – it's poisoning our families. Child Pornographers get online and legitimize each other. So we need to use our technological skills to track down and put in jail these most evil people.
- Said this doesn't mean we're going to go around invading other countries to make them more democratic -- we just apply pressure on them; extreme amounts of pressure

11) Q: In Peru, we have a problem with terrorism in connection with cocaine. What will you do to stop that?
MCCAIN: I'm aware that the problem is legitimate and that there is a disparity between the rich and the poor that exacerbates the problems. I think the present Peruvian government are working to address the problems – they have a lot of challenges, but things are getting better. We're building a good relationship from the US. The current Peruvian President is a good guy. The last one also seemed sincere, but didn't get as much done as liked. Would you agree? …

CONFUSED MCCAIN – can't find the questioner.

12) Q: Bridge of Young Cuban Professionals. What is going to happen to our property in Cuba?
- [Surrogate whispers in McCain's ear]
- MCCAIN: I believe that should be addressed by a freely elected government and legislation in Cuba.

13) Q: Says he wants Chavez out of Venezuela now rather than waiting 50 years like for Castro in Cuba. Thoughts?

MCCAIN: Gives long answer than ends ...
"The United States must always function on the principle that we believe that everyone has the rights have that we have guaranteed ourselves. And yes they don't sometimes. But that does not mean that we should abandon our struggles to see that all human beings are God's children and have certain rights that they were born with. And I think that that doesn't mean that we go around invading countries, it doesn't mean we use force of arms. It means, though, that we put as much pressure as we can where we can to improve the lot of human beings throughout the world, and that's in that country, too."

Emails Clinton Said Were Kept Could Be Lost (The New York Times)
By Michael S. Schmidt and Julie Hirschfeld Davis
March 14, 2015
The New York Times

WASHINGTON -- As Hillary Rodham Clinton this week defended her use of a personal email account to conduct State Department business, she emphasized that because she was corresponding frequently with other department officials on their government accounts, the messages were preserved on government servers.

But the State Department disclosed on Friday that until last month it had no way of routinely preserving senior officials' emails. Instead, the department relied on individual employees to decide if certain emails should be considered public records, and if so, to move them onto a special record-keeping sever, or print them out and manually file them for preservation.

This patchwork system, reflecting a broader confusion and slowness throughout the government as federal agencies struggle to catch up with the digital age, raises the possibility that some emails from Mrs. Clinton to other State Department officials may have been lost altogether.

In a briefing with reporters on Friday, Jen Psaki, a spokeswoman for the State Department, acknowledged that the system in place under Mrs. Clinton was ''imperfect,'' and said the department was still trying to establish a comprehensive document retention program.

In February, the State Department began using a system that automatically keeps the emails of the department's highest ranking officials -- like the deputy secretary of state, and under and assistant secretaries. Secretary of State John Kerry's emails have been automatically retained since around the time he took office in 2013.

Regulations issued by the National Archives in October 2009 said that agencies where employees were free to use private email systems ''must ensure that federal records sent or received on such systems are preserved in the appropriate agency record-keeping system.''

In a news conference she held on Tuesday, and backup documents that her staff circulated the same day, Mrs. Clinton argued that she had complied with those record-keeping rules.

''It was my practice to communicate with State Department and other government officials on their dot-gov accounts so those emails would be automatically saved in the State Department system to meet record-keeping requirements, and that, indeed, is what happened,'' Mrs. Clinton said at the news conference. She said she had used the personal account for convenience because she did not want to carry two cellphones.

The State Department disclosure is likely to bring intense scrutiny to the process that Mrs. Clinton and her lawyers used in deciding late last year which of the roughly 60,000 emails from her personal account should be considered work-related and turned over to the State Department. That is because the State Department servers -- given the system that was in place -- appear to lack comprehensive backup records of the former secretary of state's correspondence with other officials.

A spokesman for Mrs. Clinton did not return an email, call or text seeking comment.

An Obama administration directive in 2012 mandates that agencies must devise a system for retaining and preserving email records electronically by the end of 2016, but many agencies' current practice is to save emails by printing them out and storing them in files.

The Department of Health and Human Services began automatically archiving and saving the emails of all senior officials and political appointees only in December, said Kevin Griffis, a spokesman for the department.

There is also no consistent system throughout the federal agencies for determining which emails should be saved. The White House has strict requirements dating back two decades that no emails be discarded, but federal agencies are in charge of setting their own policies for determining which emails constitute government records worthy of preservation and which ones may be deleted.

''It really is chaos across the government in terms of what agencies do, what individuals do, and people understand that they can decide what they save and what they don't,'' said Patrice McDermott, the director of the transparency watchdog group OpenTheGovernment.org. ''If you leave it up to the agency, some are going to behave properly and take it seriously, and some are going to see it as carte blanche to whitewash the record.''

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

What is clear is that email poses a unique problem for government agencies, which are required under the law to preserve anything that relates to official business. ‘‘It doesn’t matter on what medium or in what form it occurs,’’ said Gary M. Stern, the general counsel for the National Archives and Records Administration, the agency in charge of preserving federal documents.

But, he said, ‘‘There’s such a challenge with email, because everyone gets a couple of hundred a day and nobody has the time to go through and say, ‘Is this a record, or is it not?’ ‘‘

President Obama signed legislation late last year requiring government officials who use personal email addresses for official business to bring those records into the government within 20 days. Before that, the National Archives and Records Administration simply required those messages at some point to be provided to the government.

The vagueness of federal guidelines have caused agencies, cabinet members and other senior officials to forge their own policies and practices, sometimes getting them into trouble.

Lisa P. Jackson, Mr. Obama’s first Environmental Protection Agency administrator used ‘‘Richard Windsor’’ -- a combination of her dog’s name and a New Jersey town -- for her electronic alias. Republicans on the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee charge that she had created the alias to ‘‘hide’’ her actions, part of what they described in a September 2013 report as a pattern of ‘‘obfuscation’’ and a ‘‘culture of secrecy and evasion.’’

Ms. Jackson said the alias was a matter of convenience and practicality, arguing that she had complied with requirements that any message relating to E.P.A. business would be captured on the agency’s system.

‘‘You’ll find this with any cabinet head,’’ Tom Reynolds, an E.P.A. spokesman, said of generic government email addresses. ‘‘You just can’t use those because you’d just get inundated with emails. It’s not pragmatic.’’

The White House adopted its strict email rules during the Clinton administration after a federal court determined that White House emails -- until then considered the same as disposable sheets on a phone-message pad -- should be treated as government records.

As part of a settlement in that case, a little-known staff secretary to President Bill Clinton drafted a memo laying out the new policy: Emails had to be preserved and external networks should not be used because those messages would not be retained.

The aide’s name was John D. Podesta. ‘‘Podesta helped push the White House essentially into the digital age and created electronic archiving,’’ said Thomas S. Blanton, of the National Security Archive.

In January, Mr. Podesta left his post as a senior counselor to Mr. Obama. His anticipated new job: chairman of Mrs. Clinton’s expected presidential campaign.

Hillary Seems Tired, Not Hungry (The Wall Street Journal)
By Peggy Noonan
March 14, 2015
The Wall Street Journal

Maybe we're not stuck in Scandal Land.

For a while I've assumed Hillary Clinton would run for her party's nomination and be a formidable candidate in the general election. After Tuesday's news conference I'm not so sure.

Did she seem to you a happy, hungry warrior? She couldn't make eye contact with her questioners, and when she did she couldn't sustain it. She looked at the ceiling and down at notes, trying, it seemed, to stick to or remember scripted arguments. She was shaky. She couldn't fake good cheer and confidence. It is seven years since she ran for office. You could see it.

Her claims -- she stayed off the State Department email system for "convenience," she thought "it would be easier to carry just one device," her server "contains personal communications from my husband and me" -- were so transparent, so quickly disprovable. Minutes later journalists were posting earlier statements in which she said she carries two devices, and The Wall Street Journal's report saying Bill has sent only two emails in his life.

This wasn't high-class spin. These were not respectable dodges. They didn't make you grudgingly tip your hat at a gift for duplicity. I could almost feel an army of oppo people of both parties saying, "You can do better than that, Hillary!"

This wasn't the work of a national, high-grade political-response team, it was the thrown-together mess of someone who knew she was guilty of self-serving actions, who didn't herself believe what she was saying, who didn't think the press would swallow it, and who didn't appear to care.

She didn't look hungry for the battle, she looked tired of the battle.

Everyone knows what the scandal is. She didn't want a paper trail of her decisions and actions as secretary of state. She didn't want to be questioned about them, ever. So she didn't join the government's paper-trail system, in this case the State Department's official email system, which retains and archives records. She built her own private system and got to keep complete control of everything she'd done or written. She no doubt assumed no one outside would ask and no one inside would insist -- she's Hillary, don't mess with her.

She knew the story might blow but maybe it wouldn't, worth the chance considering the payoff: secrecy. If what she did became public she'd deal with it then. When this week she was forced to, she stonewalled: "The server will remain private."

Is it outrageous? Of course. Those are U.S. government documents she concealed and destroyed. The press is not covering for her and hard questions are being asked because everyone knows what the story is. It speaks of who she is and how she will govern. Everyone knows it.

She knows it too.

At the news conference she seemed like a 20th-century figure in a 21st-century world. Her critics complain it's the 1990s returning but it isn't, it's only the dark side of the '90s without the era's peace and prosperity.

Mrs. Clinton is said to be preparing to announce her candidacy for the presidency in three to four weeks. But did that look like the news conference of a candidate about to announce? It lacked any air of confidence or certitude. For a year the press has been writing about the burgeoning Clinton Shadow Campaign. Where's the real one?

Defenses of Mrs. Clinton were ad hoc, improvised, flat-footed. It all looks disorderly, as if no one's in charge, no one has drawn clear lines of responsibility or authority. We hear about loyalists, intimates, allies, pals, hangers-on, Friends of Hill. People buzz around her like bees on random paths to the queen.

In 2008 Barack Obama had impressive, disciplined people around him -- David Axelrod, Robert Gibbs, David Plouffe. I remember thinking at the time that they were something unusual in politics: normal. Hillary has people like David Brock, a right-wing hit man who became a left-wing hit man. Who's he supposed to do outreach to, the other weirdos?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Is this thing really happening? Is the much-vaunted campaign coming together?

After the news conference I thought what I never expected to think: Maybe she doesn't really want this. Maybe that's what this incompetence is meant to be signaling.

Here I will speculate, but imagine being Hillary Clinton right now:

Her mother, the rock of her life, died in 2011. In the past years she's had health issues. She's tired, having worked at the highest levels of American life the past 25 years. She's in the middle of a scandal and, being Hillary, knows that others might pop along the way.

Add this: Maybe she thought her ideological hunger, which was real, would sustain her throughout her life, and it hasn't.

Maybe what happened to her, in part, is the homes of her Manhattan mega-donors. She's been in the grand townhouses and Park Avenue apartments since 1992. She'd go in and be met and she saw what they had. Beauty. Ease. Fine art of a particular, modern sort, the kind that is ugly, that reminds its owners that just because they're rich doesn't mean they don't understand that life is hard, painful, incoherent. It is protective, cautionary, abstract and costs $20 million a picture.

But what lives they have! Grace and comfort and they don't have to worry about the press, they don't have to feel on the run, they don't have to press the flesh with nobodies.

She'd like those things! But she went into "public service" and had to live on some bum-squat-Egypt Southern governor's salary.

She wanted what they have. They're her friends, no more talented than she. But they went to Wall Street and are oozing in dough. She stayed in the lane she was in. And she figures she missed out on the prosperity her husband presided over.

She has her causes -- women's rights, income inequality. But she can advance them in other ways.

Maybe she isn't really hungry enough for the presidency anymore. And maybe she doesn't have illusions anymore. She's funded by Wall Street. Her opponent will be funded by Wall Street.

Maybe she's of two minds about what she wants. But it's not really hunger that's propelling her now, its Newton's law of inertia: Objects in motion tend to stay in motion.

Maybe she thinks about another line of work, a surprising fourth act. She likes to be served, be admired, be taken care of by staff. But you can get those things without being president. If you are wealthy, and she is now -- and maybe that was the purpose of all those six-figure speeches -- you can get those things easily.

Maybe she doesn't, really, want to run. Maybe she's not sure she can. Or maybe she'll go for it: It's what she's been going toward all her life.

Maybe Democrats who saw that news conference will sense an opening and jump in. There's the myth of the empty bench, but it won't be empty if she leaves it. That's another law of physics: Nature abhors a vacuum.

We all talk so much about the presidency and who's got the best chance. Maybe it's not Hillary. Maybe that's over and no one knows, even her.

Will Hillary Clinton Follow Democrats on Capital Gains? (The New York Times)
By Josh Barro
March 14, 2015
The New York Times

As my colleague David Leonhardt notes, one of the big policy questions for Hillary Clinton is how eager she is to tax the rich. But this isn't just a question of the top rate on wages. If she runs for president, it will be very interesting to see whether Mrs. Clinton takes a position substantially to Barack Obama's right on capital gains taxes, as she did in 2008.

In a debate in April of that year, Mrs. Clinton said she would not raise the capital gains rate above 20 percent "if I raised it at all." At the time, the top rate was 15 percent, as a result of the Bush tax cuts. Ms. Clinton's position was in line with the economic policies of Bill Clinton's administration, which called for much higher tax rates on wage income than capital income for high earners. In 1997, Mr. Clinton signed a law that cut the top capital gains tax rate from 28 percent to 20; in 1993, he had raised the top tax rate on ordinary income from 31 percent to 39.6 percent, and imposed a Medicare tax on high earners that effectively pushed their top tax rates above 40.

Mr. Obama ran in 2008 as an advocate of a large capital gains tax increase. In a 2007 speech, he said he would "adjust the top dividends and capital gains rate to something closer to — but no greater than — the rates Ronald Reagan set in 1986." The rate set in 1986 was 28 percent, so this position left the door open to a near-doubling of the top capital gains tax rate.

President Obama has delivered on that promise: The Affordable Care Act created an additional 3.8 percent tax on capital gains for high earners, and the so-called fiscal cliff deal of 2013 added another 5 points to the rate, so the top tax rate on capital gains has gone from 15 percent in 2008 to 23.8 percent today, higher than the red line Mrs. Clinton set. In his most recent budget, Mr. Obama proposed to further increase the rate to 28 percent.

Economists tend to advocate lower taxes on capital on the grounds that investors are more likely to be driven away by high taxes than workers are, and because much capital income is subjected to corporate income tax before the capital gains tax is applied.

But the shift among Democrats toward supporting higher taxes on capital isn't surprising, given the party's increased skepticism of Wall Street and the focus on inequality. While high taxes on the salaries of high earners can increase collections from law firm partners and senior business executives (and collect a lot of revenue in the process), the wealthiest Americans tend to draw their income from investments. So tax policies that aim at the extreme top of the income distribution will have to focus on capital.

Jared Bernstein, a senior fellow at the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities who formerly served as Vice President Joe Biden's top economic adviser, attributed the shift among Democrats to increased frustration with income shifting: labor income being recharacterized as capital income in order to take advantage of tax preferences.

"The only tax rule of thumb I'm 100 percent certain of is if your tax code provides preferential treatment to any kind of income, that's the kind of income a lot of rich people will all the sudden have a lot more of," he said in an email.

Since Marco Rubio has endorsed a plan that would cut capital gains taxes to zero, the 2016 campaign may offer a very sharp divide on the question of how investment should be taxed and how progressive the tax code should be, especially if Mrs. Clinton follows Mr. Obama's lead on the issue. A spokesman for Mrs. Clinton declined to comment about whether her views had changed since 2008.

Hillarynomics: Big Policy Questions for Clinton (The New York Times)
By David Leonhardt
March 14, 2015
The New York Times

Barring an unexpected economic boom over the next year and a half, the 2016 Democratic nominee for president will probably not base her campaign around being President Obama's heir.

The economic picture remains too muddled and the country too polarized. A candidate who can claim to fix Washington will be in a better position than one who tries to explain or defend the last eight years.

Hillary Clinton — still the overwhelming favorite to be that nominee, in spite of the recent mess over her use of a private email account while she was secretary of state — will especially need to find ways to project freshness. And pundits will no doubt scour her remarks and campaign proposals looking for such differences.

So it's worth acknowledging something now: Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama have far more similarities than differences, especially on economic matters.

They both consider the stagnant incomes of recent decades to be a defining national issue. They both want to address the stagnation through a combination of government programs and middle-class tax cuts. They both see climate change as a serious threat. They both think workers have too little power and corporations too much.

They both are to the political left of every single Republican in Congress. They are also to the right of many liberals — friendlier to markets and global trade, more comfortable with incremental change.

Yet for all their similarities, Hillarynomics (the phrase "Clintonomics" is already taken) and Obamanomics will not be identical.

In the coming months, Mrs. Clinton is likely to begin releasing her economic policy proposals. They will no doubt be devised to address the fact that, as she has said, "it feels harder and harder to get ahead."

Along the way, she will need to deal with some thorny policy questions that don't have obvious answers for a Democrat. My goal here is to lay out the biggest of those questions. Mrs. Clinton's answers to them will begin to define Hillarynomics.

Taxing the rich. For two decades, Democrats have been largely united on taxes. Bill Clinton raised the top marginal tax rate (which now applies to couples making more than $450,000) to 39.6 percent. Mr. Obama spent years fighting — and ultimately succeeding — to raise it back to that level, from a 35 percent rate.

But now the issue gets trickier for Democrats.

Total federal taxes on top earners are already near the top of their narrow range over the last 35 years. But pretax inequality has soared during that time. And federal tax rates are still much lower than they were in the 1950s, '60s and '70s.

Have the politics of inequality changed to the point that Mrs. Clinton will propose a top marginal rate above 40 percent? Or will she instead propose more subtle tax increases, such as reducing tax breaks, as Mr. Obama recently has?

Either way, she seems likely to push for middle- and low-income tax cuts. As a result, she will need either to propose further tax increases on high earners — or to acknowledge that her plan would increase the budget deficit.

Bargaining power. Top Democrats spent much of the 1990s moving to the right on economics. They have spent the last decade inching back to the left. The move isn't really about the personal views of Mr. Obama and the Clintons. Instead, it's a reaction to the great wage slowdown of the last 15 years, which has left the party looking for more aggressive ways to address inequality.

Take the party's stance toward labor unions. Democrats who previously were wary of aligning too closely with unions are now searching for ways to strengthen workers' bargaining power. The Commission on Inclusive Prosperity, a group with close ties to Mrs. Clinton, recently made "expanding worker voice" one of its centerpiece recommendations. "If you made it less easy for employers to fire union organizers, you would meaningfully impact the amount of collective bargaining," Lawrence Summers, the former Treasury secretary, said.

Although labor leaders support many of Mr. Obama's decisions, they also hope that the next Democratic nominee will go further — on enacting overtime-pay rules, on using the bully pulpit to criticize corporations and on appointing labor-friendly advisers. "We have learned through bitter experience that it really matters who makes up a president's economic team," said Damon Silvers, a top A.F.L.-C.I.O. official.

Schools and tests. Mr. Obama and his education secretary, Arne Duncan, have pursued a decidedly centrist course, pushing states to demand more accountability from schools. The approach can claim significant successes, including a rising high school graduation rate.

Yet many students, parents and teachers have also grown frustrated by the amount of standardized testing. Some of this frustration stems from the fact that accountability isn't fun. Many school officials would rather be left alone to judge their own performance. Other aspects of the frustration, though, are more substantive.

A central challenge for the post-Obama Education Department will be finding a way to make accountability more popular. The obvious answer probably involves fewer, better tests — but creating such tests isn't easy. The next president will have some big decisions to make.

Medical costs. The sharp slowdown in the growth rate of health spending — which has reduced the federal deficit — has been one of the happiest economic surprises of the Obama years. It stems in part from efforts within medicine that predated his presidency and in part from the 2010 health care bill. But the battle to reduce wasteful medical spending is still in its very early stages.

Sylvia Mathews Burwell, the secretary of health and human services, has set a goal that at least 50 percent of Medicare payments be based on quality, not quantity, of care by 2018 — which is two years into the next administration.

Right now, many outcome-based payment systems are voluntary. To get to 50 percent, notes Peter Orszag, the former Obama budget director, Washington will probably need to force more hospitals and doctors into such systems. And because accountability isn't fun, many are sure to squawk about it.

If you want to judge how serious Mrs. Clinton is about the long-term budget deficit, keep an eye on the signals she sends about health costs. Nothing affects the deficit more than health spending.

Style. This list obviously is not an exhaustive one. Ultimately, though, the biggest differences between Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama may revolve around style.

In the 2008 campaign, she criticized him for his naïveté about the potential for major bipartisan compromises. "We've got to be really clear that this is a struggle, and this is just not a moment where everybody will see the world the way it should be seen and come together to solve these problems," she told me then. "There are powerful forces at work in our society."

Mr. Obama has since moved toward Mrs. Clinton's view, more willing simply to defy Republicans when compromise isn't an option. But many Democrats continue to believe that if the party holds the White House in 2016, it will be better served by a harder-edged approach to leadership and negotiation. (And many Obama advisers roll their eyes at such criticism as vague wishful thinking.)

Whatever the truth, Mrs. Clinton's view about these questions now matters more than anyone else's in the Democratic Party. The most influential critic of a president is the one who succeeds him, and she still seems to be the only Democrat with a good chance to do so.

Hillary Clinton's fear of the trail (Politico)
By Glenn Thrush
March 13, 2014
Politico

This was the week when Hillary Clinton's highest aspiration, being president, collided with her deepest fear — actually running for president.

It's not that Clinton craves a coronation, people close to her say, it's just that she wants to forestall her leap into the sulfurous political lava as long as possible. The chaotic indignity of Tuesday's press conference on her use of a private email server as Secretary of State did nothing to change that opinion, or convince her to push up the campaign start date.

The firestorm over the emails – and earlier stories about the solicitation of foreign donations at the Clinton family charitable foundation have rattled the expanding crew of new operatives signing up for 2016 who haven't experienced the maelstrom of a Clinton presidential campaign before. But the only two opinions that really count come from Hillary and Bill Clinton, and – despite the carping of Democrats inside and outside their own circle — they harbor few regrets about the way things have gone down so far.

"Eighteen months ago who would imagined Hillary Clinton would have zero competition in the primaries? That's pretty good, right?" said one longtime Clinton insider, reflecting the prevailing view in the no-rush camp, which includes the Clintons and their longtime consigliore Cheryl Mills.

"Everybody has an incentive to start this campaign – the staff, the consultants who are working for nothing and want to get paid, you guys in the media – everybody except Hillary Clinton," the person added. "The goal here is to make this the shortest campaign possible. The emails thing didn't change that."

The danger, of course, is that the 20th Century political victors are ignoring 21st Century political reality and inviting the American body politic play by their idiosyncratic set of rules — as they did by deciding to use Bill Clinton's private server as a conduit for Hillary Clinton's government correspondence. Moreover, as the press conference proved, it's put her in the familiar — and bizarre — position of entering the 2016 campaign as both the strongest non-incumbent ever to seek the office and a wounded, vulnerable frontrunner.

"She'll get past these sort of little dust-ups, but we really have to start having a conversation," says Iowa Democratic operative Tavis Hall, expressing the growing anxiousness of battleground Democrats eager for Clinton to hoist a flag to rally around.

The response to the emails controversy was hampered by the lack of a campaign team — and the candidate's reluctance to share details of her personal email server with the people who could defend her; Clinton's people were rebuffed by surrogates who refused to appear on TV because they weren't given details about the system, according to two potential surrogates interviewed by POLITICO. Moreover, it took eight days for Clinton to reluctantly agree to appear before the media — and only then at the urging of her young campaign manager Robbie Mook and eminence-grise campaign chairman John Podesta.

"It's clear they lack an apparatus. She's a candidate without a campaign." Robert Gibbs, a former White House press secretary under President Obama told The Washington Post. And former Obama strategist David Axelrod told MSNBC he thought the campaign's sluggish response on the emails story was the result of a "lack of answers from the Clinton campaign, or the nascent campaign."

Last September, another Obama stalwart, 2008 campaign manager David Plouffe, was summoned to Clinton's home in Washington for a consultation with the would-be candidate. His advice? Start assembling a campaign apparatus as quickly as possible, set them to work immediately — and more, importantly, settle on a robust rationale for the campaign not based merely on her celebrity or gender.

She's mostly ignored that advice — and details about her personnel moves have proven far more plentiful than details about her policy plans, or her rationale for seeking the job, apart from vague references to her experience and a new willingness to emphasize her role as a gender trailblazer.

Yet, in some respects, Clinton has showed a willingness to change her basic approach as a candidate. Late last year, she enlisted another Obama mainstay, pollster Joel Benenson, to oversee a sprawling polling operation, supervise messaging and hire a communications team. Benenson's philosophy in assembling the team was to avoid the hard-edged, confrontational approach of the Clinton 2008 war room — and he enlisted current White House Communications Director Jennifer Palmieri, a veteran Democrat operative with deep relationships in the media, to head the team. “She’s hiring people who believe in engaging reporters, not beating the shit out of them,” said one person close to Clinton.

But campaigns invariably reflect the attitude of the candidate, and Clinton — scarred deeply by the Whitewater and Lewinsky battles of the 1990s — still thinks of the press corps as hostile adversaries who often carry the water of GOP opposition researchers. “Look, she hates you. Period. That’s never going to change,” a 2008 Clinton veteran told me when I asked if her attitude towards the media had evolved.

All of this has fostered a deep reluctance to formally jump into the 2016 fray, even as the political and journalistic bullets have started whizzing past. As recently as December, people close to her say, Clinton was still seriously considering not running in 2016 — at least that what she was telling friends. And she didn’t start reading the pile of campaign memos aides and would-be staffers had compiled for her until Christmas, when she started telling people she would probably take the plunge, according to several aides I spoke to.

She approached the press conference with a sense of even-tempered resignation, they told POLITICO, with little of the finger-pointing from staff, or the cold silences on conference calls that characterized her reactions to bad news in 2008. Mostly, she was ticked off that the email story overshadowed the release of a report, partly funded by the Clinton foundation, on the educational and economic progress of woman around the world (Tellingly, she was particularly annoyed that The New York Times, a paper she believes she has battled for decades, didn’t write about the “No Ceilings” report more extensively).

Yet for close observers of Clinton, Tuesday’s performance offered the glimmer of a new more conciliatory approach, and a little more ease in the campaign klieg lights.

“Looking back, it would’ve been better for me to use two separate phones and two email accounts,” she told reporters with a sheepish smile. “I thought using one device would be simpler, and obviously, it hasn’t worked out that way.”

Several people close to Clinton pointed out that those remarks — widely criticized for garbling the technical details in question — represented a change from her behavior in 2008, when Clinton was almost universally unwilling to admit fault for fear of being labeled indecisive (In the last campaign, it took her months, for instance, to concede that she had not actually flown into a live-fire zone during a trip to the Balkans in the 1990s).

But this week Clinton agreed, without complaint, when advisers suggested she concede that she made a mistake in using her private email account. To one veteran of Hillaryland, it was part of a welcome trend of humanizing contrition: Last summer she issued a semi-apology last summer for suggesting she was “dead broke” upon leaving the White House in 2000.

“Maybe things will be different this time when she finally gets in,” the person said. “Or maybe not.”

Hillary Clinton staffs up in New Hampshire (The Washington Post)

By Anne Gearan

March 13, 2015

Washington Post

Hillary Rodham Clinton has lined up three Democratic staffers credited with helping New Hampshire Gov. Jeanne Shaheen (D) win re-election last fall to lead the emerging Clinton campaign operation in that state, Democratic officials said.

Clinton is expected to formally announce her presidential campaign next month, but top staff are already unofficially on the job in at least two states with early primaries, as well as in New York City where Clinton plans to house her campaign headquarters.

In New Hampshire, which has the nation's second nominating contest, Democrats familiar with the hires said Clinton has selected Mike Vlacich, who ran Shaheen's 2014 reelection, to be the state director. Harrell Kirstein, who was Shaheen's 2014 communications director, will reprise that role for Clinton, and Shaheen political director Kari Thurman will be a senior political aide in New Hampshire, the Democrats said.

Democrats who confirmed the hires asked not to be identified because Clinton has not yet announced her candidacy.

The three New Hampshire hires were first reported Friday by the Associated Press, the Boston Globe and WMUR.

Shaheen's victory was a bright spot in an otherwise bleak midterm year for Democrats. The race was closer than expected, with Brown taking 51 percent of the vote to former Massachusetts Sen. Scott Brown's 48 percent.

Shaheen is close to Clinton and the two are longtime political allies. The governor expected to play a big role in Clinton's New Hampshire campaign. Clinton campaigned for Shaheen, including a rally the weekend before the election that marked Clinton's final stump appearance for the cycle.

In Iowa, which holds the first contest of 2016, Clinton's campaign is expected to be headed by Matt Paul, a political adviser to former Gov. Tom Vilsack. Brenda Cole, a seasoned Iowa campaign aide, will also play a senior role, CNN reported Friday.

Clinton Takes Campaign Step With New Hampshire Hiring (The New York Times)

March 13, 2015

New York Times

CONCORD, N.H. — In a direct step toward a run for the presidency, Hillary Rodham Clinton is hiring political staff to guide her Democratic primary efforts in the early voting state of New Hampshire.

The team-in-waiting is made up of senior operatives in Sen. Jeanne Shaheen's successful re-election bid in 2014, when she survived a Republican wave that knocked out many other Democrats. Mike Vlacich, Shaheen's campaign manager, will serve as Clinton's state director, said a New Hampshire Democrat with knowledge of the move. The Democrat spoke on condition of anonymity because people will not be officially hired until Clinton announces a campaign.

Clinton is expected to announce her 2016 White House bid in the next few weeks, a race that presents few primary rivals at this point, in contrast to the crowded Republican contest.

The former secretary of state has been trying to dig out from a controversy over her use of a private email account and server after acknowledging days ago that she should have avoided relying exclusively on personal email while at the State Department. Word of her hirings in New Hampshire came as former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, expected to be a leading contender for the Republican nomination, is in the state on his first visit in years.

In addition to Vlacich, Clinton is turning to Kari Thurman, Shaheen's political director, and Harrell Kirstein, Shaheen's campaign communications director, to serve in the same functions for her, the source said. Shaheen on Friday wished the three of them well "in their next venture," praised their service to her and described Vlacich as "a dedicated public servant and a brilliant political strategist."

Clinton won the 2008 New Hampshire primary and many prominent Democrats in the state are already backing her assumed campaign. Democrats recently told The Associated Press that she has begun retaining staff in the early voting states of Iowa and South Carolina as well.

Clinton returned to New Hampshire last fall for the first time since 2008, campaigning for Shaheen and Gov. Maggie Hassan before the 2014 midterm election. She and her husband, Bill, have maintained friendships and political alliances in New Hampshire that date to the early 1990s.

Vlacich emerged from the 2014 election as one of the most successful Democratic operatives in the country, helping Shaheen beat back a challenge from Republican Scott Brown, a former senator from Massachusetts, when Democrats lost competitive races across the country. Vlacich's wife, Liz Purdy, is also a Clinton confidante, serving as a top adviser to Clinton's 2008 bid in the state.

"Mike is the kind of person who can just pull activists together," said Peter Burling, a former Democratic National Committeeman from New Hampshire. "I think that's going to be an essential part of this next campaign, getting Democrats to come out and participate."

Robby Mook, Clinton's likely campaign manager, also has ties to Shaheen, serving as her 2008 campaign chief.

In Iowa, Clinton’s campaign is expected to be run by Matt Paul, a longtime adviser to Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack, a former Iowa governor. South Carolina Democrats have told AP that Clinton will again hire Democratic consulting firm Sunrise Communications, owned by Darrell Jackson, a state senator and pastor.

Clinton Said to be Close to Choosing Brooklyn for Campaign Headquarters (The New York Times)

By Maggie Haberman

March 13, 2015

New York Times

Hillary Rodham Clinton's aides are close to locking in space for a campaign headquarters in Brooklyn, people familiar with the decision confirmed.

Mrs. Clinton's aides are looking at the Metro Tech complex in Brooklyn Heights, two people with knowledge of the plans said. Other options, including one in the Long Island City section of Queens, fell through.

Mrs. Clinton's team initially looked at space in White Plains, nearer to her home in Chappaqua. They then moved their focus to New York City, in part because the commute for many of her top advisers to Westchester County seemed prohibitive. Options in Manhattan were considered, but ultimately they chose Brooklyn. The selection was first reported by CNN.

A spokesman for Mrs. Clinton did not immediately respond to an email.

Brooklyn is where the city's progressive mayor, Bill de Blasio, used to work as a city councilman, and his administration tried to bring the 2016 Democratic National Convention to the borough (losing out to Philadelphia). But Brooklyn has also become almost as expensive to find affordable housing as Manhattan, something many potential staff members are surely worried about.

Hillary Clinton set on Brooklyn HQ, eyes April launch (CNN)

By Dan Merica and Jeff Zeleny

March 13, 2015

CNN

Washington (CNN)As Hillary Clinton's expected April presidential launch nears, her already sizable campaign apparatus is moving into place and getting close to signing a lease for office space in Brooklyn.

Clinton and her team have recently coalesced around the New York borough, according to multiple sources, and are nearing a deal for office space at the MetroTech complex in Brooklyn Heights.

A lease has not been signed yet, according to a source with knowledge, but very serious negations are ongoing and the Clinton team settled on Brooklyn after eying other locations around New York City. She ran her 2008 presidential campaign from Virginia, just across the Potomac river from Washington.

The Clinton team is still preparing for an April announcement, several top Democratic aides, donors and supporters say, although the precise date still remains up for discussion. Dozens of campaign staffers, who have been sworn to secrecy after being notified that they were being hired, have been told to report to New York by late March.

Clinton has been conducting personal interviews with several potential advisers at her home in Chappaqua, while her top aides have been assembling a communications, fundraising, political and social media team.

Clinton supporters see a number of benefits in Brooklyn, including ease of attracting talent to the New York area and the fact that it's known for ethnic and socio-economic diversity.

On the downside, some Clinton supporters have expressed concern with being closely associated with New York City, and in particular Wall Street, which is only two subway stops away.

The campaign headquarters also creates a logistical challenge for staffers in a city of high rents. The campaign is asking supporters in New York if anyone who can open their doors and take in young workers.

The email controversy that has engulfed the Clinton operation for nearly two weeks did not accelerate the timing of her presidential announcement, several top Democrats said, but it did underscore the need for a full-scale campaign apparatus to deal with the incoming criticism.

"I think folks are realizing now more than ever that they need to announce earlier rather than later," a source with knowledge told CNN. "The whole argument that she is left undefended without an official apparatus around her just became magnified 100 times over with this email issue."

The scale and scope of the campaign will ultimately reach into the hundreds, but aides said it would grow gradually.

A larger grassroots operation is planned for Iowa, site of the first-in-the nation caucuses, where campaign workers will train over the next several months before being dispatched to battleground states. New Hampshire, home of the first Democratic primary, will also be used as a training ground for field and political staffers.

While Clinton isn't expecting an aggressive Democratic primary contest, advisers said they realized they have little time to waste and are approaching the race as though they already have a dozen challengers -- namely the prospective Republican candidates who are trying to distinguish themselves by forcefully criticizing Clinton.

Because of that undisputed frontrunner status, though, Clinton and her team have had their pick of top talent around the country without having to fight with other campaigns.

In New Hampshire, the nascent presidential campaign plans to hire three advisers to Sen. Jeanne Shaheen's reelection bid in 2014 to lead Clinton's New Hampshire operation, according to Granite State Democrats.

Mike Vlacich, a longtime New Hampshire operative, will be Clinton's state director, Kari Thurman, the Shaheen campaign's political director, will fill the same role for Clinton, and Harrell Kirstein, the Shaheen campaign's communications director, will run Clinton's communications shop.

The all-but-announced campaign has also tapped Iowa leadership.

Matt Paul, a longtime adviser to former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, will lead the Clinton's Hawkeye operation. Paul, who currently serves as a top adviser to Vilask at the department of Agriculture, is returning to Iowa for the job and is expected to place in place by the end of the month, according to Democrats in the state.

Joining Paul in Iowa will be Brenda Cole, a longtime Iowa operative, and Lily Adams, currently the deputy communications director at the Democratic National Committee, according to Democrats in the state. Adams will runs Clinton's communications shop in the Hawkeye State and Cole will be her political director.

As CNN reported on Thursday, Clinton has started to line up a press operation, too, an effort that became a priority when the former secretary of state was seemingly left undefended during a recent controversy over her exclusive use of a private email system.

Jeb Bush, a Clinton Critic, Took Time Releasing His Own Emails (The New York Times)
By Michael Barbaro
March 14, 2015
The New York Times

Jeb Bush has rebuked Hillary Rodham Clinton for her use of a private email account as secretary of state, holding up his own conduct as an example of transparency in government.

But it took Mr. Bush seven years after leaving office to fully comply with a Florida public records statute requiring him to turn over emails he sent and received as governor, according to records released Friday.

Mr. Bush delivered the latest batch of 25,000 emails in May 2014, seven and a half years after leaving the Statehouse and just as he started to contemplate a potential run for the White House, according to a newly disclosed letter written by his lawyer.

A Florida statute governing the preservation of public records requires elected officials, including the governor, to turn over records pertaining to official business “at the expiration of his or her term of office.”

“If they’ve been adding to it, it’s a technical violation of the law,” said Barbara A. Petersen, president of the First Amendment Foundation, a nonprofit, nonpartisan group in Florida that advocates access to government information.

She added, “The law clearly says you’re supposed to turn everything over at the end of your term in office.”

Aides to Mr. Bush, an avid user of email, said they had provided many of his messages to his successor’s office as they were being reviewed for inclusion in the state archives, a process that dragged on for years because of the large volume.

“At the conclusion of Gov. Bush’s time in office, aides worked with the Executive Office of the Governor to continue to fulfill public records requests, as well as provide a full set of his official emails to the state for historical and archival purposes,” Kristy Campbell, a spokeswoman for Mr. Bush, said in a written statement.

Mr. Bush on Friday offered no detailed explanation for the seven-year delay in completing the search for his emails. Mr. Bush used a private email address, jeb@jeb.org, throughout his eight-year term as governor and encouraged constituents to write to him.

After it was revealed that Mrs. Clinton had relied exclusively on a private email account during her time as secretary of state, raising questions about her compliance with public records rules, Mr. Bush’s aides gleefully pointed to their handling of electronic correspondence as a model.

Mr. Bush, they recalled, had publicly advertised his personal email address and had promptly released tens of thousands of the emails to the public on a website.

“Transparency matters,” Mr. Bush wrote in a message on Twitter. Mrs. Clinton’s “emails should be released.”

The newly disclosed documents, made available after a request from The New York Times on Friday afternoon, suggest that Mr. Bush delivered his emails to state archives in several waves starting in 2007. New batches arrived in 2009, 2010 and 2011 as Mr. Bush and his aides reviewed whether they were subject to disclosure.

But in 2014, they discovered a new set of 25,000 emails, which represents about 9 percent of the 280,000 emails that he has turned over to the state from his private account. Until then, public records requests seeking emails to or from Mr. Bush would not have captured those messages, Ms. Petersen said.

In a letter explaining the delay, a lawyer for Mr. Bush, Raquel A. Rodriguez, wrote that the new messages were discovered when “we recently reviewed Gov. Bush’s records and came across some additional email messages that may be public records.” The letter did not elaborate on where or how the messages were found.

Ms. Petersen said she gave Mr. Bush credit for turning over emails as he found them but said the yearslong delay was curious.

“I can see how it might take six months or so, a year maybe to locate all these records,” she said. “But we are talking, what now, seven years?”

Jeb Bush: I'm No Hillary Clinton When it Comes to Email (ABC News)
By Meghan Keneally
March 14, 2015
ABC News

Former Florida governor Jeb Bush dedicated his return to New Hampshire after a 15-year-long absence to defining himself outside of his family's shadow and distancing himself from any similarities to another likely presidential candidate with legacy ties: Hillary Clinton.

Speaking after a business roundtable with the Nashua Chamber of Commerce on Friday, Bush said that his use of a private email server was "totally different" than that of the former Secretary of State, adding that he had been "totally transparent" about his communication habits.

While Clinton said this week that she used a private account out of "convenience" and later went through a "thorough process" to deliver her work-related messages to the State Department, Bush said he regularly complied with Freedom of Information Act requests during his tenure as governor and later posted a trove of thousands of emails online.

"I had a Blackberry. It was part of my official portrait for crying out loud," he said Friday. "There was nothing to hide."

"We complied with the law and … long before Mrs. Clinton's issues came up, we made them public for you to see, so it's totally different," he said.

Though Bush, who left the governor's mansion in 2007, maintained that his office has been dedicated to being "totally transparent" for years, a trove of his emails from his term were only handed over last summer, according to American Bridge, a liberal super PAC.

American Bridge released a report Saturday saying the Florida Department of State confirmed that an undisclosed amount of emails concerning "policy discussion" from 2002 to 2003 were not sent to the Florida State Archives until June of last year. That would give him, like Clinton, years where he had access to his personal email server but the government did not.

Though Bush declined to comment on what the scandal may mean for Clinton, he said he wasn't surprised that her team would suggest that his actions were similar to hers.

"That's standard operating procedure for them," he said of the allegations.

Later Friday, after Bush left his first public event in Hudson and stopped at a closed-door fundraiser, the former governor attended a house party hosted by former New Hampshire GOP Chairman Fergus Cullen, where he was happier to talk about his connections to some other former White House residents.

After working his way through the jammed dining and living rooms of the Cullens, Bush talked about how his family members have defined him for many years, saying how he's long-been known as "George's boy, or Barbara's boy, or George's brother."

That wasn't a problem for some in the hundred-strong crowd, including Brad Ludington, an endodontist who said that he had been waiting more than a decade to shake Bush's hand.

"The last two people I shook the hands of became president," Ludington said of Bush's father and brother.

Ludington said he was excited to hear the former governor speak, and though he liked the other Bush politicians, they were "totally different people."

Bush is one of a handful of likely 2016 presidential candidates to sweep the Granite State this week. Former Texas governor Rick Perry met voters at a series of smaller events in VFW halls upstate Friday, while Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker will headline a training session for volunteers and Texas Sen. Ted Cruz has several events scheduled for Sunday.

While Perry found support in New Hampshire during the 2012 primaries, some state activists appear to be making an effort to change the tenor of the upcoming primary politicking. On Friday night, Cullen introduced

Bush by taking a swipe at the earlier field, saying they “didn’t have enough serious, credible candidates” in 2012.

“Governor Bush would be a one-person antidote to that problem,” Cullen said.

Bush repeatedly shied away from the conclusion that he is formally running for president. When asked about how he would address the spread of ISIS, Bush said that he would only answer the question as a third-person hypothetical because he is only “considering the possibility of running.”

But that’s enough for supporters. Before the potential candidate even started addressing the group at the house party, Ludington felt that he had done his part to get another Bush in the White House.

“I gave him my lucky handshake,” he said.

Hillary Clinton's secret mess; The e-mail saga is a reminder that the Clintons rarely play by the same rules as everyone else. (The Washington Post)
By Kathleen Parker
March 14, 2015
The Washington Post

On March 2, the story broke that Hillary Clinton had possibly violated e-mail regulations while secretary of state.

You could almost hear the collective gasp in Washington: Oh, no, here we go again.

But the next evening, Clinton was feted at the Emily's List 30th-anniversary gala dinner as though nothing had happened. Only the trumpets were missing from what felt like her coronation as the Democratic presidential nominee and, possibly, the next president of the United States.

Fast-forward a dozen days and Clinton's position in the presidential sweepstakes seems less assured, her inevitability not so inevitable.

The most perplexing question isn't about the e-mails themselves but why she put everything at risk over such a small detail, declining to segregate her personal and business e-mail.

There can only be one answer, and it isn't "convenience," as Clinton claims. Think of another word that begins with the letter "C": control.

Clinton claims she opted for the convenience of one cellphone and a personal server — rather than use a government-issued phone for business and another device for personal matters. Too much stuff to lug around?

So the whole question of her conduct as secretary of state boils down to a few ounces of electronic equipment. Hate to say it, but only a woman could come up with such an excuse. It's all about the purse.

Plainly, Clinton didn't want anyone snooping around her virtual file cabinet. Who does? But this isn't the point. When you are secretary of state and are mulling a run for president, you steer clear of anything and anyone remotely questionable. No one should know this better.

Questions that merit serious consideration include whether the Clinton server was secure. Clinton insists that it was because her New York home, where the server lives, is protected by the Secret Service. Given the optional sobriety of agents these days, this is less than reassuring. Then, too, hacking doesn't require on-site handling.

Here's the real muddle for Clinton. Whether her server suffered no breaches — and whether there's nothing in those 32,000 deleted personal e-mails — matters little. In politics, you're guilty as perceived. It looks bad.

Most likely this error (rather than crime) is a function of remoteness more than dishonesty. The Clintons have been around so long, they are the essence of bubble life. Removed from the hubbub of ordinary existence — escorted, driven, valeted, catered to, styled, fluffed and obeyed — being Clinton means never having to hear the word "no." It must be easy to forget that you have to live by the same rules as everyone else.

This is a concept the Clintons have never fully accepted. One can understand, given their extended public life — and the hyper-scrutiny under which they live — that they might seek to erect high walls around their private lives. Fame and celebrity breed not just insularity but also paranoia.

Maybe there's nothing of interest in those personal e-mails, but how would we know? Team Clinton handpicked the "personals" and now they're deleted, thus creating the impression that she is hiding something. The Clintons always seem to be hiding something. Not so much holding their cards close to the chest as kicking the body back behind the dust ruffle.

Even though investigations into every "gate" associated with them in the past — Travelgate, Filegate, Troopergate, you-name-it-gate — failed to produce much more than a blue dress, there seemed to be something not quite right. And now there's this. Not illegal per se but not quite right.

Clinton says she figured that, because all her communications to State Department staff went to the dot-gov server, they automatically would have gone into storage as required. True, but what about the rest? What's in those deleted e-mails? Don't we imagine that personal and business often overlap in the Clinton Rolodex?

Adding to the suspicion is that the 55,000 pages of e-mails that Clinton did turn over to the State Department surfaced only after the House select committee investigating Benghazi requested her correspondence about the attack. Would she have turned them over anyway?

Maybe. Still and again, it doesn't look good. And the entire mess serves as a reminder of a movie we've seen before — and it wasn't so great the first time. Whether this episode proves fatal remains to be seen, but we won't hear the end of it until every note of condolence, yoga date and wedding plan is known to someone other than Hillary.

Public's right to know lost in email; State Dept. fails to practice the transparency it preaches (Boston Herald)
By Rachelle Cohen
March 13, 2015
Boston Herald

Each year the U.S. State Department hosts thousands of public officials from around the world under its International Visitor Leadership Program. It is one of the better things our government does, bringing the best and the brightest from distant lands — public officials, judges, journalists — and giving them a taste of how we operate here.

I know this because several times a year I get to host such groups at the Herald where the topic du jour is usually transparency — government transparency — everything from the cameras and Tweets from inside the Aaron Hernandez trial to the lengthy and detailed "Statement of Financial Interests" filed by every high-ranking state and local official, to the public payrolls we put up on our website. The latter is always a crowd pleaser — especially if we can look up the salary of some state official who might be in the room at the time.

For government officials from the Ukraine, Afghanistan, Uzbekistan, or journalists from Latin America or the Middle East this is eye-opening stuff — scary too, but they are universally quick to realize that transparency is at the heart of preventing the kind of corruption that eats away at public trust.

Many of their countries are right at that critical juncture — knowing where they need to be, but measuring progress in inches.

Now make no mistake, I always include a segment on how less than perfect we as a nation are, and how journalists are constantly fighting to push the envelope to keep government honest and open.

So what the hell do I tell them now? How do I explain Hillary Rodham Clinton and her private email server and her deletion of more than half of the emails she sent or received during her four years as secretary of state?

And there is the delicious irony of the State Department — which brings all of these smart up-and-coming officials here to worship at the American altar of transparency — now finding itself being sued by The Associated Press to force the release of Clinton's government emails.

The AP announced this week it was filing the suit after years of filing fruitless requests under the U.S. Freedom of Information Act — including at least one request that dates back five years and others pending since the summer of 2013.

The FOIA requests sought Clinton's emails regarding the Osama bin Laden raid and National Security Agency surveillance practices and correspondence between Clinton and top aides who might be expected to be part of a future presidential campaign, such as Huma Abedin and Cheryl Mills.

"State's failure to ensure that Secretary Clinton's government emails were retained and preserved by the agency, and its failure to timely seek out and search those emails in response to AP's requests, indicate at the very least that State has not engaged in the diligent, good-faith search that FOIA requires," the AP suit says.

And even as Clinton herself was trying to tap dance around the possible destruction of government documents (in the all-too-likely event that some of those 30,000 "private" emails weren't about Chelsea's wedding or yoga routines at all), the inspector general for the department released his own well-timed report this week.

In fact the IG found that of more than a billion emails sent in 2011, State Department employees created only 61,156 official "record emails" that would be preserved in the system. In 2013 that figure was down to 41,749.

"Some employees do not create record emails because they do not want to make the email available in searches or fear that this availability would inhibit debate about pending decisions," the IG wrote.

Really? Who would have guessed?

So if Hillary Clinton set the standard, the rest of the crew at State was all too eager to follow her lead.

Guess it's true what they say about the fish rotting from the head the down.

Hillary Clinton's Questionable Process for Sorting Work Emails (The Atlantic)

By Conor Friedersdorf

March 13, 2015

The Atlantic

Hillary Clinton asked the public to trust her during a recent press conference at the United Nations, when she stated that she has already complied with transparency laws by turning over all public records she generated as Secretary of State.

She had no business making that claim. A Time magazine report about the process used to identify public records in her possession shows that she cannot possibly know if she is in compliance with the law. And juxtaposing her process with the words used in her press conference shows her core claim to be misleading.

Unless she can disprove the story, her credibility can only suffer from the comparison.

To understand the impression Hillary Clinton created at her press conference, before additional facts were available, it is best to begin with her words. What follows are the parts of the event where she characterized the emails she has turned over.

She began:

... after I left office, the State Department asked former secretaries of state for our assistance in providing copies of work-related emails from our personal accounts. I responded right away and provided all my emails that could possibly be work-related, which totalled roughly 55,000 printed pages, even though I knew that the State Department already had the vast majority of them. We went through a thorough process to identify all of my work-related emails and deliver them to the State Department.

A reporter at the press conference followed up, asking, "Can you explain how you decided which of the personal e-mails to get rid of, how you got rid of them and when? And how you'll respond to questions about you being the arbiter of what you release?"

Her reply:

In going through the e-mails, there were over 60,000 in total, sent and received. About half were work-related and went to the State Department and about half were personal that were not in any way related to my work. I had no reason to save them, but that was my decision because the federal guidelines are clear and the State Department request was clear. For any government employee, it is that government employee's responsibility to determine what's personal and what's work-related. I am very confident of the process that we conducted and the e-mails that were produced.

Later still, she added, "I have absolute confidence that everything that could be in any way connected to work is now in the possession of the State Department."

And she said this:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

... my direction to conduct the thorough investigation was to err on the side of providing anything that could be possibly viewed as work related. That doesn't mean they will be by the State Department once the State Department goes through them, but out of an abundance of caution and care, you know, we wanted to send that message unequivocally. That is the responsibility of the individual and I have fulfilled that responsibility, and I have no doubt that we have done exactly what we should have done. When the search was conducted, we were asking that any email be identified and preserved that could potentially be federal records, and that's exactly what we did ... I trust the American people to make their decisions about political and public matters. And I feel that I've taken unprecedented steps to provide these work-related emails.

To review, she asserted 1) a thorough investigation that included "going through" roughly 60,000 emails; 2) a standard of erring on the side of disclosing "anything" that could "possibly" be viewed as work related; 3) a "thorough" process robust enough to warrant "absolute confidence" in its results; 4) a process to turn over emails that could plausibly be characterized as "unprecedented."

Nearly everyone listening to these assurances came away with the impression that a person or team of people went through those 60,000+ emails and sorted them into two categories: work or personal. On The Daily Show, Jon Stewart mocked the notion that sorting through tens of thousands of emails was more "convenient" than maintaining both work and personal email accounts. Most criticism of the approach focused on the fact that Hillary Clinton confidantes, rather than neutral arbiters, were making the judgment calls about these 60,000+ emails.

But it turns out that no one was "going through" each email to sort work from personal correspondence or to error on the side of disclosure when the line was blurry.

According to David Von Drehle of Time, the process used was actually as follows:

She commissioned a review of the 62,320 messages in her account only after the department—spurred by the congressional investigation—asked her to do so.

And this review did not involve opening and reading each email; instead, Clinton's lawyers created a list of names and keywords related to her work and searched for those. Slightly more than half the total cache—31,830 emails—did not contain any of the search terms, according to Clinton's staff, so they were deemed to be "private, personal records."

The idea that such a process could produce "absolute confidence" that all public records were identified is as curious as the notion that Bill Clinton never inhaled.

Here is a made up email to illustrate the point:

To: Bill Clinton

From: Hillary Clinton

Subject: Ugh

Assume you saw the latest. This could blow up in our faces if we don't get out in front of it ... and frankly, the WH isn't helping matters much. I'm tempted to reverse course but wonder if it would affect your latest ask. What does SB think?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A keyword search would not flag messages where (for example) official business is rendered in pronouns, “White House” is rendered as an abbreviation, and “Sidney Blumenthal” is rendered in shorthand. Or consider an email that concerns Benghazi, but that was typed on a smart phone in a moment of distraction, causing an unintententional misspelling: “Benhgazi.” A keyword search would miss that email. The process described would label it a “private, personal record.”

As for creating a list of names, that would doubtless flag a lot of relevant work emails, but no busy professional remembers the name of every person who emails them for work over a multi-year period encompassing tens of thousands of messages.

And those problems apply even if we assume that Team Clinton made an earnest effort to use search terms that would flag all relevant emails, while it could be the case that they knew what they hoped to hide and crafted the search accordingly. Had the technology existed in an earlier era Richard Nixon’s attorneys presumably wouldn’t have included “Watergate” or “burglary” in the search terms.

This revelation ought to harm Hillary Clinton insofar as it shows her earlier statements to be misleading. It also suggests what question she ought to be asked next: What list of names and key words were included in the email-archive search? It’s easy to imagine search terms that would suggest an earnest effort at identification, the shortcomings of the method notwithstanding, and equally easy to imagine search terms so self-evidently inadequate or with such glaring omissions that, like the private server itself, they suggest that official business was being hidden.

Even if Hillary Clinton’s server was wiped clean and her email archive is unrecoverable, she can further reveal the specific details of her inadequate process.

Will she?

Judge Orders State Dept. to Release Records From Clinton Trips (The New York Times)
By Amy Chozick
March 13, 2015
The New York Times

A federal judge on Friday ruled on behalf of Citizens United, a conservative advocacy group, in its lawsuit against the State Department for documents related to Hillary Rodham Clinton's tenure there.

Judge Gladys Kessler of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia ordered the State Department to produce passenger manifests from 47 overseas trips that Mrs. Clinton made as secretary of state. Citizens United requested the manifests last July through a Freedom of Information Act Request.

The State Department, the judge wrote, must release the first batch of records by April 3, with more being released every two weeks; all the documents must be given to the group no later than Aug. 1.

The group requested the flight manifests to examine whether Clinton Foundation donors had accompanied Mrs. Clinton on State Department trips.

"Clearly, the State Department is not getting the benefit of the doubt from judges anymore," David N. Bossie, president of Citizens United. said Friday.

A State Department spokeswomen did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

Citizens United has made 18 FOIA requests for information, none of which have not been fulfilled. The group said it planned to file a lawsuit next week that would seek to gain access to documents that show any existing correspondence between senior State Department officials and donors to the Bill, Hillary & Chelsea Clinton Foundation.

Requests for public records requests have been complicated or made impossible because of Mrs. Clinton's exclusive use of a private email address while she was at the State Department. The Associated Press filed a lawsuit this week against the State Department to force the release of outstanding documents requested through FOIA.

Citizens United has a history of litigation involving projects designed to portray Mrs. Clinton in a negative light. A lawsuit the group brought against the Federal Election Commission over its 2008 anti-Clinton documentary, "Hillary: The Movie," reached the Supreme Court and led to a 2010 decision that overhauled campaign finance rules.

Is Hillary Clinton Vulnerable? (The Wall Street Journal)
By James Taranto
March 13, 2015
The Wall Street Journal

More details are emerging about Hillary Clinton's private email server, and they don't look good from either a transparency or security standpoint. Time reports on how she determined which emails to print out for the State Department:

For more than a year after she left office in 2013, she did not transfer work-related email from her private account to the State Department. She commissioned a review of the 62,320 messages in her account only after the department—spurred by the congressional investigation—asked her to do so. And this review did not involve opening and reading each email; instead, [Mrs.] Clinton's lawyers created a list of names and keywords related to her work and searched for those. Slightly more than half the total cache—31,830 emails—did not contain any of the search terms, according to Clinton's staff, so they were deemed to be "private, personal records."

In Tuesday's press conference Mrs. Clinton claimed to have undertaken "a thorough process to identify all of my work-related emails" and to have "provided [printouts of] all my emails that could possibly be work-related." If Time's account is accurate, the process was not thorough, and the claim that the printouts included all work-related emails is almost certainly untrue. The search terms the lawyers employed were narrow enough to exclude more than half (51.1%) of all the emails on the server. Are we supposed to believe the terms were also broad enough to include every single email that involved official business?

Moreover, if Time's account of the lawyers' method is comprehensive, then they made no effort to shield from disclosure those personal emails that happened to include the selected keywords. Given Mrs. Clinton's penchant for privacy, does that seem likely? One wonders if perhaps there was a second set of search terms flagging emails to be withheld—and, since she said she "chose not to keep" them, destroyed.

"Hillary Clinton Is More Vulnerable in 2016 Than You Think" read a New York Times headline early this week. The article was an analysis of her approval and disapproval ratings in opinion surveys, but her use of a private server to conduct sensitive official business raises the prospect of another kind of vulnerability—questions even Vox.com raised after the press conference in a piece titled "Clinton Says She Had No Email Security Breaches. But She Doesn't Know That."

At the press conference, the former secretary laughably claimed that the server was secure because "it was on property guarded by the Secret Service." Maybe she's been watching "House of Cards," whose second season has a hacking subplot that involves obtaining physical access to a server farm. But of course that's not how hackers typically operate in the real virtual world.

In a Sunday article for GeekWire.com, Christopher Budd, a specialist in both computer security and public relations, argues that Mrs. Clinton's use of a private server while secretary of state may "represent one of the most serious breaches in data handling that we've ever heard of." He lists three reasons:

1. The Secretary of State is a very "high value target" from the standpoint of nation-state threat actors. The President, Secretary of Defense and the head of the CIA would also qualify in this top tier. These individuals handle the most important, most sensitive, most dangerous and therefore most interesting information to foreign intelligence.

2. Nation-state threat actors represent the top of the food chain in terms of adversaries in information security. Nation-states can bring the most talent and resources to bear in this arena. For all the worry about cybercriminals and terrorists, everyone in information security looks at nation-state threat actors as the most advanced and sophisticated threat to defend against.

3. Take #1 and #2 together and you have a situation where the very high value targets are threatened by the most advanced and sophisticated offensive information security capabilities out there. Put another way, the best of the best are gunning for those people to get their information.

The third point is critical: if the best of the best are after your information, you need the best of your best protecting it. And there is simply no way that a "homebrew" server is EVER going to have the security and resources appropriate to defend it adequately.

Since Budd wrote, experts and reporters have fleshed out some of these concerns. The Wall Street Journal reported yesterday that according to Venafi, an Internet security company, "the Clinton server was encrypting data it sent and received as of March 29, 2009." But "during the first two months of her tenure . . . it doesn't appear that Mrs. Clinton's email had such protections."

In a Wednesday blog post, Venafi's vice president for security strategy and threat intelligence, Kevin Bocek, explains what this means: "During the first 3 months of Secretary Clinton's term in office, web browser, smartphone, and tablet communications would not have been encrypted. Attackers could have eavesdropped on communications. As well, the server would not have been uniquely identified as being clintonemail.com and therefore could have been spoofed—allowing attackers to more easily trick an unsuspecting user of the site to hand over their [sic] username and password or other sensitive information."

Even the belated security measures might not have been enough, Bocek explains:

Obtaining the cryptographic key and digital certificate for clintonemail.com would be an important step for attackers seeking to compromise Secretary of State Clinton or others [who] might access the server. With them, bad guys could masquerade as the legitimate site or decrypt what was thought to be private communications. As a standalone Microsoft Windows Server, the site is very vulnerable. In 2013, over 800 trojans were known to steal keys and certificates—and that number has swelled since then. The use of digital certificates on clintonemail.com provides users with the confidence that they are connecting to the real site and communications cannot be inspected. But when on government networks, anyone accessing the site and depending on the certificate needs to be highly suspicious. The site has received tremendous attention and its contents and certificate are likely targets for compromise and misuse.

Fox's James Rosen reports that "a determined band of hackers, IT bloggers, and systems analysts have trained their specialized talents and state-of-the-art software on clintonemail.com . . . and uncovered serious lapses in security, according to data shared with Fox News":

Perhaps most concerning, private analysts determined that clintonemail.com has been running an older model of Microsoft Internet Information Services, or IIS—specifically version 7.5, which has been documented to leave users exposed on multiple fronts. The website CVEDetails.com, which bills itself as "the ultimate security vulnerability datasource," is awash with descriptions of serious security vulnerabilities associated with version 7.5, including "memory corruption," "password disclosure vulnerability," and the enabling of "remote attackers to execute arbitrary code or cause a denial of service."

The cyberlab technician who discovered the Clintons' use of version 7.5 marveled at "the vulnerabilities the Clintons are ignoring" in an email to Fox News. "This is a big deal and just the thing real-world hackers look for in a target and will exploit to the max," the source said.

"Several of these vulnerabilities have been known since 2010 and yet HRC is running official State comms through it."

Mrs. Clinton insisted during her press conference that "I did not email any classified material to anyone on my email." Even if true, there are three reasons that is not reassuring.

First, as the Journal notes in a Wednesday editorial, "emails between a Secretary of State and others in government don't have to be classified to be valuable to foreign hackers." Second, as the Journal points out in a Thursday editorial, "Mrs. Clinton didn't say she never received classified information via email."

Third, as former federal prosecutor Andrew McCarthy argues at National Review Online, it depends on what the meaning of "material" is:

In the government, classified documents are maintained on separate, super-highly secured systems. Yes, if security gets lax or you have a determined Ed Snowden type with sufficient expertise, the protections can be defeated. But in general, Mrs. Clinton would not have been able to access classified documents even from a .gov account, much less from her private account—she'd need to use the classified system. In fact, many government officials with security clearances read "hard copies" of classified documents in facilities designed for that purpose rather than accessing them on computers.

That said, there are two pertinent caveats. First, since we're dealing with Clintonian parsing here, we must consider the distinction between classified documents and classified information—the latter being what is laid out in the former. It is not enough for a government official with a top-secret clearance to refrain from storing classified documents on private e-mail; the official is also forbidden to discuss the information contained in those documents.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The fact that Mrs. Clinton says she did not store classified documents on her private server, which is very likely true, does not discount the distinct possibility that she discussed classified matters in private e-mails. We would not be able to judge that absent reviewing the e-mails. If any of the 31,830 withheld e-mails from the private, non-secure system—involving America's top diplomat who was in constant discussions with other important diplomats, top military and national-security officials, her trusted advisers, and even the president of the United States—touched on classified matters, that could land Mrs. Clinton in very hot legal water. It would be a powerful incentive to hit the "delete" key.

A frequent complaint from journalists and other advocates of government transparency is that agencies dealing with national security classify far too much material. "I would assume that more than 50 percent of what the secretary of state dealt with was classified," a "former senior State Department official who served before the Obama administration" tells the New York Times. "Was every single email of the secretary of state completely unclassified? Maybe, but it's hard to imagine." (The official requested and was granted anonymity "because he did not want to seem ungracious to Mrs. Clinton.")

In light of all this, it's fair to say Mrs. Clinton's press conference raised more questions than it answered. About the only thing we know for sure is that she is determined "the server will remain private."

How Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama Became Media Control Freaks (Daily Beast)
By Lloyd Grove
March 13, 2015
Daily Beast

mbattled former secretary of state Hillary Clinton can console herself with the knowledge that she's not alone.

The presumptive presidential candidate and email deleter—whose apparent reluctance to release public records and documents prompted the Associated Press to sue the State Department this week—is by no means unique in her wish to starve the insatiable media, or at least restrict ravenous reporters to a bland diet of happy news.

It has been the desire of politicians and government agencies through history to manipulate the Fourth Estate into publishing their press releases and ignoring their missteps and scandals. Technological advances, meanwhile, have cut both ways, allowing not only instantaneous public distribution of official government spin but also massive leaks of political and national security secrets, digitally downloaded from cyberspace.

"The basic narrative [of the latest Clinton controversy] is consistent with what we have seen from the Pentagon Papers through Watergate to the fundamental tension between the media and the political establishment," said Frank Sesno, director of George Washington University's School of Media and Public Affairs and former Washington bureau chief of CNN.

"It centers on secrecy and any suggestion of a cover-up. And what technology has changed is there is more demand for more information, more rapidly and more transparently shared. So that creates a collision course between the media and, in this case, Hillary Clinton."

President Barack Obama's minions, obsessed with preventing unauthorized disclosures, have turned this understandable impulse into an overpowering imperative, say journalism advocates who deal with them daily.

"These folks are control freaks," said longtime media lawyer Lucy Dalglish, dean of the University of Maryland's Phillip Merrill College of Journalism and former executive director of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press. "To a certain degree, I can understand when it comes to sensitive information that can just be put on a thumb drive and flown to Russia. That's scary, and they do need those controls. But that doesn't mean you have to control all access."

Dalglish was among the First Amendment advocates who attended a quarrelsome high-level meeting in November 2013 between President Obama's communications staff, led by then-White House Press Secretary Jay Carney and White House Counsel Kathryn Ruemmler, and aggrieved and angry representatives of the White House press corps.

"The topic of that particular meeting at the White House was, 'You're not allowing independent photography; you only allow [Obama's personal photographer] Pete Souza to take pictures. This is insane!'" Dalglish recalled.

"And they started going into their song and dance. 'We're the most transparent White House in history!' 'We post things on Facebook!' 'You don't want us to have Facebook. You don't want us to have Twitter and Instagram. Isn't that hypocritical?'"

Dalglish continued: "Our response was 'Hold it! Time out! You guys can blog. You guys can tweet. You guys can post photos. Good for you! Go do it. God bless. But it's not the same thing as journalism. A series of photos you posted from Pete Souza are not the same as photos shot by independent professionals. And the fact that you don't recognize that is troubling.' Carney didn't seem to understand."

Amazed that Carney, a former Time magazine Washington bureau chief, would argue that White House-approved and edited photos were just as valid journalistically as those taken for independent news organizations—"Don't get me started," Dalglish said—she could barely believe her ears.

Carney remembers the encounter somewhat differently. "I've never said, and do not believe, that official photos are journalistically equivalent to photos take by independent photo journalists," he emailed The Daily Beast. "What I did say, and believe, is that official photos have value, and that it's a good thing to give the public access to them."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The former White House press secretary acknowledged, however, that technology has inevitably placed the administration's PR juggernaut in direct competition with news outlets.

"There were issues of access, which was something we could address and improve," he emailed. "And there were issues of distribution, which were more difficult. Back in the 1980s, say, the official White House photographers took photos, decided which ones to distribute, developed them and then physically handed them out in the press room. The wires, the papers and the networks got to decide which, if any, the public would get to see."

Carney continued: "The Internet has changed that. The early part of the process is the same now as it was then, but now the images are digitized and distribution is direct. The White House can simply post official photos online. More people get to see them, and see them sooner. I think that's a good thing. But it doesn't replace independent photography, and neither I nor anyone I worked with believed that it should or could."

Photography aside, however, Dalglish listed a series of new limits demonstrating that the Obama administration's relationship with the media is even more restrictive—arguably paranoid—than that of George W. Bush, hardly known as a press-friendly president.

"For instance, journalists can't talk without pre-approval to any of the scientists at a scientific agency, whether it be NASA, the National Institutes of Health or the National Weather Service," she said. "They're cracking down on their experts, not allowing their actual scientists to speak to reporters. They make you go through 'information specialists' who translate the scientists for you. I'm sorry, but that's insulting, unnecessary, and exhibits the mindset of a terrified control freak."

In another instance, Dalglish said members of the intelligence community are required to file reports on even their most casual encounters with University of Maryland professor Dana Priest, a Pulitzer Prize-winning former Washington Post reporter who specializes in national security issues.

"Every time they see her they have to report it," Dalglish said. "She was telling me that there was a meeting of the crew team of her daughter's school, and there was a parent, the father of another kid, who works for one of the intelligence agencies. And he just came up to her and said, 'Just so you know, every time I see you, I have to report that I saw you. I'm not trying to be rude, but they're watching.' " Priest didn't respond to email and voicemail messages from The Daily Beast.

Still, law professor Geoffrey Stone of the University of Chicago—who has studied the institutional tensions between the media and government secret-keepers—defended the intelligence community's legitimate interests in holding the press at arm's length.

Citing the massive and potentially harmful disclosures of classified material—by Chelsea Manning to Wikileaks and by Edward Snowden to The Guardian and other outlets—Stone said there's little doubt that the resulting news stories damaged national security.

"The people in the intelligence community see the media as self-interested and superficial, reckless with information and a genuine danger to the nation, who do not understand what they're doing, and, frankly, don't care," said Stone, who interviewed both spies and reporters as a member of the President's Review Group on NSA Surveillance.

"The journalists tend to see the people in the intelligence community as being much more interested in protecting themselves from criticism than they are in allowing the public to be informed on matters on which the public should be informed. The truth is, they're both right."

The Associated Press's lawsuit to obtain emails, calendars, phone logs and other material from Hillary Clinton's four years at the State Department is the latest battleground of these opposing attitudes.

The central clearing house of U.S. diplomacy—which takes an average of 450 days to comply with a Freedom of Information Act request, according to a 2012 inspector general's report—is by far the worst performer of any government agency. Even the CIA is seven times faster in responding, and the Treasury Department is even quicker—30 times faster than State.

AP General Counsel Karen Kaiser filed the current lawsuit on behalf of the non-profit wire service—which represents 1,700 member news outlets—after one of the AP's Clinton-related FOIAs languished for five years at the State Department without a response.

She said it's possible that after negotiations with the Justice Department's civil division there could be arguments before a federal judge, and some of the requested documents could be forthcoming within a few months.

At which point, Hillary Clinton—likely to be in smack-dab in the middle of her campaign for the Democratic nomination—will either be facing a pesky new scandal or a collective media yawn.

By Greg Sargent

March 13, 2015

Washington Post

The other day, I noted that it might be time to start hoping for a real Democratic presidential primary. Not solely because Hillary Clinton's handling of the email mess shows she might benefit from being challenged, but also because there are real differences among Democrats that would benefit from an airing.

Former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley, who has been talking about challenging Hillary Clinton from the left, has given an interview to Salon's Joan Walsh that provides a preliminary glimpse into what such an intra-Dem debate might look like.

O'Malley seems to throw his lot in with what is widely being called the "Elizabeth Warren wing of the Democratic Party." The divide on economic policy between the Warren-ites and the more moderate Democrats tends to be exaggerated — there's probably more consensus on these matters among Democrats than there has been in many years — but there are real differences, and they matter.

For instance, O'Malley comes out for expanding Social Security (Obama has flirted with cutting it), arguing: "Right now we're facing a looming retirement crisis in our country. People who used to have personal savings, or pensions, don't have them. More and more people are going to be relying solely on Social Security." Some high profile Democrats, such as Warren, have endorsed this idea, which would be funded by lifting the cap so higher earners pay more into the system, while re-indexing for inflation to boost benefits. This goal is shared by some Dem constituencies, such as organized labor and activist groups. To my knowledge Clinton has not said whether she favors this.

O'Malley also declares his support for reinstating Glass-Steagall, i.e., separations between commercial and investment banks. This goal has also been championed by Warren, on the grounds that it could minimize the risks to the financial system posed by Wall Street "high stakes gambling." O'Malley mocks fellow Democrats for "supporting Dodd Frank lite," suggesting that they are mostly doing so because "we have monied interests tying Congress in knots," an apparent effort to speak to Democratic voters who believe their party is too beholden to Wall Street.

The original Glass-Steagall, of course, was repealed under a president also named Clinton, which is one of the reasons many claim Hillary Clinton is "too cozy with Wall Street." I'm a bit skeptical of that claim, but there are plainly differences among core Democratic constituencies over how far to go in regulating Wall Street, and a debate on this topic would be helpful and clarifying for Democratic voters.

O'Malley also brings up a topic we rarely hear about these days: Raising the income threshold for workers to qualify for overtime pay. The Obama administration will soon announce a rules change raising the threshold, and some liberal economists expect him to set it lower than he might. This is not a small matter: Going big on overtime pay might be the single most dramatic thing a Democratic president might do unilaterally to help the middle class — and if a Dem is elected in 2016, he or she will face a GOP House. O'Malley also talks about the need to boost the collective bargaining power of workers, which would be key to any serious effort to combat inequality. Clinton, too, is reportedly thinking along these lines, but still, debate on these topics would be great for the Democratic audience.

Then there's the possible nuclear deal with Iran, a topic on which Clinton has been vague, and the argument over the proper parameters of the conflict with ISIS, a topic on which Obama and many Democrats disagree.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Yes, there is a lot of consensus among Democrats on the broad economic strokes: Higher taxes on capital gains and inherited wealth to fund middle class tax relief. More investments in infrastructure and education, particularly subsidized community college. Universal child care and early education; national family leave and sick leave policies designed to enhance workplace flexibility. A minimum wage hike. But there are remaining disagreements among core Dem constituencies and among party actors.

Can anyone force a real primary? Should anyone try? There has been a lot of snickering about how O'Malley can't possibly mount a serious challenge to Clinton, and for all I know, that may be right. But as Jonathan Bernstein has explained, even if Clinton's nomination appears close to inevitable, there really are a number of serious Democrats out there, and even the effort to compel a contested primary might help the party:

It's good for the party to have competition, because it gives party actors leverage over the candidates, and therefore helps force the nominee, if elected, to be loyal to the party as president.

In other words, the debate itself is a worthy goal, even if it might have little chance of changing the outcome.

Hillary Clinton isn't running unopposed. She's just crushing the competition. (Vox)

By Ezra Klein

March 13, 2015

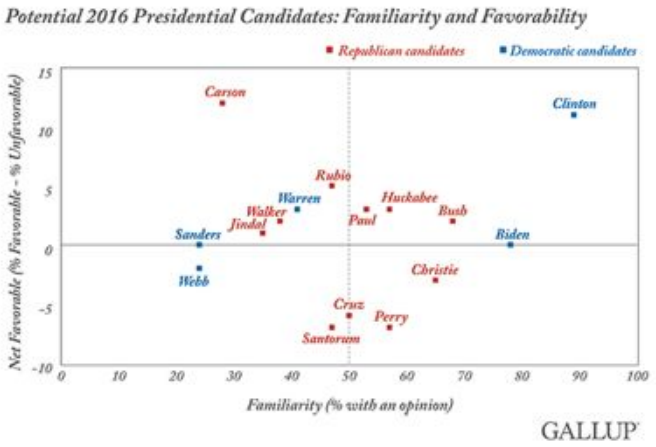
Vox

Jonathan Bernstein and Reihan Salam have written two smart articles on the Democratic presidential primary — or lack thereof — that are best read in tandem. Bernstein's article is meant to explain why it looks like Democrats don't have a bench even though they do, and Salam's article is meant to show who's sitting on it.

Bernstein's argument is related to the "invisible primary" theory of presidential elections. Hillary Clinton, he says, "has earned the support of the bulk of Democratic party actors, and gained the acquiescence of other Democrats who aren't as enthusiastic about her." The result is that the Democratic Party's "perfectly viable other candidates either dropped out or never seriously considered the race."

Perhaps a slightly clearer way to put it is this: in the invisible primary, when the contest is as much a draft as it is a campaign, Clinton is "opposed" by essentially every Democrat fit for the presidency. If the party's powerbrokers didn't want to support Clinton and instead really wanted Sen. Michael Bennet to run, or Gov. Andrew Cuomo to lead the field, they would be working toward that outcome. Instead, they're lining up behind Clinton. In this telling, Clinton isn't winning by default. She's winning by winning. The absence of competition is the product of Clinton's strong, successful campaign to win over Democratic Party elites.

Hillary's strength is evident in public polling, too. Gallup has a useful favorability-familiarity index, the upshot of which is that Clinton is both better known than anyone else in the race and viewed more favorably than almost anyone else in the race (Ben Carson is viewed very favorably too, but as he becomes better known among Democrats, my guess is that his negatives will rise quickly):



This is the context for Hillary's dominance on the Democratic side: she's in a much stronger position not just than any Democrat going into 2016, but also than any Republican. These are early polls and the numbers can and will change, but look where Clinton is compared to Jeb Bush or Scott Walker. That's a big deal to Democrats, and a big reason they're supporting her rather than looking for an alternative.

The Democratic bench

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Salam offers a “wish list of Democratic presidential contenders.” His list excludes possible candidates like ex-Maryland Governor Martin O’Malley or ex-Virginia Senator Jim Webb. Rather, it includes plausible candidates who seem to have no interest in becoming actual candidates.

“Any contest for the Democratic presidential nomination needs an earnest, nerdy liberal technocrat who appeals to the intelligentsia,” writes Salam, and he nominates Sen. Ron Wyden, a favorite of wonks (and civil libertarians) everywhere:

His steadfast opposition to dragnet surveillance has won him many friends among civil libertarians, and that’s no small thing in a Democratic primary, particularly in dovish, independent-minded states like New Hampshire. A Pew survey from January found that 31 percent of Democrats hold an unfavorable view of the National Security Agency, which is not a bad little foundation for a Wyden campaign. Moreover, Wyden has proposed a universal health care plan more ambitious than Obamacare, and he’s championed the idea of allowing states like Vermont and Oregon to build their own single-payer health systems.

Salam goes on to push Sen. Sherrod Brown as a liberal champion, ex-Massachusetts Governor Deval Patrick for his ability to speak to the post-Ferguson moment in the post-Obama Democratic Party, ex-New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg as the grave centrist, and Sen. Amy Klobuchar as a Midwest problem-solver.

The point isn’t that any of these candidates will run. The point is that they could run, and they would be, in theory, at least as credible as a Scott Walker or a Jeb Bush. They may not seem like presidential contenders now, but as Bernstein writes, “the way those solid politicians become Serious Presidential Candidates and not just random governors and senators — I’m talking here about folks such as Scott Walker, Marco Rubio, John Kasich and Bobby Jindal — is to start running, and visibly enough so the press notices. “

Which is all to say that Bernstein is right: the Democratic Party has a bench. It’s just that Clinton is running so strongly in the invisible primary that no one on it thinks it’s worth getting in the game.

The question for the Democratic Party is whether Clinton is going to be as strong in the visible primary — and the visible election — as she is in the invisible one. The skills necessary to win over Democratic Party elites may not be the skills necessary to win the election — and if Hillary doesn’t face serious opposition in the visible primary, Democrats may not find that out until too late.

Poll Shows Younger Americans Tuning Out Clinton Story (The Wall Street Journal)

By Dante Chinni

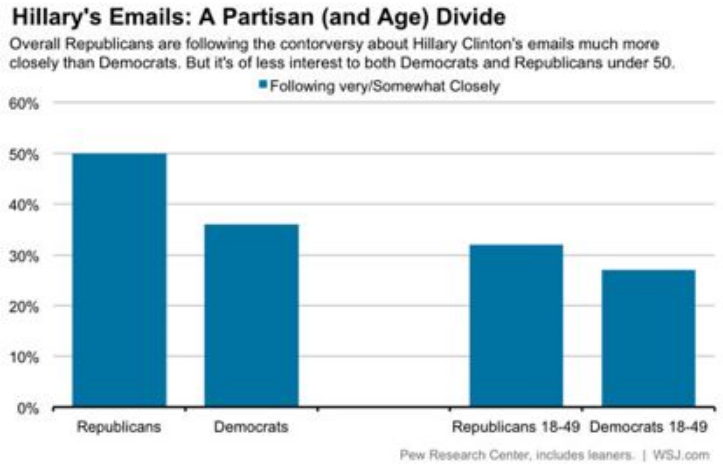
March 13, 2015

Wall Street Journal

As Washington gauges the political fallout of the Hillary Clinton email story, the impact among the electorate may hinge one crucial aspect: the age of the voters in question.

A poll from the Pew Research Center shows a sharp partisan divide over interest in the story, but if you look at the numbers by partisan leaning and age, much of that partisan divide disappears.

This chart shows the percentage of people who say they are following the Clinton story closely.



Among Republicans overall (including "leaners"), 50% saying they are following very closely or somewhat closely the story about how Mrs. Clinton used a private account to conduct official business when she was secretary of State. For Democrats the overall figure is 36%. That's a 14-point gap. (Note: the poll was conducted before Mrs. Clinton's press conference Tuesday.)

But if you look at Democrats and Republicans younger than 50, the data look very different. The numbers are much lower, and closer together. Among those younger Democrats, only 27% say they are following closely. Among Republicans it is only 32%.

The partisan divide nearly disappears when you look at the percentage of those younger Democrats and Republicans who say they aren't following the story "closely at all." Among Democrats, that number is 55%. Among Republicans, it is a nearly identical 53%.

Is this just how young people feel about the news in general? That is, are 18- to 49-year-olds just less interested in the news?

That's part of it. The numbers for following all news events are lower for that age group. But the numbers are weakest for the email story – slightly more people uninterested in it than in Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's speech to Congress.

There are several possible ways younger people see the story different than older people. Younger people, particularly those under 35, may see Mrs. Clinton and the Clinton name in general differently. Their awareness of Mrs. Clinton as a politician came while she was a popular senator and secretary of state, not during her time as first lady.

Also, Mrs. Clinton’s explanation that she used one email account (and one device) for convenience may resonate with some younger people — or strike others as unsatisfying. In any case, Americans who have grown up with social trails that live forever, as well as with self-destructing messages on services like Snapchat, may continue to see the Clinton email story differently.

The Pew poll surveyed 1,000 adults from March 5 to March 8.

Top State Dept. officials' work emails not automatically archived before February (Politico)

By Josh Gerstein

March 13, 2015

Politico

Hillary Clinton's explanation for her use of a personal email account while she served as secretary of state suffered another blow Friday as the State Department disclosed that the email accounts of senior department officials were not automatically archived until last month.

Clinton said at a news conference Tuesday that she believed the vast majority of work-related emails she sent or received from her private account were "preserved" because she was in correspondence with other officials using ".gov" accounts.

However, State Department spokeswoman Jen Psaki told reporters Friday that archiving of the work email boxes of senior State Department officials besides the secretary did not begin until "February of this year." She previously said Secretary of State John Kerry uses an official account and his emails have been archived since soon after he succeeded Clinton.

Psaki said the automatic archiving began last month for "dozens" of top officials — such as the deputy secretary, under secretaries and assistant secretaries. "Our goal is to apply this to all employee mailboxes by the end of 2016," she said.

A Clinton spokesman had no comment on the department's disclosure.

Psaki also revealed that the department had "recently" requested copies of work-related emails some current and former State officials had sent or received on private accounts. She said she believed the letter requesting such records was sent earlier this week and was related to investigations underway on Capitol Hill.

"There have obviously been requests from Congress for certain information," Psaki said. She did not immediately have details on how widely the department's request for current and former officials was distributed.

Clinton sent copies of 55,000 pages of emails to the State Department in December in response to a letter sent in October to her and three other former secretaries seeking copies of work-related records held in private accounts.

Psaki declined to answer reporters' repeated questions about whether the department was satisfied with Clinton's explanation for her use of a private email account as secretary.

Later in the briefing, however, Psaki suggested that there was confusion among some State Department employees about what was and was not being automatically saved.

"I assume some assumed that was happening at the time as well," Psaki said. "We're updating it because it's an imperfect system."

Speaking without reference to Clinton, Psaki said the duty was on individual employees to save records that met standards for permanent archiving. "Clearly, individuals — any top officials — would also be expected to preserve their documents," she said.

Psaki said the move last month to begin archiving senior officials' emails was not triggered by concerns about Clinton's email practices. "They have long been planning to do this. It's just something that it took some time to put in place," she said.

Despite the State Department's practice of not archiving top officials' emails until recently, some of the emails were saved when employees printed them and put them in permanent files, saved them in electronic folders, or — in a specific agency system — marked them as permanent records.

"Obviously, this [automatic archiving] is a more efficient way — a way that will require less human effort….We have quite a bit going on here at the State Department," Psaki said. "There were ways to preserve [emails] and employees and individuals were expected to do that prior to this new process."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Psaki also noted that it might not be accurate to say that all the unarchived email messages were gone, because it was possible some might be retrievable.

"I wouldn't state it's 'lost to history' because there are technical means of gaining access to past information," Psaki said. "I'm not an expert on the technical capabilities."

Why the email controversy probably hasn't dented Hillary Clinton's public image (The Washington Post)

By Paul Waldman

March 13, 2015

Washington Post

The first polls taken since the news of Hillary Clinton's email controversy broke are beginning to trickle in, and they aren't likely to make Republicans particularly happy. According to the Pew Research Center, only 17 percent of people said they were following the story closely (though that included 34 percent of Republicans). Starved as we are for campaign news, we in Washington may have found it riveting, but voters weren't nearly so interested.

And it doesn't seem to have affected how they think of her: A new Gallup poll, taken between last Monday and Wednesday (the story broke last Monday), shows Clinton's approval rating at 50 percent, with 39 percent disapproving, not too different from what it was before. That +11 net positive is higher than any of the Republican candidates with the exception of Ben Carson (who comes in at 20-8 approval, for a net of +12).

The fact that she's so much better known than any of her potential Republican opponents highlights the difficulty of the task they face. When a candidate is new and unfamiliar, a negative story like this one can comprise a large part of what people know about them. For instance, what the average voter knows about Scott Walker is that he fights with unions (if they know even that). If we find out that he's running a dog-fighting ring, he'd become the guy who fights with unions and runs a dog-fighting ring; the latter would loom very large in his public image. But even a real scandal about Hillary Clinton would be one of a hundred things voters know and think about her.

That isn't to say that opinions of Clinton can't change, because they've changed before. Over the last twenty years, her favorability ratings have waxed and waned according to how much she was perceived as a partisan political figure. It was high during her quieter times as First Lady, dipped when she ran for Senate, rose when she was quietly doing legislative work, dipped again when she ran for president, rose when she was Secretary of State, and has now settled back in what we might think of as the partisan zone of around 50 percent. The vast majority of Democrats and Democratic-leaning independents view her favorably, while the vast majority of Republicans and Republican-leaning independents don't. Any change will come only at the margins.

Right now, both Clinton and her detractors are probably thinking there's something unfair about this email story. Clinton probably thinks it's been overblown, just like so many fake scandals she's suffered through before, while her opponents probably think the public isn't taking it as seriously as they should. There are ways in which they may both have a point.

Consider that when the story broke, many in the media justified the blanket coverage it received on the basis that it "plays into a narrative" — in other words, before they could determine whether it had any merit, they would run with it because it dovetailed with stories of the past.

But in fact, there's another narrative at work. It's a narrative in which she or her husband get accused of something, it gets a lot of coverage, Republicans express outrage, and then in the end it turns out to be somewhere between unimportant and completely meaningless, both substantively and politically. The public is quite familiar with that narrative, too.

Does that mean she'll get off relatively easy for things that would torpedo a different politician's candidacy? It could. But right or wrong, there will be an awfully high bar to clear before a controversy has a real impact on

Poll: the only presidential contender more popular than Hillary Clinton is Ben Carson (Vox)

By Andrew Prokop

March 13, 2015

Vox

As the 2016 presidential hopefuls move closer to officially announcing, a new Gallup poll explores 16 top contenders' favorability ratings. Hillary Clinton is near the front of the pack, with net favorability of +11 — topped only by Dr. Ben Carson, who gets +12.

The major difference between Clinton and Carson, as you can see in this chart, is that Clinton is extremely well known — 89 percent of the public says they know enough to have an opinion on her. Carson, however, is one of the least-known candidates, with only 28 percent. The other candidates fall in the middle. Theoretically, this means the other candidates have more room to grow, since views on Clinton are set.

But often, potential candidates who aren't well known to the public start out with very few people disliking them. What's striking about this chart is that so few of the less well-known candidates this year start off with strongly positive net favorability.

For comparison, in a 2007 CBS poll taken as candidates were preparing to officially announce, Rudy Giuliani, John McCain, Barack Obama, and John Edwards all had net favorability exceeding +13, as you can see below.

This time around, no Republican except Carson scores even close to there, and the others fall into two groups. One batch starts off with slightly positive net favorability — this is Marco Rubio, Mike Huckabee, Jeb Bush, Rand Paul, Scott Walker, and Bobby Jindal. Candidates in the other group — Chris Christie, Ted Cruz, Rick Santorum, and Rick Perry — start off with more Americans disliking them than liking them, a tough hurdle to surmount.

Potential rivals to Clinton get little good news here. Even Elizabeth Warren starts out with a meager +3 net favorability, well behind Obama's +18 rating in 2007. The others — Joe Biden, Bernie Sanders, and Jim Webb — don't manage positive ratings at all.

It is worth noting that only part of Gallup's poll was conducted after the Clinton email story broke, so it's at least possible that a newer poll would find her ratings have sunk. But a Pew poll found that only 17 of respondents said they were following the email story very closely — and those were overwhelmingly Republicans and conservatives, who already dislike Clinton.

You Won't Be Surprised To Hear That Hillary Clinton's Emails Are More Divisive Than Ever (Huffington Post)

By Ariel Edwards Levy

March 13, 2015

Huffington Post

After a week of stories about Hillary Clinton's use of email during her time as secretary of state, the controversy is more polarizing than ever. A new poll shows that Republicans are increasingly convinced of the issue's importance and Democrats are increasingly sure that the media is overhyping things, while independents remain somewhere in between.

In the aftermath of Clinton's press conference Tuesday, during which she fielded a number of questions about her use of a personal email account, attention to the story has continued to grow, a new HuffPost/YouGov poll finds. Sixty-five percent of Americans now say they're following the story at least somewhat closely, up from 53 percent in a survey last week. The percent of Americans who call the issue at least somewhat serious has also ticked up, from 47 percent to 54 percent.

Perhaps not surprisingly, the gulf between Republicans' and Democrats' views of the situation has grown as well.

In the earlier poll, Republicans were 27 points more likely than Democrats to consider the email issue "very serious." That partisan gap now stands at 52 points, with members of the two parties moving in opposite directions.

Democrats, many of whom were convinced during the 2008 campaign that the media was biased against Clinton, are becoming more likely to view the controversy over the emails as overhyped. Seventy-one percent now say the media is making too big a deal out of the story, up 9 points from last week. A majority of Republicans, by contrast, continue to think the story isn't getting enough attention. Independents, who were closely divided last week in their opinions about the media response, are now more 8 points more likely to say the media is overhyping the controversy than to say it's being under-reported.

That doesn't mean independents aren't at all concerned. Thirty-four percent of political independents now say Clinton's use of a personal account is very serious, up 8 points since last week. But those independents are also the least likely to be paying much attention, with 57 percent saying they're following the email story at least somewhat closely, compared to 78 percent of Republicans and 68 percent of Democrats.

There's not yet much data to indicate whether the saga has affected Clinton's ratings, but the numbers that are available suggest it may have taken a small toll. In the latest HuffPost/YouGov poll, the former secretary of state is just underwater, with 44 percent rating her positively and 45 percent negatively. That's near the bottom of where's she's stood since the 2014 midterm elections, according to a series of YouGov/Economist polls using the same question and methodology. Those polls have found Clinton's favorable rating ranging between 43 percent and 52 percent.

The HuffPost/YouGov poll consisted of 1,000 completed interviews conducted March 11-13 among U.S. adults using a sample selected from YouGov's opt-in online panel to match the demographics and other characteristics of the adult U.S. population.

The Huffington Post has teamed up with YouGov to conduct daily opinion polls. You can learn more about this project and take part in YouGov's nationally representative opinion polling. Data from all HuffPost/YouGov polls can be found here.

More details on the poll's methodology are available here.

Most surveys report a margin of error that represents some, but not all, potential survey errors. YouGov's reports include a model-based margin of error, which rests on a specific set of statistical assumptions about the selected sample, rather than the standard methodology for random probability sampling. If these assumptions are wrong, the model-based margin of error may also be inaccurate.

Jerry Brown says challenging Hillary Clinton is like challenging Jerry Brown (The Washington Post)

By Phillip Rucker

March 13, 2015

The Washington Post

On paper, Jerry Brown looks like he could give Hillary Rodham Clinton a scare. He's a governor with a compelling record of fixing California's budget and reviving the biggest state's economy. He's admired by liberals for his work to combat climate change and address immigration laws. And he caught the presidential bug long ago, running for the White House three times.

So why is Brown not stepping forward to challenge Clinton for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2016?

"Running against Hillary is like running against Jerry Brown in California," Brown, 76, said in an interview Friday at The Washington Post. "In the Democratic Party, it's not going to happen. You reach a certain point of party loyalty and it's very powerful."

In a wide-ranging interview with Post reporters, Brown said Clinton enjoys "the power of incumbency" as President Obama's former secretary of state and heir apparent. A primary challenge to her, he said, "doesn't look like a fruitful use of my time."

"I would say she's extremely formidable and it doesn't appear that there's anything that would block her path," Brown added.

Brown disagreed with some leading Democrats who believe a strong primary challenge would actually benefit Clinton by helping her get into fighting strength before she faces the eventual Republican nominee in the general election.

"Primary oppositions are not helpful," Brown said, recalling his own 2010 race for governor when former eBay chief executive Meg Whitman was wounded after veering right in her rhetoric and positions to fend off a primary challenge from Steve Poizner.

"Some people think that strengthens the process or helps the candidate go through his or her paces," Brown said. But, he said, "the truth is it's not helpful. The real competition has to start right away with a Republican-Democratic difference. There's plenty there to create conflict and debate and do whatever you have to do to get ready for the November election. You can do that facing off against the Republican opponents, of which there's so many, and there's so many stupid things they're saying. That's a far better place than cutting nuanced differences with some Democratic insurgent."

That Brown is advocating an unobstructed glide path for Clinton to the Democratic nomination might come as a surprise given his own history. In 1992, Brown was Bill Clinton's most persistent and pesky Democratic primary opponent and for months refused to endorse him.

Asked in Friday's interview about the state of his relationship with the Clintons, Brown said very little. "It's all been written about," he said. An aide reminded Brown that he had met with Bill and Hillary several times over the past few years.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“We come from different parts of the country,” Brown said. “I think I occupy a unique part of the party, and I don’t find too many people in the same place....It’s a very small part of the party, unfortunately.”

Brown is in his second stint as California governor, after serving between 1975 and 1983, and has also been state attorney general and mayor of Oakland. He said he has more of a “western sensibility,” especially on environmental issues.

When asked about the recent controversy over Hillary Clinton’s use of a private e-mail account as secretary of state, Brown said he is not convinced the issue is a passing storm, as many other Democrats contend.

“I don’t know that,” Brown said. “With these things, what makes a difference, you often don’t know until it unfolds because nothing is just what it is. It’s always in part of a larger context. Things unfold and things happen.”

Jerry Brown: Leave Hillary Clinton alone (Politico)

By Edward-Isaac Dovere

March 13, 2015

Politico

Jerry Brown ran against Bill Clinton in the 1992 Democratic primaries. Now he doesn't think anyone should run against Hillary Clinton when she seeks the nomination next year.

"I can't think of anything I'd rather have less if I were running for president than to have a competitor in the primary," the California governor said, speaking to reporters at the White House on Friday afternoon following a series of meetings with staff about climate change.

Brown said he didn't see the need for an internal party fight. What he wants, he said, is Clinton knocking the GOP field on immigration reform, Obamacare, climate change and other differences.

"The primaries get into all the little nuances and small differences of candidates of the same party," Brown said. "What Hillary needs is a good debate drawing the distinctions between where she stands and where all these Republicans, these wannabes running around."

He took particular aim at the lawsuit from many Republican governors and attorneys general challenging President Barack Obama's immigration executive actions, calling their position "at best troglodyte, and at worst, un-Christian."

All the more reason, Brown said, to focus on the fight with the other party, and not within his own.

"There's some big differences, and they're more with the Republicans. So let's have the debate and let's see where America wants to be," Brown said. "I don't think running some couple of Democrats would illuminate the process."

Brown didn't meet with Obama, who was in Los Angeles on Friday, or with Vice President Joe Biden, who's vacationing in the Virgin Islands.

8 Must-Know Stats About Women's Rights Around The World From Hillary Clinton's "No Ceilings" Report (Bustle)
By Kristen Sollee
March 13, 2015
Bustle

Although Hillary Clinton's email account has been making headlines, her foundation's "No Ceilings" report on the status of women's rights around the world is in dire need of the spotlight. Twenty years ago at the United Nations' 4th World Conference On Women in Beijing, First Lady Clinton famously said, "If there is one message that echoes from this conference, let it be that human rights are women's rights and women's rights are human rights, once and for all." This simple yet radical statement bears repeating (and repeating), and so the Clinton Foundation along with the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation compiled The Full Participation Report to flesh out all the ways women's rights have changed since the former Secretary of State's 1995 pronouncement.

The weighty report is packed with statistics on the health, occupation, education and safety of women around the world, from America to Zimbabwe to Pakistan and Brazil. Although it includes a dizzying array of facts and charts, the entire compendium is worth reading, if only to get a sense of how far women have come over the past twenty years — and how very far we still need to go.

These are 8 vital facts of many that you should know about global women's rights today.

1. Rates of Death During Childbirth Have Decreased
Let's start with some good news: according to the report, the rate of women who die in childbirth has gone down by 40 percent in 76 countries and by almost 60 percent in South Asia from 1995 to 2013. This rate is directly linked to education, as the more education a woman has, the less likely she or her child is to die during childbirth.

2. The Wage Gap Ranges From 10-40%
In high-income countries, men make around 15 percent more than women do. The wage gap is as low as 6 percent in Belgium and as high as 37 percent in South Korea. The gap tends to increase during a woman's childbearing and childrearing years, which the report calls a "motherhood penalty."

3. 1 In 3 Women Experience Sexual or Physical Violence
And you thought the campus rape statistics in the United States were horrifying. Of these 1 in 3 women who experience sexual and physical violence, a majority of them suffer at the hands of their partner.

4. Spousal Abuse Is Still Considered Acceptable
Cultural attitudes greatly shape how men and women view spousal abuse. According to data collected in the report, more than half the men in Algeria, Bahrain, Egypt, India, Iraq, Nigeria, the Philippines, Rwanda, South Africa, and Zimbabwe believe beating their wives is sometimes acceptable. In addition, a recent U.N. study of 10,000 men in Bangladesh, Cambodia, China, Indonesia, Sri Lanka, and Papua New Guinea felt it was their right to have sex regardless of whether a woman provides consent.

5. More Women Are Enrolled In College and Universities Than Men
Women have made major gains around the world in tertiary education since 1995. In regions across Europe, North America, and Latin America, women are lapping men in college enrollment — but not necessarily in all majors. The STEM fields remain a problem, and in 2010, women in the U.S. earned approximately 18 percent of computer science bachelor degrees, down from a high of 37 percent in 1984.

6. 2/3 of Illiterate People In The World Are Women
As women have made gains in education, their literacy rates have also risen globally, reaching a high of 80 percent in 2012. However, of those that remain illiterate in the world, 2/3 are women.

7. Women Are Majorly Underrepresented in STEM Fields
It's no secret that women are majorly underrepresented in science, technology, engineering and math, and there is still an uphill battle ahead. The report suggests that "gender stereotypes, cultural barriers, and poor-quality education have contributed to low participation rates for women in STEM In 2010."

8. Women Are Living Longer Than Ever
As The Full Participation Report emphasizes, there are many challenges facing women around the world— but longevity isn't one of them. Since 1995, a woman's life expectancy has risen from 69 years to 73 years in 2012.

Even in developing nations, there has been a 14 percent increase in life expectancy across the board.

Webb said he wouldn't have voted for war in Iraq, wouldn't have authorized the intervention in Libya and will not support Iran having any possibility of getting a nuclear weapon.

He didn't name us, and the first two things are not inaccurate, so I don't think it's worth putting anything out, but just flagging.

John --

Sunday is the last quarterly deadline we have to meet before Election Day. As of today, we are $25,243 short of our goal. But I am determined to show our opponent that we won't let his corporate cronies and Super PAC's buy another election.

Goal Thermomete

Are you up for this? Click here to help us match Hurt's corporate money with people power.

Your support means so much to me and so many fellow Virginians. We have already come so far -- 10 offices up and running, our ads have hit the airwaves and we're on track to do more than 400 events. But to keep it up, I need you do more for us by Sunday's deadline.

Today is the day you can show the power of our grassroots movement -- act now by donating right away.

I'm not just asking you to dig deep to pay for another ad or score another political point. I'm asking you to help send me to Congress to fight for you -- not another tax break for billionaires, but an agenda that helps Virginia families get a fair chance at a better future.

With your support, this could be our best quarter yet.

Mr. Podesta:

I'm sure you receive lots of emails so I will get to my reason for writing.

I'm concerned that in the discussion over global warming we have avoided any reference to nuclear energy as a way to curb carbon emissions. I understand that the current generation of high pressure reactors are difficult to like and politically radioactive. But we are failing to pursue an American technology developed at Oak Ridge in the late 1960's that promises to provide efficient (97%) energy that is virtually impossible to weaponize. This technology is the molten salt reactor.

I have no stake in the nuclear industry. I'm a retired patent attorney with a profound interest in protecting the planet. I'm just frustrated that the politics of energy are driving policy away from a solution that deserves at least to be considered before being dismissed.

I have attached a simple article on the slim hope that you will receive this and take a moment to read it. The article doesn't do the subject justice but it may whet your appetite for more.

Eric Garcetti FOR MAYOR 2013

Friends,

Big news from this weekend!
I was blown away by the turnout of volunteers that came to our neighborhood walk on Saturday. Our office was packed with Angelenos from all corners of the city ready to knock on doors and make calls. This is how I know we'll win this campaign -- by talking to people in every neighborhood, from every background, and letting them know that Los Angeles can still be a great city.

This is only the beginning. Sign up for a volunteer shift today.

Also, the LA League of Conservation Voters has endorsed my campaign for LA Mayor! I want to thank LALCV for endorsing my agenda to make LA a national leader on environmental protection and innovation -- creating 20,000 solar installation, energy efficiency, green manufacturing and water conservation jobs and making the LADWP both coal and nuclear free.

Read more about their endorsement here .

Will you join LA's environmental leaders in supporting my campaign? Click here to add your name to our endorsement list, and forward this email to your friends.

Finally, the Latino Democratic Club of the San Fernando Valley announced they have endorsed my campaign as well. I'm proud to have earned the endorsement of the Latino Democrats of the San Fernando Valley. I grew up in the Valley and I'm excited to see the Latino community in the Valley supporting me.

I'm so grateful for all your support. All your work is making a big

Hi John -- Good seeing you the other day, and hope you had a good Thanksgiving.

I asked John Deutch if he had any thoughts about what a global technology initiative might look like, and he sent the attached note for you to take a look at. He makes the case that the focus should be on CCS, and told me that nuclear he thought too expensive and solar was progressing on its own. If you are interested in him thinking about what exactly the shape of an initiative might be, he'll want to hear from you directly.

Let me know if there's anyone else you think that I should solicit ideas on this from at at this stage.

@BrianEFallon on Medium: 'Clinton Cash' & NYT Fail to Prove Any Connection Between Hillary Clinton & Russian Purchase of Uranium Assets

Relying largely on research from the conservative author of Clinton Cash, today's New York Times alleges that donations to the Clinton Foundation coincided with the U.S. government's 2010 approval of the sale of a company known as Uranium One to the Russian government. Without presenting any direct evidence in support of the claim, the Times story—like the book on which it is based—wrongly suggests that Hillary Clinton's State Department pushed for the sale's approval to reward donors who had a financial interest in the deal. Ironically, buried within the story is original reporting that debunks the allegation that then-Secretary Clinton played any role in the review of the sale.

The Times' own public editor has taken issue with the paper's arrangement with the author of Clinton Cash, saying, "The Times should have been much more clear with readers about the nature of this arrangement" and "I still don't like the way it looked." It certainly doesn't look any better that the lead Times reporter appeared in a taped interview for a Fox News documentary attacking the Clintons on this matter prior to receiving our responses to her questions.

The facts drawn from the Times' own reporting undermine the innuendo in the Times story about Hillary Clinton's role in this matter.

1. The essential fact is that Hillary Clinton was not involved in the State Department's review of the sale to the Russians. While it is true that the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

State Department sits on the multi-agency, inter-governmental panel that reviews deals like this one, Hillary Clinton herself did not participate in the review or direct the Department to take any position on the sale of Uranium One. This is consistent with past practice; historically, matters pertaining to the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States (C.F.I.U.S.) do not rise to the Secretary's level. Rather, it is the Assistant Secretary of State for Economic, Energy and Business Affairs who serves as the State Department's principal representative to C.F.I.U.S. The individual who held that post in 2010 was Jose Fernandez, and he has personally attested that then-Secretary Clinton never interfered with him, saying "Mrs. Clinton never intervened with me on any C.F.I.U.S. matter."

2. The main Clinton Foundation donor that the Times suggests stood to gain from the sale of Uranium One to the Russians had actually sold his stake in the company three years earlier. In its article, the Times focuses on Frank Giustra, a Canadian businessman and known philanthropist whose donations to the Clinton Foundation date back to 2005. It is true that Mr. Giustra was the owner of a predecessor firm to Uranium One, the company whose sale was being reviewed by C.F.I.U.S. But by the time of Uranium One's proposed sale in 2010, Mr. Giustra no longer held a position with the company. In fact, as he told the Times, he had liquidated his stake in Uranium One entirely back in 2007 and thus had no reason to have sought any favor from Clinton's State Department.

3. A second Clinton Foundation donor referenced in the Times has specifically said he never spoke to her about the deal. In addition to Mr. Giustra himself, the Times points to a second Clinton Foundation donor and longtime business associate of Mr. Giustra by the name of Ian Telfer. It is true that, unlike Mr. Giustra, Telfer—as the acting head of Uranium One in 2010—had a financial interest in the company's sale to the Russians. It is also true that he had previously donated to the Clinton-Giustra Sustainable Growth Initiative. But in a statement to the Times, Telfer told the paper he made the donations based on his wish to personally support Mr. Giustra in his charitable work, not based on any relationship to the Clintons. And most importantly, he told the Times that he never spoke to either President Clinton or then-Secretary Clinton about his company, Uranium One.

4. The Times fails to accurately describe the process, ignoring the fact that the State Department was just one of nine agencies involved in the U.S. government's review of the sale of Uranium One. In addition to the fact that Hillary Clinton herself did not have a role in the State Department's review of the deal, the Department itself was just one player—and not even a major one—in the C.F.I.U.S. process. It is the Treasury Department that serves as the lead agency in all C.F.I.U.S. matters, and seven other U.S. agencies besides State—including the Departments of Justice, Energy and Commerce—sit on the panel. To the extent a deal like the sale of Uranium One could be said to raise any national security concerns, both the Departments of Defense and Homeland Security also sit on the panel, and would have been party to the overall approval. Moreover, the 2010 sale of Uranium One was approved by more than just C.F.I.U.S. It was also green-lighted by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, Utah Department of Radiation and the Canadian government. In addition, the Union of Concerned Scientists affirmed that the deal did not raise national security concerns.

5. The Times ignores that U.S. regulators accepted a subsequent sale of the remaining stake in Uranium One to Russia after Clinton left the State Department. The 2010 sale at issue in the Times story involved the Russians purchasing a 51 percent stake in Uranium One. But nearly three years later, the company announced that the Russians would be increasing their ownership to 100 percent. The company notified U.S. regulators of this in late January 2013, giving those bodies the opportunity to subject the new transaction to a review. Both the NRC and C.F.I.U.S. declined to do so, which was tantamount to green-lighting the deal. Notably this acceptance of the Russians' complete takeover of Uranium One came after Secretary Clinton exited the State Department.

The Note: The Politics of Mass Shootings

October, 02, 2015 10:02 AM
By MICHAEL FALCONE

NOTABLES

--PRESIDENT OBAMA LAMENTS MASS SHOOTINGS BECOMING 'ROUTINE': A grim-faced and emotional President Obama spoke out Thursday after the massacre at an Oregon college -- lamenting that mass killings have become "routine" in the United States and blasting those who oppose tougher gun laws. "I hope and pray that I don't have to come out again in my tenure as president to offer my condolences to families under these circumstances. But based on my experience as president, I can't guarantee that," Obama said in the White House briefing room, ABC's ALI WEINBERG reports. "Someone will comment and say, 'Obama politicized this issue.' Well, this is something we should politicize," he said. "It is relevant to our common life together, to the body politic." Rather than shying away from the political dimension to mass shootings, the president leaned in to it, saying that Thursday's events were direct products of political decisions -- those made by lawmakers and by those who elect them. "We collectively are answerable to those families, who lose their loved ones because of our inaction," he said. http://abcn.ws/1OKpgoZ

--HILLARY CLINTON APPEARS TO SUPPORT A NO-FLY ZONE IN SYRIA: In what would be a break from the White House, Hillary Clinton appears to be backing a no-fly zone over Syria. In the interview with Boston's NBC affiliate yesterday, she said the following when asked about Syria: "I personally would be advocating now for a no-fly zone and humanitarian corridors to try to stop the carnage on the ground and from the air, to try to provide some way to take stock of what's happening, to try to stem the flow of refugees."

--SO DOES JOHN KASICH : Republican presidential candidate John Kasich will this morning call for the United States and its allies in the Middle East and Western Europe to designate no-fly zones in parts of Syria, Kasich campaign spokesman Scott Milburn told ABC's BEN GITTLESON. The Ohio governor will tie his pronouncement to Russia's recent military activity in Syria and his worry about potential further escalation, according to a statement provide to Reuters whose accuracy was confirmed by Milburn. Reuters first reported the news. Read more: http://reut.rs/1iQEdYU

--ANALYSIS -- ABC's RICK KLEIN : Which is more surprising -- that Bernie Sanders is within financial striking distance of Hillary Clinton, or that he's within polling striking distance without spending any of that cash on ads? What's clear is that one avenue for Clinton to beat Sanders -- for Sanders to beat himself by running out of cash after the first round of early states -- is now closed. Sanders has his war chest, and an ability to replenish it via small-dollar donors that the Clinton apparatus can't match. What's becoming clear is that any strategy that depends on outside money to boost a candidate is basing that strategy on hope, not history. If anything, this election cycle has shown the limits of Super PACs -- think Rick Perry and Scott Walker. The Clinton campaign has weapons left to deploy, including, of course, Bill Clinton. But the point is that it's increasingly likely those weapons will have to come out during the primary season.

Sunday on "This Week."

WILL HE OR WON'T HE? BIDEN STILL HAS ABOUT ONE MORE MONTH TO MAKE UP HIS MIND. Vice President Joe Biden is still deciding whether to jump into the 2016 presidential race -- but how much longer can he go before he's forced to make the leap? The "maybe" candidate is benefiting from the speculation in the media for now, but filing deadlines to get on early primary ballots that could force the vice president's hand are already right around the corner. The first deadline for Democratic candidates -- and perhaps the absolute moment of truth for Joe Biden -- is just five weeks away: a Nov. 6 deadline to get on the Alabama ballot. The problem snowballs from there. ABC'S MADISON JAROS and RYAN STRUYK have more. http://abcn.ws/1j3xCvc

TODAY ON THE TRAIL with ABC'S SHUSHANNAH WALSHE: Hillary Clinton will be in Florida--another critical state--this afternoon speaking at a "grassroots event" in Davie in South Florida. And just off her backing a no-fly zone over Syria yesterday, she will also do an interview with Telemundo in Miami. Ben Carson and Marco Rubio are both in Iowa. Carson has three events today all in or around Des Moines. Carly Fiorina and Jeb Bush are in South Carolina. This afternoon Bush attends the Conservative Leadership project Forum in Greenville. Ted Cruz and John Kasich are in New Hampshire, both with jam packed days. Cruz holds a press conference in Nashua this morning and this afternoon will attend the Deerfield Fair with his wife. This evening he attends a house party in Salem. Bill Clinton is on the stump today attending the Democrats Annual Jefferson Jackson Dinner Celebration this evening in Charleston.

PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES OFFER SUPPORT FOR VICTIMS OF OREGON SHOOTING. In the wake of a mass shooting yesterday at Umpqua Community College in Oregon, a number of presidential candidates took to social media to offer their thoughts and prayers to the victims and their loved ones. Jeb Bush was the first to take to Twitter to respond and following her event in Boston, Massachusetts on Thursday, Democratic candidate Hillary Clinton said it was "beyond my comprehension that we are seeing these mass murders happen again and again and again." ABC's VERONICA STRACQUALURSI has more. http://abcn.ws/1FJ6s6M

HOW TED CRUZ, RAND PAUL FRIENDSHIP IS TURNING NASTY. It was May 2012 and Sen. Rand Paul took the stage at a tea party rally in Texas, telling the crowd he wanted to introduce them to a "gentleman" and a "friend" who he joked might be "too smart to be in the U.S. Senate," but who would take seriously the oath to defend the Constitution. Back then, Paul offered gushing endorsement of a Texan named Ted Cruz who was in the midst of a tough Senate race. "I want to introduce at this point in time hopefully the next senator from Texas," Paul told the audience. Cruz shook Paul's hand, declaring "God Bless Rand Paul." ABC's JESSICA HOPPER has more on how their once-supportive relationship appears to be turning into a fierce rivalry. http://abcn.ws/1JGW4au

WHY BEN CARSON KEEPS TALKING ABOUT HITLER. Ben Carson has been talking about Hitler a lot lately on the campaign trail. Yes, Hitler. ABC's KATHERINE FAULDERS reports, the retired neurosurgeon and GOP front-runner is attempting to send a clear message to his supporters: Nazi Germany can happen in America. Carson's campaign acknowledges the political perils associated with speaking of Nazi Germany and Hitler, and concedes that Carson should probably find a better example to make the same point. ;http://abcn.ws/1FLqblW

AL GORE WON'T GIVE OUTRIGHT 'NO' TO PRESIDENTIAL BID. Is Al Gore running in 2016? According to ABC's ALANA ABRAMSON, he's been asked repeatedly --and often gives the same answer --but it is never a straight up "no." "I am a recovering politician. The longer I go without a relapse the less likely one becomes," the former Vice President and 2000 Presidential candidate told the Atlantic's James Fallows at the Washington Ideas Forum. Gore admitted that he had overused this answer, but said, "I'm gonna give it anyway." http://abcn.ws/1KU3iK7 attacks on Russian President Vladimir Putin. The Florida senator will use a foreign-policy forum in this first-in-the-nation caucus state to outline a series of steps he would take as president to isolate Mr. Putin and his inner circle in the escalating standoff between the two Cold War foes. Mr. Rubio will call for new sanctions against top Russian officials and companies, including oil and gas giant Gazprom. He will promise to provide arms and intelligence to Ukraine. And he will vow to work with European allies to exclude Russia from an exchange that allows banks to transfer money across borders."

WHAT WE'RE READING

"CAN DONALD TRUMP SEAL THE DEAL WITH EVANGELICALS?" by The Christian Broadcasting Network's DAVID BRODY: ";Donald Trump has proven the political world wrong. Not only has his iconic name and 'GOP frontrunner' appeared in the same sentence, they've stayed together. And his support is attracting evangelicals too, or as he likes to say, 'I'm leading with the evangelicals big league!' It's true. Poll after poll shows Trump ahead among 'self-identified' evangelicals. ... However, with proven evangelical-type candidates already out there like Carson, Cruz and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, Trump has some work to do." http://bit.ly/1PSldUN

Giuliani:

Hillary, Rudy May Know Life After Death (Real Clear Politics, 12/5/07)
It now seems possible, and some would say probable, that both front-runners for their party nominations will be wiped out in the early caucuses and primaries. It may well be that neither Hillary Clinton nor Rudy Giuliani win anything before the Florida primary on Jan. 29.

Giuliani No Longer Heads Consultant (AP, 12/4/07)
Republican presidential hopeful Rudy Giuliani has stepped down as head of his consulting firm, Giuliani Partners, after months of refusing to disclose the firm's clients or the role he played.

Giuliani Steps Back From Firm (NY Times, 12/4/07)
Will Rudolph W. Giuliani's decision to pull back from the direct management of his consulting and law firms insulate him from questions about the firms' activities? His presidential campaign has repeatedly faced questions about the firms' work for its clients.

Giuliani's stock dropping (Boston Globe, 12/4/07)
Enduring the worst week of his presidential campaign, Rudy Giuliani's stock is beginning to plummet in national polls, none more than the Rasmussen Reports daily tracking survey, which today reported that Giuliani has dropped from clear-cut national leader to a tie with surging Mike Huckabee.

Romney:

Romney Faces New Questions on Illegal Workers at Landscaping Firm (NY Times, 12/5/07)
Mitt Romney, who has relentlessly wielded the issue of illegal immigration against his rivals for the Republican presidential nomination in the past few months, is facing an embarrassing new revelation that the landscaping company at his home in Massachusetts was found for a second time to be employing illegal immigrants.

Poll Shows Romney with Wide Lead in New Hampshire (Washington Post, 12/5/07)
Former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney holds a wide lead over his Republican rivals in New Hampshire, where he is seen as the strongest leader and most electable presidential candidate in the field, but the GOP race there remains unsettled a month before the nation's first primary, according to a new Washington Post-ABC News poll.

Mitt Romney Is No Jack Kennedy (NY Times Op-ed, 12/5/07)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Inevitably, Mitt Romney's long-awaited speech on faith and religious freedom tomorrow at the George Bush Presidential Library at Texas A&M will be compared to John F. Kennedy's 1960 speech to Protestant ministers in Houston, just 90 miles away. Also like Kennedy, Mr. Romney realizes — and polls demonstrate — that a sizable number of voters (again, mostly Southern white Protestants) oppose him because of his religion.

Authenticity is Romney's biggest hurdle, poll suggests (LA Times, 12/5/07)
With a massive marketing effort, Mitt Romney has tried to introduce himself as a family man with a solid marriage, five wholesome sons and the moral values desired by the Republican Party's most conservative voters.

Silent on religion, Romney sticks to budget (Concord Monitor, 12/5/07)

Two days before a long-awaited speech on religion, politics and his Mormon faith, Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney spent a low-key lunchtime yesterday at Concord's Cat 'n' Fiddle restaurant touting his call to cut taxes and spending.

Romney to walk fine line in Mormon speech (Reuters, 12/4/07)
From baptism of the dead to a ban on coffee, Mormonism's doctrines are alien to many Americans and that is unlikely to change when Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney gives a long-awaited speech on his faith this week, religious scholars say.

Romney used ad group behind Huckabee (AP, 12/4/07)
The political ad company that Republican Mitt Romney's presidential campaign says is violating the law with phone calls in support of rival Mike Huckabee is the same firm Romney employed in August to place calls on his behalf before the Iowa straw poll.

Poll: Romney, Huckabee even in Iowa (AP, 12/4/07)
Huckabee has rocketed into contention on the strength of his support from the state's white evangelicals, who comprise 38 percent of its Republicans. He leads Romney among evangelicals by nearly two-to-one - the same margin by which Romney leads him with everyone else.

Thompson:

Thompson and Social Security (Washington Times, 12/5/07)
With the caucuses and primaries fast approaching, presidential candidates are beginning to focus on policy. Former Sen. Fred Thompson spoke recently on Social Security reform. And he should be commended for offering a solution — but not for the solution he offered.

Poll: GOP Presidential Race Tied in SC (AP, 12/4/07)
The Jan. 19 South Carolina contest stands as a three-way tie - and one or more other candidates could be in contention, too. It is the best of the three important early voting states for Thompson, who has a modest lead among men and less-educated Republicans.

Huckabee:

In Iowa, They Like Mike (Washington Post, 12/5/07)
With evangelicals expected to comprise four in 10 Republican caucusgoers, voters such as Williams hold the key to a Huckabee victory -- and they could deliver it. Huckabee: Built for both the pulpit and politics (CNN, 12/4/07)
When you sit down with Mike Huckabee and his inner circle, as I did the other day, you know at once that his is a tough, savvy crew – fast becoming as potent in the pews of the evangelical churches as George W. Bush's was in 2000 and 2004. Having vaulted to the lead in Iowa, Huckabee now is aiming for his next big score: an endorsement from Dr. James Dobson, the king of Christian radio.

McCain's MTV Moment (NY Times, 12/4/07)
The room was done up MTV style: flashy graphics, loud colors and the kind of soft lighting more befitting a late-night lounge than a policy forum… But when Senator John McCain appeared at the third presidential forum hosted by MTV and MYspace, foreign policy dominated the hour-long session…There was a condemnation of the Bush Administration's failure to address the issue of climate change and promise to make it a top priority.

Main Topics: Rick Davis, Nancy Pfotenhauer, Tucker Bounds Push the McCain-Palin Reform/Change Ticket, McCain Surges in Polls, Bob Woodward's Book

Summary of Shift:

Top political coverage today stemmed from new polls out that reveal a surge of enthusiasm for the McCain-Palin ticket, that has put Obama behind by four points, but within the margin of error. While McCain may be ahead nationally in the polls, in the key battleground states and in the Electoral College, Obama appears to have the edge and be closer to the 270 votes needed. Surrogates, Rick Davis, Nancy Pfotenhauer, and Tucker Bounds made the rounds heavily pushing the McCain-Palin ticket as the campaign of reform and change. A investigative piece on Sarah Palin's circle of friends reveals that even those closest to her may not vote for her due to her socially conservative record. Lastly, Bob Woodward has a new book out that portrays Bush acting alone in pursuing the surge and lying to the American people on the necessity of listening to the commanders on the ground.

Hurricane Ivan causes mandatory evacuation of the Florida Keys. Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac have officially been bailed out and taken over by the government, resulting in upward markets in the US and abroad. American missiles continue to target Taliban militants inside Pakistan. OPEC considers cutting oil production due to claims of too much supply.

Remember, when you have a campaign that's run by lobbyists […] What the McCain campaign strategy really is to ask voters to suspend disbelief and believe that this man who votes with Bush, is of the same party, has been in Washington for 25 years, is going to bring about change. I think in the end that's not going to work."

Rick Davis Discusses Sarah Palin, Her Reform Credentials, Her Ties to Lobbyists and earmarks, and Her Media Exposure (FNC 09/07/08 6:20pm)

CHRIS MATTHEWS: As a matter of personal privilege I'm going to give you the opportunity to respond to David Axelrod who said for all the talk about wait until we come and shake up this lobbyists and the campaign team of McCain is filled with lobbyists, in your case former lobbyists and how do you respond.

RICK DAVIS: I think that it's just more of the same from David Axelrod and they have been running on ghosts of the past all along and I think it just shows they don't really have anything to talk about. If they want to run against Rick Davis or our campaign staff, let them, I think it is hilarious and is a wonderful distraction from the real issues we are trying to debate. It's a classic example of a campaign without anything else to say, so they pick on staff.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MATTHEWS: Let's turn to the choice of Sarah Palin as the running mate. What does she add to the ticket? Does she bring new states into play? How will use her.

DAVIS: I think she's exactly what we need to really focus the public's attention on the fact the brand of John McCain, the maverick, the independent, the guy who has been railing against corruption, and ethics abuses in Washington and who wants to reform government, and she reinforces that and it is a wonderful thing for our campaign to be able to get this kind of attention on our ticket coming out of the convention and we've had wonderful events and fantastic rallies and people are excited about this ticket. And this is a ticket that will govern Washington.

MATTHEWS: But aren't you vastly exaggerating her record as a reformer? Take a look. As mayor of Wasilla she hired a Washington lobbyist and got $27 million in earmarks and in her less than two years as governor, Alaska has asked for $589 million in pork-barrel projects. Her record as a reform, particularly on the issue of earmarks, is far from clean.

DAVIS: Well, let's be clear about this. When she was mayor of Wasilla, there were already people in place who were getting those grants from the federal government and small towns do a lot of that kind of activity.

MATTHEWS: She did hire a lobbyist.

DAVIS: The projects you talk about. These were not projects that she tried to get. These were projects the republican establishment in Alaska who she campaigned against and beat many times over were the ones picking up those grants and she vetoed more bills and cut back on more pork barrel spending in the state legislature than any other previous governor. She converted that legislator into reform because she passed ethics reforms and corruption reforms. She railed against the establishment, in Alaska and was able to accomplish great things, passing a significant energy bill that allowed them to create a natural gas pipeline and these are all things that a true reformer is able to accomplish and so, I don't disagree with the fact that there were pork-barrel projects coming to Alaska but not from her. Within the state legislature she beat back those efforts.

MATTHEWS: First of all, as governor, Alaska, during her one-and-a-half, two years as governor, Alaska continued to get more federal money for park barrel projects per capita than any state in the country. […] And she supported the bridge to nowhere and it was only after the federal government dropped it out and killed it, the congress killed, that she then opposed it and in fact still got the money for the approach, the ramp to the bridge to nowhere.

DAVIS: Congress didn't beat back the bridge to nowhere. That funding was in the grant and she said I'm not spending that money and what they did, they took a $500 million bridge and she turned it into a 2 million dollar ferry and that's what she did on her own without help from anybody else.

MATTHEWS: Actually it was congress that killed the money for the bridge to nowhere. Governor Palin has given some very good speeches this week and everybody, republican or democrat, would say that she was very effective at the republican convention. She's not answered a single question from the national media. When will she agree to an interview?

DAVIS: She'll agree to an interview when we think it's time and when she feels comfortable doing it. […] It's not like there is no information about Sarah Palin, the governor, the mother, the agent for change. And there is plenty out there. I don't think our campaign is the campaign that has not given immense amount of access to the press, that is the Obama campaign.

MATTHEWS: Why is she scared to answer questions?

DAVIS: She's not scared to answer questions. But you know what? We run or campaign, not the news media and we'll do things on our timetable and honestly, this last week was not an exemplary moment for the news media. So why do we want to throw her into a cycle of piranhas called the news media who have nothing better to ask questions about than her personal life and children and I think our attitude would be, let it pass.

MATTHEWS: I think there are legitimate questions that, and it doesn't have to be a huge news conference and I'm not telling you ho to run your campaign, legitimate questions, is she or is she not ready to be commander-in-chief, if last week didn't work, why not this week?

DAVIS: Sarah Palin will have the opportunity to speak to the American people. She just gave a speech, to 40 million Americans in her convention. She's in the process of, you know, getting to know people out on the campaign trail and she will do interviews. But she'll do them on the terms and conditions of which the campaign decides that it is ready to do it. And Chris all due respect, I mean, the information the news media has been putting out on Sarah Palin is not objective journalism and until the point in time we feel like the news media will treat her with a level of respect and deference, I think it would be fool hardy to put her into that environment.

MATTHEWS: […] My point is there are legitimate questions to ask, whether fox or anybody else, about is she ready to be president, what does she know about foreign policy?

DAVIS: Absolutely, no question about that and she will be available to the news media, when and if we decide that that is going to be the case.

MATTHWEWS: So you are not willing at this point to say when?

DAVIS: No.

Rick Davis Discusses His Comments on Obama's Muslim and Radical Connections (FNC 09/07/08 6:30pm)
MATTHEWS: Let's get back to your comment last week, I discussed with David Axelrod and up on the screen, the election is not about issues. This election is about a composite view of what people take away from these candidates. […] Do you want to focus on personalities or a composite view of the candidates, not issues because of the fact, for instance we have 6.1% unemployment, the highest in five years?

DAVIS: No, Chris and what you didn't show on the screen was the next sentence, which is, the composite view is made up of people's values. It is made up of their opinions and made up of their judgment and their principles and so, then I let -- then the next sentence says and of course, issues will play an important role in people's final decision. So I respect the fact that the Obama campaign has some kind of a -- you know, obsession about rick Davis and I have been the focus of their advertising and now, their candidate seems to be wanting to attack me more than anybody else. That's fine, the water is warm and I'm happy to go toe-to-toe but to insinuate yesterday on the stump somehow those comments implied that I was going to, you know, indicate that he was going to have these Muslim connections or that he had these radical relationships, is absolutely out of control.

MATTHEWS: Wait, the Muslim thing may not be fair, your campaign has talked about the fact that he had a relationship with William Ayers.

DAVIS: But did the quote indicate that.

MATTHEWS: Well, the radical connections, that is what William Ayres is.

DAVIS: Where in the quote is radical connections?

MATTHEWS: You just quoted what Obama said on the trail.

DAVIS: Absolutely, yesterday, against my quote, he said this what is they are saying, by saying that it's about personalities. I didn't even say personalities, he is not correct in the way he's quoting me and he tries to use that to try and scare me and he says they'll tell you we'll try to scare people and they'll tell you that, you know, I have Muslim connections. Well, this is the same construct he's done before. He's trying to play victim and I don't think it is very flattering on his part.

Rick Davis Discusses How McCain Will Bring Change and How He Is Different Than Bush (FNC 09/07/08 6:40pm)
MATTHEWS: Okay, McCain keeps talk about change is coming. But in all the big bread and butter issues, taxes, social security, energy, trade, health care, there really are not big differences between John McCain and George Bush.

DAVIS: Oh, I think change is coming. I mean, look at George bush couldn't get anything done on social security. I mean, I think that is a fundamental difference between john McCain and George bush in the sense that I think john McCain's approach to social security, getting democrats to come over to the white house and sit down and get a deal so we can take it off the table, so that not only the people who are currently getting social security, can feel like they are safe and secure, but, all those people in the pipeline to receive it in the future know what their benefits will be and what it will cost.

MATTHEWS: Wait, let's take social security as an example. In fact, McCain's social security plan is almost identical to George w. Bush's, he's talking about some reform of the system, plus private accounts and you will never get private accounts through a democratic congress.

DAVIS: The difference is the approach and George Bush said, take it or lift, here's the way we do it, private accounts first and the balance of the social security system has to be fixed in the process. John McCain says exactly the opposite, and says, give me the leadership of congress, republicans or democrats, I don't care. Come over to the white house and sit down and let's find out a way to take off the table and once we satisfy the American public that we fixed the social security system, well into the future, then let's sit down and look at Medicare and Medicaid. because those are the things that are sapping our federal budget. So, what is the difference? And I think is an important difference, and it is changed politically, is john McCain has a history of getting things done, in congress, by sitting down with people who are part of the solution, not part of the problem. He'll sit down with democrats, independence, republicans, alike and say, we have got to change the system. He has a long history of doing that and nobody passed more bipartisan reforms in congress than john McCain. And he'll do it as president.

MATTHEWS: So you are willing to concede his starting out point is very similar to George w. Bush's, on all of these bread and butter issues, but the difference is the approach and how he deals with Congress?

DAVIS: I think there are lots of differences in some of the bread and butter issues. I think our approach on taxes and trade, even though as a republican, are very similar to George Bush, we have different proposals today. I mean, look, most importantly we have different proposals than Barack Obama, who has this somehow believes that raising taxes will cure an ailing economy, I mean, you know, economics 101 tells don't raise taxes into a recession and john McCain said over and over and we have to get more money into the pockets of the American public.

MATTHEWS: I want to you to talk strategy over the next 58 days and lets put up Karl Rove's electoral map, which shows Obama leads in states with 260 electoral votes, again 270 needed to win the presidency. Obviously it is still fluid but doesn't Obama have many more ways to get to 270 when you look at the map, than you do?

DAVIS: No, I think maps are maps and polls are polls and we are not worried and if we worried about polls we would have given up a year ago. What is amazing about that map, in my opinion, is Colorado. The democrats just spent tens of millions, maybe $100 million, in Colorado with their convention, and they dominated the news media for weeks at a time and John McCain just went into Colorado and had a huge rally incredibly enthusiastic support and even though the democrats have spent tens of millions of dollars in a state that is a clear targeted state, they weren't able to move it into their column.

MATTHEWS: […] If you had to frame in one or two sentences the choice that you want voters to have on their minds on election day, what would it be?

DAVIS: Well, I think it was really exemplified in the conventions. Our convention focused on putting the country first and John McCain has always put his country first, throughout his career. And willing to sacrifice his own political interests for the country at large. The Obama convention, it was all me first and Barack Obama is putting himself ahead of the democratic party and ahead of the country's interests and ahead of his party's interests and that is a history in a way he's conducted himself in his public life that I think is a clear difference between the two candidates.

Rick Davis Answers Questions on Palin's Earmarks, Obama's Radical Connections, and Talks Strategy
(MSNBC 09/08/08 8:26am)
MIKA BRZENISKI: Did you hear David Axelrod on our show about 30 minutes ago?

RICK DAVIS: no, no, I didn't hear David.

BRZENISKI: He was pointing out governor Palin's record seems to contradict her image that's being painted there in the campaign as a change agent. Saying that as mayor of Wasilla, she hired a Washington lobbyist, that perhaps she asked for over $500 million in pork barrel projects during her 1 ½ years as governor, and so on and so on. Does her record back up the label, change agent?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

DAVIS: I didn't hear David but I listened to your clip from Barack Obama railing about earmarks. I had to stop myself from laughing before I got on. Here is a guy who personally asked for over $1 billion worth of earmarks, including some that went directly to the hospital where his wife works. And he's talking about how somehow that we're casting a different light on this issue. That's the most hypocritical thing I ever heard in my life.

BRZENISKI: The one thing I'm seeing between these campaigns, now they have each other on the experience issue and feel like they can go after each other on the experience. Barack Obama versus Palin's. Being a Washington insider, Joe Biden versus John McCain. Now the word "change" being switched about. Are we going to see a difference between these campaigns or is the point here to muddy the waters?

DAVIS: I think that the Obama campaign is clearly on the defense, especially as regards to their only real theme in their campaign, which is change. The problem is they look anything but change. They spent the entire month on the attack. They've not had a single positive message to put out there. Then when they have the best opportunity there is to show whether they are willing to really change anything, Barack Obama, in what is singularly the most important decision he had to possibly make as a candidate for president, picks Joe Biden, which is probably the least change that you could possibly have in the selection of a vice presidential candidate. Then they complain viciously because John McCain actually reaches out to a real reformer, someone who has actually shaken up the old boy network, someone who campaigned against the ethnics and corruption abuses in politics, and all of a sudden, who looks more like change than Barack Obama? John McCain.

ANDREA MITCHELL: Let me ask you about the choice of Palin, which clearly seems to be giving the republican ticket a good bounce. You've come out of the convention and she is getting a lot of excitement and enthusiasm. Getting back to what Mika suggested, she did hire a lobbyist, she did go after earmarks for her town of Wasilla. So how do you square that circle?

DAVIS: Look, when she was the mayor of a small town in Alaska, there was a practice that existed before she ever got there to use as many national and federal grants as they could to fund that town. And like many other towns around the country, it's the only way they can compete for funding. So I think that's exactly what it appears to be. It was a practice that while she was mayor they did away with and did not replicate when she was governor. I think it was the kind of thing that is a good lessons learned. I think the experience we ought to be pointing to is she cast away those kinds of actions later on in her career. In fact, when you look at her governances as governor of the state of Alaska, she cut pork out of the budget significantly. Wielded the veto pen line item more than any other governor in Alaskan history. The track record you ought to be looking at, instead of following up on these points the Obama people make. It's interesting. They complain initially being the mayor of a small town in Wasilla, Alaska didn't give her enough experience to be able to have a seat on this ticket. When they found out that people rejected that notion as being ridiculous since it was on par with the kind of experience that the top of their ticket Barack Obama had, now they are trying to undermine her experiences as a mayor. I just think, look what's their message? Do they have anything they are actually going to do for the country or spend the next couple of months running down our candidates?

PAT BUCHANAN: You are quoted saying this election is not about issues. This election is about a composite view of what people take away from these candidates. Is it basically the strategy of the campaign to say, look, we've got John McCain, the war hero, the old warrior, the man who's been there fighting and a real reformer and a maverick? And we've got this enormously exciting personality. And take a look at our two candidates as persons and their two candidates and ask, which of the two are equipped to lead the country? Which of the two do you want to lead the country, rather than focusing on the Bush-Cheney record?

DAVIS: The first thing is, it's amazing to me that Barack Obama would spend his time attacking Rick Davis. I was jumping for joy the day I saw that happen. But at least get the quote right. The quote is, and "the Washington post" is the one who had this, it says not only that the election is about the composite view people take away from these candidates. Then I say in the same sentence their values, their character, their opinions and their principles, all that go into the great rinse cycle of politics, obviously in the same sentence, issues have a big bearing on that. If Barack Obama is going to start quoting Rick Davis, I suggest he get the quote right. He said it was issues and not issues, but personality. I don't see personality in that at all. The other thing that just is amazing to me, is he then said that quote had something to do with me saying somehow that meant I was going to try to scare people or somehow Barack Obama's got Muslim connections or that he hangs around with radicals. I've got to tell you, I've been around this track in politics a long time but that is a leap of faith that requires a lot of introspection. What is he trying to do there? I don't understand the tactic he takes. Obviously, issues play an important role. But I don't think voters are solely issue voters. Pat, if you believe they don't take into consideration the values of the candidate, the character of the candidate, the candidate's opinions and principles, and then I would be shocked to think otherwise.

MITCHELL: Rick, were you just putting the Muslim thing up there? Were you just tossing that up there?

DAVIS: No, what Barack Obama said when he attacked me on this quote, he said that it -- direct quote, they say this isn't about issues it's about personalities. What they are really saying is that we are going to try to scare people about Barack. He goes on to say, "So we're going to say maybe he's got Muslim connections or we are going to say he hangs around with radicals. He is not patriotic." that is a Barack Obama quote about my quote. That is a leap of faith, in my book.

BRZENISKI: What do you think you are really doing here?

DAVIS: I think they just realized that these hollow themes that they tried to put out about change and about hope -- look, they are good themes if they are backed up with real substance. What John McCain is doing is going around talking about ways to fix the economy, ways to fix the energy situation. He's actually put out specific proposals on doing that. And he's connecting with the American public. What they are realizing is the hollow promises aren't cutting it. Now all of a sudden they are looking at being behind and they are scared and attacking. That's the only option they have left in their mind.

Headline #2
Nancy Pfotenhauer Attempts to Define McCain as the Agent of Change, and How He is No Bush (MSNBC 09/08/08 9:53am)
TAMRON HALL: […] how is the McCain campaign defining change?

NANCY PFOTENHAUER: Well, it's really who will reform Washington, DC? Who will take on then entrenched special interests and challenge them and drain the swamp, if you will. And there's only one ticket out that will do that and that has a record of being willing to buck their own party when necessary and that's john McCain and Sarah Palin. They have both done it. John McCain here in our nation's capitol and as he said, he has the scars to prove it. And Sarah Palin in a state where then entrenched powers were just about as dug in as you can imagine and that woman took them on and she racked up a pretty high score of wins.

HALL: Senator Joe Biden said yesterday in Montana that McCain and Palin may change the feel of politics but he has not heard a single thing on issues that affect every day people's lives. Healthcare, and jobs, what change to McCain and Palin bring on those topics?

PFOTENHUAER: I think they're just manufacturing their own feedback, if you will. I actually heard I think it was Gibbons claim there wasn't any discussion of policy at the convention when we were getting criticism for senator McCain's speech being so rife with policy. Let's take it issue by issue. Let's talk about protecting the taxpayers. You've got john McCain who's never asked for an earmark in his political career. You've got Barack Obama, in the three short years he's been here, request almost a billion dollars, including a million for his wife's employer, and 3.4 million for Biden's son's lobbying firm. You have corruption. John McCain taking on even the Abramoff scandal. The 9/11 commission.

HALL: Specifically Joe Biden said health care and jobs. What can you say with that?

PFOTENHAUER: Let's talk healthcare. Senator McCain's health care plan, $5,000 tax credit for families. $2,500 tax credit for individuals so that if you do not have a job, if your employer doesn't offer you health insurance, you have an option to do it. We're going to introduce competition across state lines that doesn't exist right now to lower health care costs. We're going to get millions and millions who were uninsured on the ranks of the insured as well as improving care and efficiency. From the standpoint of jobs, Senator McCain is going to keep taxes low and he's going to lower federal spending and increase export markets open to trade. That is the recipe for prosperity whether you try it here or abroad. Barack Obama is going to raise taxes, he's going to increase spending, and he's rattling sabers about undoing trade agreements with our largest trading partners.

HALL: […] Nancy, there is no question, the Obama campaign is trying to tie McCain directly to the past eight years of republican policy. What can you tell our viewers who were listening closely to what you're saying about how John McCain administration would be different or do think differently.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

PFOTENHAUER: First of all you got Barack Obama who has the most liberal voting record in the US Senate. So the only change he's going to bring is higher spending, more government intervention and lower job creation. But to get to your point, Senator McCain has got an energy plan very different from the White House's energy plan. That's why he voted against the last energy bill that Barack Obama voted for. He's got a tax plan that's different from the current approach and that it lowers what is the second highest largest corporate rate or business rate in the world. That's why we're losing jobs overseas. Senator Obama wants to keep us with that burden on our backs.

HALL: What about the Obama campaign saying that he voted with bush 90%of the time? How do you refute that?

PFOTENHAUER: He voted with the democratic congress that has got a lower approval rating, over 90% of the time, more than Senator McCain. The question is, when you needed to challenge the status quo, who did it? That's john McCain. Barack Obama has never bucked his own party to put the country first and do anything difficult. He's got like three meager things to list. One, the nuclear issue was a voice vote. The other, an ethics reform, 96-0, because he carried his party leadership water and watered it down. He has no record. He voted present 130 times in the Illinois state legislature because he wouldn't take on a tough issue. That's not change. That's politics as usual.

Tucker Bounds Talks About McCain's Enthusiastic, Reform Ticket, Sarah Palin's Media Access, and Stolen INVESCO Field Flags (FNC 09/07/08 1:30pm)
BRIAN WILSON: A couple of minutes ago, new information coming in indicates there may well be voter next couple of days you may see the revelation of a major McCain-Palin bounce. Is this what you are picking up in your internal polling?

TUCKER BOUNDS: We are seeing a little bit of a surge in enthusiasm, to be entirely honest. I expect there will be a certain bounce in the polls. I think that is attributed to voters are starting to zero in on the two candidates and they recognizing that John McCain with governor Palin on the ticket, is a ticket about reform, with records of reform, and about making change, where as Barack Obama's ticket represents a lot of rhetoric and talk about change without a track record of actually doing so. Voters are dialing in now that we are out of the conventions and into the final stretch of the general election, voters are getting to take notice of the actual records of the candidates.

WILSON: But if this is right you could well be outside the margin of error leading Barack Obama for the first time in this campaign, that has got to be exciting for you.

BOUNDS: Well, it's exciting, but we're cautiously optimistic. It's a terrible election climate for republicans. We understand that, but we also understand we are running with a different type of republican. John McCain has shown time and time again that he is willing to buck his own party to make change, to make reforms. He has a record of actually doing it. This is going to be a change election, people want a new chapter in the white house and they want someone that has prove than they can do it, work in a bipartisan way and get rid of the rancor in Washington. That's the record John McCain has.

WILSON: Sarah Palin, a lot of questions about when you are going to put her out and let people actually ask her questions.

BOUNDS: Certainly, there are going to get questions. There has been clamoring in the media. […] We are looking forward to having some interviews and she will talk with the media, absolutely. It is a lot of speculation and the chattering clash in Washington, but at the end of the day whether she is talking to reporters or directly to voters, her record is of reforming government, making change. She has a great civic story. She is an incredible candidate and we are excited to have her on the ticket. I think all Americans and the media will be excited to see what they find.

WILSON: Colorado Springs yesterday, the McCain campaign and some supporters passed out flags that you say were rescued from INVESCO after the democratic national convention. The democrats say they weren't rescued, those McCain people stole our flags. Which is it, tucker?

BOUNDS: We are under the understanding there is a vendor at INVESCO Field that found the flags in garbage backs in and around dumpsters and brought them to the McCain campaign. We pledged to rescue them, to put them to good use. […] We will move those to memorial services and appropriate uses. What you are seeing out of the democratic national convention was a little bit of crisis control. They may have made a mistake and probably recognized it but we enjoyed using the flags and respecting them as appropriate.

Bob Woodward on Bush's Failings in Iraq (NBC 09/08/08 8:52am)
MATT LAUER: […] This is a harsh look at an administration and the president who you say, "was rarely the voice of realism on the Iraq War and too often failed to lead." […] when you say he wasn't the voice of realism, did he mislead intentionally or was he himself given bad information, that he then moved on to the American people?

BOB WOODWARD: Over the six-month period, before he announced the surge, he knew it was not working, and he would go out and say we are winning. there are meetings. […] In July '06, when they're looking at the strategy in detail, he turns it over to his national security adviser, Steve Hadley, who quizzes the Iraq commander and then Secretary of Defense Rumsfeld.

LAUER: So early in the summer of 2006, when he comes out and says "we are winning the war," yet, you write about a conversation where Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice says that the way don Rumsfeld was running the defense department, they were giving the president "fables" about Iraq.

WOODWARD: That's right. the information is -- they're optimistic, they hope to withdraw, they have that strategy of let's train the Iraqis, and then they realize it's not working, and the level of violence was just staggering in that country.

LAUER: The surge in 2007 in January, it was very controversial within the administration. There's some people who said bad idea. Let's not send 30,000 additional troops there. And there were military leaders who said, Mr. president, reluctantly, we could give you two brigades, and the president decided in the end to send five brigades. I had mixed feelings when I read this. First of all, President Bush often said to the American people, I'm going to make decisions on troop strength based on what I hear from my commanders on the ground. Are you telling me he ignored the advice of those commanders?

WOODWARD: He overruled them. As he saw it, it was the only alternative. And they told him -- I mean, the joint chiefs, the top military people, the head of the Army kept saying, you don't have enough time, you don't have force to do this. And of course, he was right, and the solution was to extend the tours in Iraq for the troops to 15 months.

LAUER: […] when you say in that first quote […] "all too often failed to lead," well, this is an example of leadership, though, in some strange way, isn't it? Some advisers are saying don't go with the surge. Military people are saying two brigades, not five. and he said, no, I'm going to go all in on this. I'm doubling down -- I think you even quoted, something you put in the book. That is leadership, like it or not, isn't it?

WOODWARD: […] for instance, when I interviewed him, he just said, Hadley, his national security adviser, drove this. He said, you know, when I asked, did you give them a deadline? People are dying. And he said, no, I don't think I did. This is nothing you hurry.

LAUER: You talk about this surge and its success, […] and you say one of the reasons might not be troop strength on the ground. It might be breakthrough in techniques in covert tactics that are being used to seek out and kill insurgent leaders. […] Are these game-changing tactics?

WOODWARD: Yeah, I think they are. In a statement Friday, the white house for the first time said they're newly developed techniques and operations that contributed to the drop in violence.

LAUER: Are they applicable elsewhere outside of Iraq in the overall War on Terror?

WOODWARD: Yeah, I believe so. I mean, this is -- remember World War II they had the Manhattan project for the a-bomb, and all of a sudden, the a-bomb was used in Japan twice and the war was over. They have developed some breakthrough techniques, which can't be talked about, because to talk about them is to alert the other side. You used the right word, they're game-changers.

LAUER: […] You write the following "as I complete the fourth book on President Bush and his wars, I keep returning to key questions. Most important, how did Bush perform as commander in chief? Has the president set up and enforced a decision-making system worthy of the sacrifices he's asked of others, particularly the men and women of the U.S. military and their families?" […]

WOODWARD: It's a sacred duty being commander in chief. We're going to elect a new one in a couple of months. When we are at war, what's your expectation of the Commander in Chief? That he's on duty all the time, working day and night to fix it. there was a six-month period here when the president of the united states knew it was not working, knew it was failing, and there was this slow process, no hurry. President not at some of the key meetings at the same time, he decided to do something that indeed helped and has worked, but there are other factors in all of this. […]

New McCain/Palin Ad Analyzed on Fox and Friends (FNC 09/08/08 8:16am)
STEVE DOOCY: Very effective ad?

KT MCFARLAN: Absolutely. You know, the choice of Palin is what ha really changed this whole race because it lets McCain be McCain. John McCain gets up in the morning looking for enemies to slay, bad guy, corrupt guys, pork barrel spenders, and she just doubles him up. And that's what this ad is all about.

KIRSTEN POWERS: It's obviously a very powerful ad because it's where the mood of the country is right now. It's that they want change, that's why Obama's been so popular, and they want things to be different, they want people who are going to come in and up end things in Washington. So, I think that they're going right at that message.

DAN: I do think it's an effective ad, but to quote Sarah Palin's line, instead of lipstick and a pit bull, this is lipstick on a pig. The McCain campaign has saddled with the Bush administration. […] It has nothing to do with Sarah Palin, it has to do with the Bush administration. The best thing the McCain campaign can do is change the subject from the fact that they're basically embraced the Bush administration right down the line on economic policy, on tax policy, and all they can do is hope that people aren't paying attention. And this ad is designed to kind of change the subject.

ANTHONY HOLM: This is a situation of legitimate reformers who have a history of reforming within their own party, which is why the bowling moms in the Mid-West are cluing in and coming here. These people, you can look at their history and say wow, they've done reform. We need, we have dysfunctional government at all levels, unlike Obama and Biden who have talked about change but haven't actually instituted it. This is legitimate reformers.

[…]

POWERS: She's definitely connecting with a lot of people and I think as a woman, regardless of who you support, I think she's someone to be proud of. She's someone who is balancing a family, she has a husband who's helping at home with the kids, she's very successful, and she's incredible. She's an incredible speaker, I don't agree with her politics necessarily, but I think that she's somebody that a lot of women can identify with.

MCFADDEN: […] It cuts beyond party lines, this is a women thing where you're a woman before you're a candidate, before you're a democrat, before you're a republican, and she really has tapped into a vain of most working women and mothers.

Conservative Blogger Attempts to Identify Fact v. Fiction on Sarah Palin Rumors (FNC 09/08/08 9:20am)
BILL HEMMER: What have you found there Charlie?

CHARLIE MARTIN: So far, I have got about 71 of them. 71 rumors or pieces of rumors about Sarah Palin. And of those 71 are rumors, almost all of them turn out to either be simply scurrilous or to be things that have been sort of taken out of context. Some of them, of course, are true. Her daughter is pregnant. She is the governor of Alaska, not the lieutenant governor, not the mayor of Wasilla still. And a lot of them have been really outrageous. Andrew Sullivan was pushing the one about her new son, trig, being actually her daughter's son. And there was no evidence for that. But there was some fuss about it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

HEMMER: This is your own version of the stop the smears campaign which was initiated by the Obama team about six months ago. This is what you're doing for Sarah Palin now.

MARTIN: That's effectively it, and I have been accumulating every rumor I've got to try to track them down.

HEMMER: Is it personal, is it directed at her family, or is it directed on the issues surrounding Governor Palin?

MARTIN: The rumors are pretty uniformly personal. Although a few of them do have issue components. For instance, there is talk about what has been the controversy in Wasilla about the sports center. Yes, indeed, she did push through a sports center that has caused Wasilla to have a bunch of long-term debt, something like $15 million. But, as I said on my site, how did you buy your house? It is not the sort of thing buy by saving up for it, and cities have trouble saving up anyway.

HEMMER: What kind of reaction are you getting? Hearing it from both sides?

MARTIN: I am hearing it from both sides. I'm getting less reaction from the left than I expected, although I suspect that might change now. And a lot of reaction from a lot of the right hand side that has been very favorable. In fact, I was picked up by several of the biggest blogs, Weekly Standard, National Review, as being the go-to guy for the list. They have led me to new rumors and to more information refuting rumors.

Chuck Todd Breaks Down the Battleground States and Possible Breakdowns of Election Map (MSNBC 09/08/08 9:25am)

CHUCK TODD: […] A new battleground map, where the states are, which ones are leaning Obama, which ones are leaning McCain, and what does the toss-ups look like. […] Here's what it looks like today, September 8th. Here are the big changes, Missouri, we move from toss up to lean McCain. This is Governor Palin and Governor Palin alone that moves Missouri back into the Republican column. Wisconsin, another state that for some reason Obama can't quite put away, moving from lean Obama back to toss-up. But here's some good news for Obama, Pennsylvania, a state that we have yet to see a poll in months showing McCain ahead, the pick of Joe Biden probably solidified southeast Pennsylvania, and that's why we've moved it into lean Obama. That gives our grand total, 228 for Obama, 200 for McCain, 110 electoral votes in the battleground. So the battleground shrinking ever so slightly. One footnote, we almost moved North Carolina to toss up. Not there yet, because again, we've yet to see a poll showing Obama ahead in that state.

TAMRON HALL: You got to look at how the Electoral College votes could shape out.

TODD: Well, it's interesting. […] Nevada, that's a state that might, right now, have McCain slightly ahead by a point or two. Wisconsin, yes we've moved it from lean Obama to toss-up, but again he's probably got a two or three point lead. Florida, a state that's with McCain. New Hampshire and Ohio are pure toss-ups right now. Colorado, pure toss-up. New Mexico, that might be the state we move next from toss-up into lean Obama. Michigan, […] that one probably still slightly leaning democrat. So that puts four states pure toss-ups, 46. So here would be our numbers if this were a week before the election, 260 for Obama, 232 for McCain. Well, why are these numbers important? Well, let's take a look. Obviously, Obama needs 10. Well, what happens if he only gets 9. Here's your nightmare scenario. 9 for Obama and the other three go to McCain, and this is where we get our electoral tie. […] It does show that every electoral vote then matters. New Hampshire's four becomes as important as Ohio's twenty because that would be what puts Obama over that 270 mark.

McCain Adviser Was Lobbyist for Georgia (WSJ 8/11/08)
By MARY JACOBY
John McCain's top foreign-policy adviser, Randy Scheunemann, is a leading expert on U.S.-allied Georgia -- and was a paid lobbyist for the former Soviet republic until March, in the run-up to what has become a major battle between Georgia and Russia. ...But given the rapid escalation of the fighting, and the fact that Georgia is being viewed as a victim of its neighbor's aggression, Mr. Scheunemann's ties to the small nation and its pro-Western Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili may look less like a weakness and more like a strength in the first foreign-policy crisis of the general election campaign.

By Ben Smith
Russia and Georgia stayed at the top of the news today, and the McCain campaign is touting its man's "prescience" — he's never trusted Putin or the Russians, and he, and Randy Scheunemann, were talking like they knew Thursday night's conflict would be a pretext for a wider Russian invasion before virtually any other world leader would say that publicly. (The 1999 video above, in which McCain talks about Russia and Georgia, offers a glimpse of his enduring view.) When Russian troops rolled into South Ossetia on Friday, Senator John McCain's response was immediate and tough. Russia had crossed "an internationally recognized border into the sovereign territory of Georgia" and should "unconditionally cease its military operations and withdraw all forces," said Mr. McCain, the presumptive Republican presidential nominee, in a statement delivered at an airport. Senator Barack Obama, his Democratic rival, trod more carefully, a characteristic of his approach to foreign affairs.

Lost in the irony of McCain's Moses ad (Boston Globe 8/11/08)
By James Carroll
'WE THINK it's got a lot of humor in it," John McCain said about his campaign ad that mocks Barack Obama as Moses. "We're having fun," he added, "and enjoying it." Presumably, the fun resided in the advertisement's portrait of the Democrat before worshipful crowds, a dishonest use of Obama's own self-mockery, and a clip of Charlton Heston parting the Red Sea. When explaining himself, though, McCain did not seem to be having fun. Called upon to defend the ad, there was a snide, unhappy edge to his now familiar smile, which combines a sinister inauthenticity with nervous insecurity. McCain's grimace is to smiling what his ad is to humor.

Race Is In Holding Pattern For Now (Washington Post 8/10/08)
By Dan Balz; A06
The opening round of the general-election campaign between Barack Obama and John McCain has produced memorable images, negative ads, snarling e-mails and pointed exchanges over war, the economy and energy. What it has not done is begin to resolve questions among voters that both candidates must address to win in November.

Home state racial issues test McCain (Boston Globe 8/10/08)
By Sasha Issenberg
Black community recalls senator as aloof ... When McCain, who made public efforts to ensure that Latinos were represented on his congressional staff, was asked at a 1986 forum at Phoenix's Southminster Presbyterian Church why he had failed to do the same with blacks, he responded that he had yet to identify an African-American qualified for the job, according to two attendees. (McCain's campaign did not deny this account.)

McCain holds off backing 'Gang of 10' energy plan (The Hill 8/10/08)

Republican Sen. John McCain is not ready to embrace a bipartisan energy plan that could complicate his presidential campaign if Democrats advance the bill weeks before the November elections. The bill is being drafted by some of his closest allies, including Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), and offers a compromise on the roiling issue of offshore drilling.

A good question: "How can someone being portrayed as "the biggest celebrity in the world" also be painted as radical and out of the mainstream? One year ago, it seemed reasonable to hope that the mortgage crisis would be contained. Since then, just about everything that could go wrong has gone wrong. An August Paris? (Washington Times 8/11/08)
Thanks to Paris Hilton for showing us just how silly and ridiculous this election was becoming and trying to get it back on track. Unfortunately, all the attention she brought with her response to John McCain's "celebrity" ads criticizing Barack Obama has convinced the McCain campaign that this election will be won by the candidate who gets the most YouTube hits. McCain strategists were giddy that they beat Mr. Obama on Internet page views of his YouTube channel the past few weeks, as, Stephen Dinan reported in our Thursday editions: "I think we knew it would draw some attention. I don't think we knew it would be as big a hit on YouTube," said McCain spokesman Brian Rogers.

RNC aims at Obama's elite education (Politico 8/9/08)
By Ryan Grim
Even as Barack Obama takes eight days off from the campaign trail to vacation in Hawaii, where he lived for much of his youth, the Republican National Committee is again attempting to paint the Democrat as an out-of-touch elitist, this time in a mock "Barack Obama's Hawaii Travel Guide" tweaking the Democrat for having attended an elite prep school there.

Strong Energy Measures Wanted (Washington Post 8/10/08)
By Jon Cohen and Paul Kane; A08
A new national poll shows broad public support for government action in the face of $4-a-gallon gas and other energy concerns, giving Republicans a rare opening to go on the offensive against congressional Democrats and Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.). Nearly two-thirds of Americans now put a priority on "finding new sources of energy" over improving conservation -- a significant shift since 2001 -- and majorities support all of the five potential federal initiatives tested in a new ABC News poll.

Susan,
I think we should not alter your format. Fine to go ahead and complete in that fashion. I t would be useful to have Jim's overview follow more closely the template we sent. At least it ought to cover the topics included in the template. Sorry for the delay.

Big Donors and Lobbyists Sculpt McCain Energy Policy

Washington, DC – Campaign Money Watch, a campaign finance watchdog group, criticized Sen. John McCain's (R-AZ) energy policy, including a reversal of his earlier stance on off-shore oil drilling, as too tied to his big money donors and lobbyists.

"John McCain's big money donors and lobbyist friends have struck again," said David Donnelly, director of Campaign Money Watch. "McCain's reversal on off-shore drilling is a blatant pitch for donations at today's Houston fundraising events."

McCain's speech on energy policy, which he is scheduled to deliver today in Houston, comes on the same day that Campaign Money Watch is releasing a report on McCain's connections to the energy sector, including the oil, gas and nuclear power industries. The report can be viewed at http://www.campaignmoney.org/mccainenergy.

Analyzing data from the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics, Campaign Money Watch found that McCain has raised more than $2.1 million from the energy and natural resources sector since 1989, nearly half of which came from the oil and gas industries. His dependence on money from energy companies has soared during the 2008 campaign, with the oil and gas, electric and other energy industries giving far more to McCain this year alone than they did between 1989 and 2006.

The report also found that many energy lobbyists occupy top positions in McCain's campaign, including top strategist Charlie Black, congressional liaison John Green, national finance director Susan Nelson and deputy campaign manager Christian Ferry.

Campaign Money Watch is a project of the nonpartisan Public Campaign Action Fund. The organization works to hold candidates who are against reform accountable for where they get their political donations.

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE CONTACT: Jeremy Funk, 202.470.5878
DATE: August 8th, 2008

In Case You Missed It – From Today's New York Times Editorial: 'Time for Iraq to Pay the Bill':

> Federal analysts reported Tuesday that the oil market has produced a bonanza for Iraq, which has the third-largest reserves in the world. The report, by the Government Accountability Office, said that from 2005 to the end of this year, Iraq is expected to have earned at least $156 billion in oil revenues and amassed a budget surplus that could go as high as $79 billion. Roughly $29 billion of that surplus is piling up in Iraqi banks as well as in a fund at the Federal Reserve Bank of New York that was supposed to be used for Iraqi development....[B]etween 2005 and 2007, when all that oil revenue was piling up, only $3.9 billion of Iraq's budget went to reconstruction. An even tinier amount went to maintaining United States and Iraqi-financed projects like roads, bridges, buildings, water and electrical installations.

John McCain Was Wrong About Being "Greeted as Liberators" in Iraq

McCain Said "The Iraqi People Will Greet Us As Liberators." While appearing on NBC's The Today Show, McCain said, "But I believe, Katie, that the Iraqi people will greet us as liberators. I believe that they will have an opportunity over time, and it will be difficult, to realize the same hopes and dreams and aspirations that every person in the world has and deserves the opportunity to live in a free and open society." [NBC, "The Today Show," 3/20/03; emphasis added]

He Was Wrong About WMD

McCain: Hussein Continues To Acquire, Amass And Improve On His Arsenal of Weapons of Mass Destruction. During a floor debate on the floor of the senate, McCain said, "Saddam Hussein continues to acquire, amass, and improve on his arsenal of weapons of mass destruction. He continues to attempt to acquire a nuclear weapon. These are all well-known facts. So if you believe that Saddam Hussein....is not going to abandon his request for his weapons, then the longer we wait, the more dangerous he becomes." [Asheville Citizen-Times, 10/13/02; emphasis added]

He Was Wrong About "Mission Accomplished" in Iraq

McCain Said Capture Of Saddam Hussein Was A "Mission Accomplished." During an interview on ABC News "This Week" McCain was asked about the capture of Saddam Hussein and the effect on US Forces. McCain said, "Their morale could not be higher. This is a mission accomplished. They know how much influence Saddam Hussein had on the Iraqi people, how much more difficult it made to get their cooperation. Every member of the military and civilian over there are rejoicing today. It was interesting to see Ambassador Bremer's emotion. It was well- deserved." [ABC, "This Week," 12/14/03; emphasis added]

And Now John McCain Was Wrong About the Iraqi Government Using Its Huge Oil Revenues for Reconstruction

McCain Said Iraqi Oil Reserves Would Cover The Cost of War. During an interview with National Journal, McCain said, "Everybody now is talking of post-Saddam Hussein Iraq. I look on it with optimism and hope. As far as the cost is concerned, Iraqis have vast oil reserves and they, I'm sure, would shoulder the cost of the transition." [National Journal, 2/15/03]

McCain: "Post-Saddam Hussein Iraq Is Going To Be Paid For By The Iraqis." During an appearance on Fox's "Hannity & Colmes," McCain said, "But post-Saddam Hussein Iraq going to be paid for by the Iraqis. They have billions of dollars of income. They have vast oil reserves. And I think they will pay for it." [Fox News, "Hannity & Colmes," 2/21/03]

The Iraqi Government Wants Us to Leave – So Do the American People…

…Yet, After Eating Crow Time and Again on Iraq, John McCain's Judgment Tells Him to Keep Spending $12 Billion a Month There Keeping U.S. Troops in the Crosshairs of Iraqi Civil Conflicts for '100 Years' or More – to Keep Short Changing So Many Priorities Here at Home -- to Keep Making Us Less Safe By Stretching Out Military to the Breaking Point in Iraq While Keeping the Eye Off the Ball in Afghanistan

"Can I say, right now, we need judgment. We need judgment. We live in a very, very dangerous and challenging world." – John McCain, 1/28/08

Hi Doug,

You may have received a voice mail from me on your cell phone, but I wanted to send congratulations to President Clinton on securing the release of the two American journalists. I would also like to ask whether it would be possible to help move ahead my request to interview Kim Jong Il. I know you accompanied the President on this fascinating trip. Getting a first hand look and feel for Kim Jong Il is incredibly valuable. I myself have been to Pyongyang with the NY Philharmonic last year, and later in June '08 as one of a very small group of journalists invited to witness and report the destruction of the Yongbyon cooling tower. During my trip I was the only journalist to hold an exclusive meeting with Kim Gae Gwan, the chief nuclear negotiator who welcomed President Clinton upon his arrival.

I pressed my case for an interview then and am obviously keen to keep doing so.

I have a new program that launches September 21st, nightly in Prime Time on CNN International and weekly on CNNUSA. If it were on air now I would have tried my best for President Clinton of course, and I extend a standing invitation for him to appear on my program. If there are any leads with the North Korean leadership you could help me pursue, I would be most grateful.

Jamie sends his best as do I

We had a terrific call today with John Podesta and Governor Dukakis and the Greek American community. Some participants are asking for a position paper/memo on where Secretary stands on some key issues.

I've been leading the EU/Russia sub-group effort on the migration crisis, so I have a good idea of how you are formatting the framing memos. This would be a little different, but would you let me take a crack at a 1 pager on issues important to the community, that they can use with their networks?

We would also like to let call participants know that something is coming, if that works for you.

Thanks and hope to hear back soon. Eleni

VP CHOICES OFFER MORE OF THE SAME FAILED BUSH-MCCAIN POLICIES

No matter who John McCain picks as his Vice Presidential running mate they will offer more of the same failed Bush policies of the last eight years. Across all issues from health care to the economy to the war in Iraq, McCain's VP choices offer the same failed policies as Bush.

John Thune

Thune, Like McCain, Backed Bush's Iraq Policy

Thune on Iraq:

"I Think We Do Need To Stay The Course." [CBS, "Face the Nation," 12/26/04, emphasis added]

Mitt Romney

"I wouldn't presume to present a plan different than that of the president."
--Mitt Romney [Fox News, 9/19/06]

Like Bush, Romney Vowed To Veto Health Care For Children

"I'd veto it out of my belief that we should have every citizen insured. I put forward a plan in my state that gets every citizen insured….The right pathway to get everybody insured is to help people get private insurance. The SCHIP pathway is simply the wrong way." [Kansas City Star, 10/01/07]

Rob Portman

"I have a loyalty and allegiance to making [The Bush Administration] successful. I have a real commitment to that."
-- Rob Portman [The Cincinnati Enquirer, 3/18/05]

Portman Supported Bush An Average Of 94 Percent Per Year. During the four years he served in the House of Representatives during Bush's presidency, Portman almost always voted with the president. On average, he supported Bush 94.25 percent of the time during a given year. [CQ Voting Studies, accessed 7/29/08]

Portman, Like Bush and McCain, Wants To Privatize Social Security

Portman on His Vote to Privatize Social Security:

- "What We're Talking About Is Letting Individuals Save A Little Bit Of Their Hard Earned Money For Themselves." [Fox News, "The O'Reilly Factor," 6/18/01]

Portman, Like McCain, Repeated The Bush Administration's False Justifications For War.

Portman Claimed Iraq Was "Seeking Yellow Cake, Seeking Enriched Uranium For A Nuclear Weapons Program." [MSNBC, "Hardball," 7/24/03]

- Bush: "Saddam Hussein Recently Sought Significant Quantities Of Uranium From Africa." [2003 State of the Union, 1/28/03]
- The White House Retracted Uranium Claims More Than Two Weeks Before Portman Repeated Them. [Associated Press, 7/8/03]

Pawlenty Said The Wars In Iraq And Afghanistan "Will Be Reflected Positively In History." [MSNBC, "Hardball," 7/14/04]

Hello All,
Just got off the phone with our tracker, Lee, on the ground in Newport, MI. Unfortunately, he was not allowed into the event, nor could we find a streaming video feed. He was, however, able to grab footage of protesters outside the event. Below are the notes from our call.

BIG HIGHLIGHTS:

- About 40 protesters outside event, mostly labor, including signs / demonstrations against Big Oil and against dangers of nuclear [tracker footage available]
- McCain repeats challenge to Obama/call for Congress back into session to vote on drilling [no tracking footage available]
- McCain repeats pledge to 'all of the above' approach to energy [no tracking footage available]

Newport, MI: McCain Tour and Remarks 08/05/08
(Disclaimer: The following are notes, not direct quotes. If you'd like a quotable transcript or video of any part below, please email us.)

- Very tight security. The only people tracker saw allowed inside were a few GOP state senators, pool reporter, people on McCain's bus
- Over 40 protesters (25 union, 1-2 from MI Dem party, 3-4 enviros) vs. approx. 4 pro mccain people outside in the hours leading up the event
    - Big Exxon check for $2mil to McCain
    - many pro-obama signs
    - Oil protesters: ("McCain- Just Another Oil Addict"; "Bush & McCain <3 Big Oil")
    - McSame protesters:
        - "John McCain 100% Recycled Bush";
        - Demonstration acting out past and future dangers of Fermi nuclear power plants
- Some union workers who came who were pro-nuclear (construction of plants employs union workers) but anti-McCain b/c McSame labor policies
- As crowd grew, policemen showed up - initially they asked protesters to move out of sight, but they reached compromise instead

LINK TO EXCERPTS OF REMARKS: http://thepage.time.com/excerpts-from-mccains-remarks-at-the-michigan-nuclear-power-plant/
(NOTE: if this event follows yesterday's pattern, the networks may air the pool feed later this evening, so keep an eye out in tonight's Media Monitoring report)

Excerpts from McCain's Remarks at the Michigan Nuclear Power Plant [no tracker footage available]
Solving our national energy crisis requires an "all of the above" approach. That will require aggressive development of alternative energies like wind, solar, tidal and bio-fuels. It also requires expanding traditional sources of energy like off shore drilling, clean coal, and nuclear power like the power produced at this plant here in Michigan.

Senator Obama has said that expanding our nuclear power plants "doesn't make sense for America." He also says no to nuclear storage and reprocessing. I couldn't disagree more. I have proposed a plan to build additional nuclear plants. That means new jobs, and that means new energy. If we want to enable the technologies of tomorrow like plug-in electric cars, we need electricity to plug into.

Now, nuclear power alone is not enough. Drilling alone is not enough. We need to do all this and more. That is why I am calling for an "all of the above" approach. I am also calling on Congress to come back into session to deal with this pressing energy challenge. I am prepared to take time off the campaign trail and I hope Senator Obama is too.

It is time for America to get serious about energy independence. Our nation is sending $700 billion overseas every year to countries that don't like us very much. When I'm president that's going to stop. We're going to achieve energy independence, and we're going to do it by using every resource at our disposal to get the job done.

Subject:	[big campaign] Americans are pyaing at the pump for the failed foreign policies of the Bush Administration

FYI. For those who haven't seen it. Here is our new piece linking the war and saber rattling on Iran to higher oil prices.

HTTP://WWW.NSNETWORK.ORG/NODE/894

National Security Network

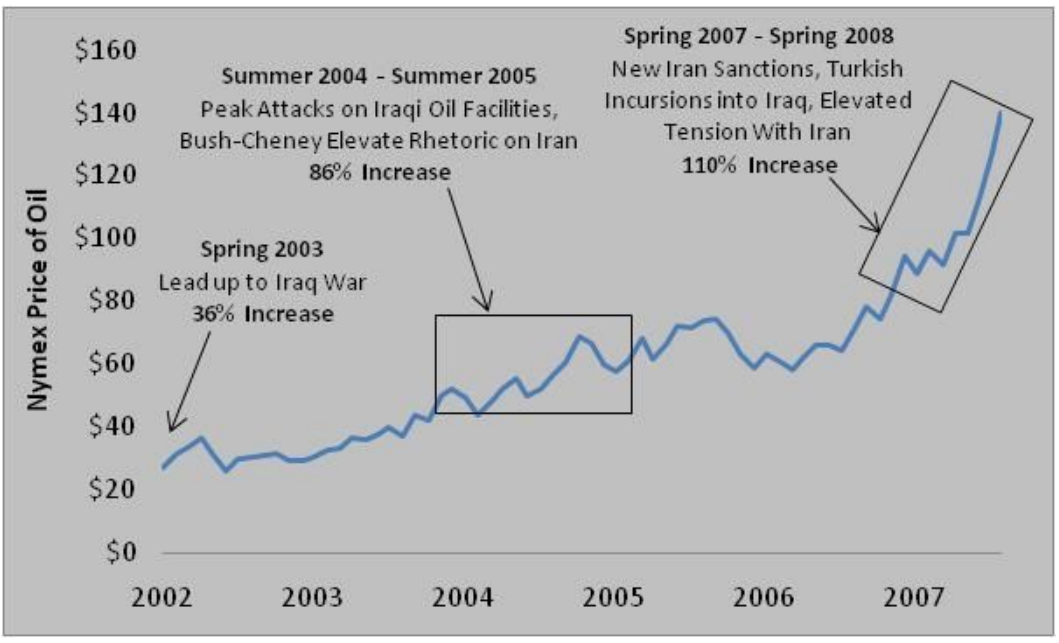
AMERICANS ARE PAYING AT THE PUMP FOR THE FAILED FOREIGN POLICIES OF THE BUSH ADMINISTRATION

The War in Iraq and Saber-Rattling toward Iran is Hurting Americans at the Pump

As Americans take to the road this Fourth of July they are once again in for sticker shock at the pump. Fuel costs have skyrocketed from $20 per barrel in 2002 to $80 last summer to approximately $140 today.

Respected industry experts have long drawn the connection between global instability, failed Bush Administration foreign policies, and the price of oil – which they call the "security premium." The instability of oil-producing regions around the world and Al Qaeda threats against oil installations across the Middle East already build a significant security premium into oil prices. The invasion of Iraq, with its destruction of petroleum infrastructure, hundreds of uncontained attacks on production and transit facilities, and slowness to return production to pre-war levels has added a significant additional expense. So too has saber-rattling against Iran, which experts say has affected the price of oil dramatically – by as much as $11 in one day.

Some experts estimate this premium to be as much as $30-40 for every barrel of oil sold. And while American consumers and businesses suffer, who benefits? The very countries our foreign policy is supposed to contain in the first place – Iran, Russia and others. In the short term, overheated rhetoric and penny-wise, barrel-foolish policies will make a painful summer even worse for Americans. In the long term, reducing our dependence on oil is the best way to get out from under the burden of the security premium – and increase our security at the same time.



This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

AMERICANS PAY AT THE PUMP FOR GLOBAL INSTABILITY

Rising oil prices and the world's insecurity are linked. A majority of the world's oil is produced in parts of the world wracked with instability. John Kilduff, energy analyst at MF Global, outlined: "The unrest in the Niger Delta [is] knocking off millions of barrels of crude oil every day. We see President Putin threatening at times to use oil as a weapon. So we're seeing speculators and hedgers bid up the price because of the uncertainty of future supplies, in particular." According to oil expert and Chairman of Cambridge Energy Research Associates, Daniel Yergin, these national security concerns have built "'an almost-permanent security premium' into the price of oil." [NY Times, 5/11/08 . NewsHour, 10/26/07]

Rising tensions in the world's oil producing hotspots contribute to an oil "security premium," increasing prices by as much as 30 percent. Senator Joseph Biden defined the security premium in concrete terms, warning that the "more tensions rise, the higher the security premium goes, because people betting on the long term price of oil anticipate supply disruptions." In October 2007, when oil reached $90 a barrel, David Hobbs, vice-president of Cambridge Research Associates (CERA), noted security premium estimates of "$30 or $40" per barrel. [Senator Joseph Biden, 12/06/07 . Houston Chronicle, 10/28/07]

BUSH ADMINISTRATION FOREIGN POLICY HAS RAISED TENSIONS ACROSS THE MIDDLE EAST, IMPERILING THE WORLD'S ENERGY SUPPLY

The Bush Administration's decision to invade Iraq and its failure to manage the security situation has hurt our energy security. Since the invasion, there have been 469 attacks on Iraqi oil pipelines, facilities, and personnel, and production has stagnated at prewar levels. The invasion of Iraq also increased the threat of terrorism by creating a training, recruiting and fundraising magnet for Islamic terrorists in the heart of the world's most vital energy producing region. A CSIS report suggested that the invasion of Iraq heightened Saudi fears of a terrorist attack, evidenced by the 50 percent increase in security expenditures from 2003 to 2004. In addition, there have been frequent terrorist attacks on oil installations in the Middle East. These often spur mini-spikes in oil prices, increasing fears of vulnerability and driving-up the security premium. [Institute for Global Security, 3/27/08 . NY Times, 5/11/08 . Senate Joint Economic Committee, 11/11/07 . CSIS, 11/30/04 . Reuters, 5/31/08 . Yemen Observer, 4/05/08 . Fox News, 9/15/06 . BBC, 2/24/06]
Ceaseless confrontation with Iran has raised costly speculation about a future oil shock. John Kilduff observed: "Well, I think at this point, the problem we have… is statements from the President and the Vice President, almost on a daily basis lately, really raising the rhetoric, raising the temperature on the situation. And, of course, President Ahmadinejad in Iran does not shrink from these verbal battles anyway. And this is the mother of all supply fears, the mother of all supply threats. Not only the Iranian oil, but the Strait of Hormuz, where 25 percent of the world's oil flows, that's 100 percent Western-friendly, could easily be blocked by the Iranians. So, I mean, yes, there could be an overreaction right now, but we in the oil markets have to call them as we see them and take what we get in terms of rhetoric and worry." [NewsHour, 10/26/07]

Recent rumors of confrontation with Iran caused an $11 spike in oil prices in one day. Israeli Transportation Minister Shaul Mofaz recently asserted that an Israeli strike on Iran was unavoidable causing an $11 spike in oil prices. "'It's one word that did this,' said Guy Gleichmann, president of United Strategic Investors Group…'rumors of war with Iran,' Mr. Gleichmann said, have often led to a spike of several dollars in the price of oil. The issue had died down for a while, he said, but 'this is like Jason coming back from the dead.'" The security premium is funneled into Ahmadinejad's coffers, allowing him to address some of his country's economic problems and build up his political power. [Jerusalem Post, 6/10/08]

As U.S. forces were diverted to Iraq, Al Qaeda was able to reconstitute in Pakistan and is calling for Islamic terrorist movements to wreak havoc against oil installations. The 2007 National Intelligence Estimate found that Al Qaeda had reconstituted along the Afghan-Pakistan border, and the GAO recently found that the United States lacked a coherent policy to address this threat. Operating with impunity, senior Al Qaeda leader Ayman Al-Zawahiri has publicly declared that oil revenues went to the "enemies of Islam," and Osama Bin Laden has approved of attacks on what he called, "the provision line and the feeding to the artery of the life of the crusader's nation." [The Guardian, 9/09/07 . NIE, 07/07. GAO, 4/17/08 . Washington Post, 9/27/04]

REMOVING THE STRANGLEHOLD OF RISING OIL PRICES REQUIRES BETTER ENERGY AND NATIONAL SECURITY POLICIES

In the short-term we must stop the reckless saber rattling towards Iran, reduce our short-sighted focus on Iraq, and implement an effective counterterrorism strategy. The current policy only undermines our diplomatic and security position, while directly benefiting – through increasing oil prices – the very countries our foreign policy is supposed to contain. As John Kilduff explained, "the problem we have…is statements from the president and the vice president, almost on a daily basis lately, really raising the rhetoric, raising the temperature on the situation." [NewsHour, 10/26/07]

In the long run we must reduce dependence on foreign oil and natural gas in the world's most volatile regions. A diverse energy policy is a smart national security policy: Oil-rich countries, particularly those ruled by unstable and corrupt regimes, should have less influence over us. A better energy policy starts at home, with a goal of producing at least 25 percent of our nation's transportation fuels from low-carbon alternative fuels, including electricity, by 2025, and investing in new technology to make this happen. The U.S. must also work with its friends and allies to strengthen and diversify the networks of pipelines, transmission lines, and terminals that transport oil and gas, as well as develop a strong international emergency response system to limit price spikes caused by violence or other disruptions. JOHN DOUGLASS

HELP VIRGINIA FAMILIES

John --

We are so grateful for all the Veterans and voters of both parties here in our district who rallied behind us when Congressman Hurt's radio host bashed General Douglass's service with nasty epithets like "empty uniform," “dupe” and “chickenhawk”. Hurt – a regular guest of Rob Schilling – whines about “gutter politics" when it comes to his uranium mining ties, but lacks the moral courage to condemn these swift-boat attacks.

So we urgently need your strong support to show Hurt and his right-wing media allies that enough is enough.

Even after groups like VetPAC and VoteVets called upon the host to apologize, Hurt still seems willing to condone his radio host's repeated smears on John Douglass, Tom Perriello, Tim Kaine and others by returning to the show. VetPAC said "It's disgusting that Robert Hurt, a sitting Congressman and regular guest of The Schilling Show, would remain silent.”

Hurt, and his allies who call General Douglass a "coward," should tell it to President Reagan and President Clinton who called on General Douglass to lead our nation's military at the highest levels. Having narrowly escaped several attempts on his life during his 35-years of service, General Douglass has shown that he is a true patriot who loves our country too much not to take action.

So it's only a matter of time before they are at it again, unless we stick up for all our Veterans across the country. Please contribute right away.

Thanks for standing up for John Douglass - together, we will help him win in November.

On to victory,

Gary Ritterstein

The Hill opinion: Lanny Davis: "Lanny Davis: Americans want a dealmaker, not an ideologue"

When it comes to judging someone's political ideology, many people and pundits end up arguing about labels and characterizations rather than the facts and the objective record. For example, I recall recently reading about someone who attended a Ready for Hillary meeting in Iowa who declared his concern about Hillary Clinton being a "corporatist." A few recent articles refer to Clinton as a "centrist" or not a genuine "populist," words meaning different things to different people.

Fortunately, polling data show that most people make their judgments based on facts, not labels.

So here are the facts concerning Clinton's positions on the issues.

On economic issues during her eight years in the Senate and to the present, Clinton consistently supported increasing the minimum wage (and still does). She opposed former President George W. Bush's tax cuts for the wealthy, favored tax cuts for the middle class and tax credits for student loans. She consistently voted against repealing the estate tax on millionaires. She supported the establishment of the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau, praising Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) to this day for her leadership on this issue.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On social issues, as everyone knows, Clinton led the fight as first lady for the passage of a national health insurance system and was — and is — a steadfast supporter of President Obama's most important achievement as president: the Affordable Care Act.

She consistently supported programs helping the middle class, regulating and preserving the environment, and creating opportunities for the poor and minorities. She has been in favor of comprehensive immigration reform, including the Dream Act.

She has always supported affirmative action, privacy rights, human rights, civil rights and civil liberties.

One of the great causes of her life is concern about children and education. Like Warren and many other Democrats, she is committed to substantial assistance to public schools and relief to students on their student loans.

In short, she believes in an active federal government regulating excesses of the private market for the public interest and public good — the classic definition of Democratic Party liberalism, from Andrew Jackson to Franklin Roosevelt to Bill Clinton. She also believes that the country needs a healthy and vibrant private sector that is the engine of job creation and lifting the poor and the middle class.

On cultural issues, the former secretary of State supports choice, gay rights, gay marriage, gun control and strict safeguards to protect the separation of church and state.

On income inequality, Clinton has expressed great concern. "This is not an issue that's going to go away. In fact, it will only get worse unless we address it now," she said recently.

"We've got to do a better job of getting our economy growing and producing results and renewing the American Dream so Americans feel ... that the economy and the political system is not stacked against them, because that will erode the trust that is at the basis of our democracy."

Polls prove that most self-described liberal Democrats judge Clinton on the actual facts of her record, not on someone's labels. In the most recent national polls, 72 percent of liberal Democrats say they would support Clinton for president in 2016 if she were to run. Only 5 percent of Democrats and 6 percent of liberals think she is "too conservative."

It is true that Clinton, despite her liberal voting record in the Senate, was perceived by many Republicans as someone you could work with to get things done — exactly as the liberal icon, former Sen. Ted Kennedy (D-Mass.), was seen. That may bother the furthest wing of the Democratic base, who prefer confrontation and ideological wars to compromise and real solutions to help people most in need. These are likely the 6 percent of liberals who think Clinton is "too conservative."

But fortunately, most Democrats and most Americans prefer fact-driven, bipartisan solutions rather than confrontation and ideological wars. I believe Clinton currently shows such strong support as a future president not only among Democrats but among all Americans.

But there is plenty of time to go. If Hillary Clinton runs for president — and she has said she has not made that decision yet — she will run hard and work hard to earn the support of the all voters: red, blue and purple.

Politico: "Books test market for Hillary Clinton hostility"

It's the summer of anti-Clinton books.

There may be no clearer sign of Hillary Clinton's political reemergence than the flurry of new books critical of her — two in the past month alone, with another pair coming soon. It's all testing the depth of a market for anti-Clinton fare that had gone mostly dormant — and triggering a fierce campaign by her defenders to shame the mainstream media not to write about the books, lest they lend them legitimacy.

Sales so far are mixed. A widely disparaged book by former New York Times Magazine Editor Ed Klein, "Blood Feud," has done well, even knocking Clinton's own biography from the top spot on the Times' best-seller list over the past month. But a second book published last week by Weekly Standard writer Daniel Halper, "Clinton Inc.," has sold just under 3,500 copies, according to Nielsen BookScan, which tracks book sales for the publishing industry.

Leading the charge against the titles is David Brock, who once made his living attacking the Clintons and Democrats as a conservative writer but is now their chief public defender through the group he founded, Media Matters. Brock has found himself doing battle with his onetime editor, veteran conservative Publisher Adam Bellow (son of Saul Bellow), who edited "Clinton Inc."

"Conservatives don't buy books the way other people do," Brock said in an interview. "I think they buy them as political statements or to see their own prejudices and fantasies in black and white … [Hillary Clinton] called it a cottage industry on 'The Daily Show' and that's right, it's a business."

It's not clear how broad the interest is these days for any book about Clinton, pro- or anti-. Her own book about her time at the State Department, which came out in June, has sold just under 250,000 copies, including e-book estimates. That's a solid figure in a depleted publishing industry but far from the juggernaut her backers hoped for. Klein's book, meanwhile, has sold just over 100,000 copies so far, also accounting for e-book estimates.

After those two, the market may drop off.

"Clinton Inc.," which looks at the Clintons from the impeachment crisis in the late 1990s through today, hit the stands to underwhelming figures (though in a sign of the strength of the book industry and the summer slowdown, it's still set to land at No. 10 on the Times best-seller list, according to his publisher.) The book, along with an upcoming one by Secret Service chronicler Ronald Kessler, includes rumors about infidelity by Bill Clinton. The Halper book also focuses on Chelsea Clinton's rise within her family's foundation.

Klein's book, "Blood Feud," claims to lay out the messy relationship between Barack and Michelle Obama and Bill and Hillary Clinton, replete with quotes from alleged conversations between the first families. Conservative radio host Rush Limbaugh has been among those who have questioned the material, saying he found some of the book's dialogue "odd in the sense that I don't know people who speak this way."

Clinton's team, and Media Matters, have moved to lump all three books — plus a fourth one, by WND writer Aaron Klein, about the Benghazi attacks, due in September — in the same bucket. Media Matters has taken specific issue with key pieces of Halper's book, including the author's reporting on speculation that Hillary Clinton's health scare in December 2012 was a stroke, not a concussion.

"With Klein, Halper and [author Ronald] Kessler, we now have a Hat Trick of despicable actors concocting trashy nonsense for a quick buck, at the expense of anything even remotely resembling the truth," a joint statement from spokesmen for Bill, Hillary and Chelsea Clinton read. "It's an insult to readers [and] authors, and should be reserved for the fiction bin, if not the trash."

In a squeeze on mainstream media, the Clintons added of the authors: "Their behavior should neither be allowed nor enabled, and legitimate media outlets who know with every fiber of their being that this is complete crap should know not to get down in the gutter with them and spread their lies. But if anyone isn't sure, let's strap all three to a polygraph machine on live TV and let the needle tell the truth."

The attacks on anti-Hillary books is part of Clinton lore. In 1999, Gail Sheehy's "Hillary Choice" was lambasted by Clinton loyalists as a piece of overreaching psychobabble. In the years since, Clinton allies have frequently deployed a similar effort to undercut unauthorized books about the former first lady, stoking doubt about their credibility by finding, and amplifying, inaccuracies in them. In the current go-around, most of the coverage of the books has been in conservative media outlets.

The last surge in the anti-Clinton book market was around 2005. That was when Ed Klein, through Penguin Books, published "The Truth about Hillary." Brock and other Clinton allies savaged the book, and Penguin. It went on to be a commercial success, but the credibility gap was established. HarperCollins, which published "Clinton Inc.," dropped plans to publish Ed Klein's latest Clinton book earlier this year, amid concerns about his reporting.

Other books that were printed soon after failed to take off.

Marji Ross, the president of Regnery — the conservative publishing house that picked up Ed Klein's latest book — acknowledged there have been "a number of anti-Hillary books that haven't worked in the years since [she left the White House], and we just felt that the time was right."

As for allegations of a lack of truthfulness and a plethora of quotes that sound suspect in Klein's work, she insisted, "No one's ever been able to point to something specific that he had in one of his books that is untrue."

Ross said the release date for "Blood Feud" was moved up, the thinking being that "anyone who wasn't a fan of hers would be hungering for some kind of news from the other side" after her own book tour.

Brock, who gained fame in 1993 for writing a book about Anita Hill that was edited by Bellow, has witnessed the rise and fall of anti-Clinton books up close. His own, which was initially supposed to be a critical book that ended up as a positive look at Hillary Clinton, was also edited by Bellow.

"When I started reading ["Clinton Inc."], I started noticing what I thought were Adam Bellow touches," Brock said.

"He wants his books to be seen as serious and well-researched and he works really hard to give them that patina, and that means sanding down the rough edges to fool mainstream reviewers," Brock added, explaining that that formula maximized sales of his own book on Hill.

In the case of "Clinton Inc.," though, Brock said the "red meat" got "overcooked by Adam, and then nobody wants it."

Bellow, who declined to be interviewed, wrote in an email that the Halper book is off to "a very good start. We have a tremendous media lineup in place and expect the book to continue to sell well through the summer and into the fall."

As for the criticism from Brock, Bellow added: "I don't plan on getting into a pissing match with David. However, since he has cast me as some kind of evil conservative publishing wizard I would just like to note that I also published his Hillary book and that I backed him up completely when he turned in a positive portrait instead of the hit job he originally pitched.

"We would have been within our rights to cancel the book but I made sure that it got published and that his full advance was paid," Bellow added. "And I never even got invited to his beach house in Rehoboth!"

Halper, who wrote a first-person account for POLITICO Magazine in which he claimed to have been hounded by Clinton allies during the reporting of his book, said his book is a reported work that also takes on some of Hillary Clinton's critics.

"I try my best to be fair to all sides," said Halper, whose book had a well-timed title, at a moment when people are examining the Clintons' wealth. "The Clintons have been criticized by a number of people over the years, from both the right and the left. Some of it is rightfully so and some of it is overboard."

Kessler, noting he has broken several stories involving the Secret Service, also took issue with the notion that his book isn't a serious work of journalism.

"The fact is that my book is entirely nonpartisan and presents startling revelations about both Republicans — including some of the saints of the GOP — and Democrats, as well as about Secret Service laxness and corner cutting that threaten the life of the president," said Kessler, whose book is expected to have a chapter on Hillary and a prologue related to Bill Clinton. He added that the book, which comes out next week, includes positive passages about Barack and Michelle Obama. "Not exactly a political hatchet job!"

Regardless of criticism, one publishing source predicted that Kessler's book would sell, since he has a following based on past books. And Aaron Klein's book would appeal to a different audience, the publishing source said, a subset of readers deeply interested in the Benghazi attacks and convinced of an administration coverup.

Roger Stone, the former Richard Nixon operative and proud political dirty-trickster, predicted that the current market for anti-Clinton books will prove robust.

“The one segment of the book market this is thriving is conservatives,” Stone said. “They read. The tabloids also show there is also an insatiable public interest in any gossip about the Clintons.” And “it will only get bigger if she runs.”

Toledo Blade (O.H.): “Clinton remains Ohio voters' choice for U.S. leader”

By Jim Provance

July 31, 2014

COLUMBUS — Hillary Clinton remains Ohioans' choice for the next president even as their opinion of the current Democratic occupant of the White House remains near an all-time low, according to the latest Quinnipiac Poll released today.

Ms. Clinton — the former first lady, U.S. senator, and secretary of state — would defeat all Republican comers in hypothetical 2016 match-ups, including one with Ohio Gov. John Kasich.

If that election were held today, 47 percent of registered Ohio voters say they'd vote for Clinton compared to 40 percent who say they'd prefer the GOP governor currently seeking re-election to his current job.

A Quinnipiac Poll released Wednesday showed Governor Kasich with a 12-point lead over his Democratic challenger, Cuyahoga County Executive Ed FitzGerald, to keep his current job.

The best GOP performer against Ms. Clinton is U.S. Sen. Rand Paul, of Kentucky, who would get 42 percent of the vote to Ms. Clinton's 46 percent. That's within the poll's margin of error of plus or minus 2.7 percentage points.

In no scenario does she score higher than 50 percent. She does, however, have a 52 percent favorability rating among Ohio's registered voters.

"Obviously there is a long way to go until 2016, but at this point the political problems the president is encountering are not rubbing off on her,” said Peter Brown, assistant director of the Quinnipiac Poll.

Thirty-six percent of those questioned approve of the job performance of President Barack Obama, less than two years after the Buckeye State helped to keep him in the White House. Fifty-nine percent disapprove, slightly above the record low of 34 percent-to-61 percent last November, the lowest ever recorded by Quinnipiac in the nine states where the Connecticut-based university poll regularly questions voters.

“Only three in 10 men or independent voters approve of his job performance, a far cry from almost two years ago where he won the nation’s most important swing state, and the Democratic approval rating in the low 70s is anemic, at best." Mr. Brown said.

The poll has Ms. Clinton defeating former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush 48 percent to 27 percent and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie 46 percent to 37 percent.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At one point, Mr. Christie had been one of Ms. Clinton's strongest competitors for the Buckeye vote, but he has fallen in their opinion since the bridge scandal early this year. He is now underwater with 34 percent having a favorable opinion of him compared to 36 percent who do not.

Ms. Clinton's numbers are strongest among women, although Mr. Paul is the only Republican who currently beats her in Ohio among independents.

The university questioned 1,366 registered voters between July 24 and 28.

National Journal: "Should Democratic Candidates Care About Hillary Clinton's 2016 Timeline?"

By Emma Roller

July 30, 2014

[Subtitle:] Long-lasting question marks around a possible Clinton presidential run could leave Democrats unprepared for 2016.

Writing about the choice in front of Hillary Clinton—a hard choice, if you will—is like an advanced course in hypotheticals.

Trying to divine the strategy for Clinton's announcement is like graphing a Punnett square with two variables. The first variable: Will she or won't she run? The second: Will she announce her decision early on, or take her sweet time?

Either way, Clinton's decision is sure to delight some Democratic politicians and stymie others. If she announces her candidacy too early, that opens the floodgates to conservative attacks. Diametrically, if she announces late in the game that she is not going to run, other Democrats who were waiting on her go-ahead may find it's too late to build up their own campaigns.

It's unlikely that Clinton will announce early either way, which leaves us with two options. Option one: She announces late that she is running, thus confirming the idea everyone has been taking for granted for at least the past six months, and sinking every other Democrat's hopes of running a competitive campaign. Option two: Clinton announces in early 2015 that no, she's not running—thus rendering the months of think pieces totally useless, and opening up the nomination to someone you're likely not thinking too much about.

If Clinton decides not to run, it could be an enormous boon to one of her fellow Democrats in particular. According to Steve McMahon, a presidential campaign veteran and the cofounder of the political consulting firm Purple Strategies, Clinton's un-candidacy would all but open the door for Democratic Nominee Joe Biden, and the vice president wouldn't hurt for lack of setup time.

"It's hers to lose if she wants it, but she may not want it," McMahon said. "If she doesn't run, then there will be a big field, but the longer it takes for the field to materialize, the weaker everybody in it—except Joe Biden—will be."

This theory, of course, discounts the fact that while there is a fledgling "Run, Liz, Run" movement there's no "Ready for Joe" movement yet. A recent CNN poll found that 67 percent of likely Democratic voters would vote for Clinton, with Sen. Elizabeth Warren and Biden each trailing her by at least 50 points. Warren received 10 percent to Biden's 8 percent.

But what a Biden candidacy lacks in grassroots enthusiasm would be more than made up for with a well-oiled campaign apparatus.

"There's no barrier for him," McMahon said. "He's vice president, he's run before, he would inherit the bulk of the Obama campaign machinery and people, and he would be running 60 miles an hour while everybody else was putting on their track shoes."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

One Democratic consultant noted that the 2016 cycle is odd because of the lack of Democratic candidates who are at least openly flirting with running at this stage.

"It's very strange that in 2014, you don't see any of that," the consultant, who asked to be quoted anonymously because of work with potential candidates, said. "And I think it's because many national Democrats are afraid that it will look like they are positioning themselves against Clinton."

The general attitude of the Democratic Party leaves Clinton in an enviable position.

"I think it's in her best interest to wait," the consultant said. "That doesn't mean it's in the best interest of the Democratic Party."

Steve McMahon agrees. "Given the level of organization that's popped up around her, she certainly isn't harmed by waiting," he said. "If I were Hillary Clinton, I would be in absolutely no hurry to decide or announce what I'm doing. If I were somebody else who wants to run for president, I would be desperate to get an answer from her as quickly as possible."

That desperation has left Democrats (and political reporters) looking for any tell-tale dog whistles from Clinton—traveling to Iowa or New Hampshire, for instance. But Clinton has been wary not to send any signals.

Meanwhile, other national Democrats have used their star power in local races. Warren recently headlined a New Hampshire fundraiser for Sen. Jeanne Shaheen, and Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley has campaigned for candidates in New Hampshire and Iowa.

But Warren's campaign work and her rising star in the party—despite her oft-repeated denial that she is running for president—are nothing compared with Clinton's reputation among the well-heeled Democratic donor base. As one New York donor recently told the Daily Beast, "If Elizabeth called me up and said, 'I am thinking of running for president,' I would say, 'Elizabeth, are you out of your [expletive] mind?' "

Michael McCurry, a former press secretary to Bill Clinton, said the pressure for Clinton to announce her run could be ratcheted up, depending on the outcome of the midterm elections.

"If Democrats lose the Senate in November, then every Democrat will believe that a Democratic president is all that stands between a GOP Congress and reversing some of the progress made in the last generation or so," McCurry said in an email. "Because if she is NOT running, then someone needs time and opportunity to build to her level of national support and name recognition."

Joe Trippi, a veteran of Democratic presidential campaigns, says other Democrats who want to run shouldn't hold their breath waiting for Clinton.

"There are plenty of people like Martin O'Malley who are out there, going to Iowa, going to New Hampshire, putting the fundraising structure in place if they decide to go," Trippi told National Journal. "And if somebody isn't doing that because they think Hillary Clinton's running ... then they deserve to lose."

Clinton has said she would make her announcement (and delete the "TBD" line from her Twitter bio) in "early 2015." But what does history say about when candidates are likely to get into the race?

The New Hampshire primary—the first presidential primary in the country—is often used as a benchmark for when candidates should throw their hat into the ring. Before 1972, no presidential nominees declared their candidacy until roughly six months, or 200 days, before the New Hampshire primary. But since 1996, each party's presidential nominee has announced his candidacy earlier, ahead of that six-month mark. In 2008, both John McCain and Barack Obama announced their candidacies more than 300 days ahead of the New Hampshire primary.

Some perspective: We are still more than 500 days out from the New Hampshire primary, which will take place on Jan. 26, 2016. So, going by the 300-day benchmark, Clinton has until roughly April 2015 to announce her decision—at least. That could mean eight more excruciating months for pundits and waffling Democratic candidates alike.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But Clinton could just as easily wait longer to announce her decision and draw out the suspense. And why not? She has every reason to take her time announcing a decision, and hold off the inevitable oppo-avalanche.

"I don't think there are really any real political consequences to her for waiting," Trippi said. "In fact, I think it's to her advantage to wait as long as she wants."

The Wire: "The NeverEnding Book Tour: 52 Days of Hillary Clinton... And Counting"

By David Ludwig

July 30, 2014, 3:58 p.m. EDT

During her four-year tenure as head of the State Department, Hillary Clinton traveled 956,733 miles and visited 112 countries, the most ever by a U.S. Secretary of State. Leaving aside the fact that anyone who served before the airplane didn't have much of a fighting chance, that's still a pretty impressive schedule to keep, and it's one that Hillary looks like she's trying to replicate on her current book tour.

For the last 52 days HRC has been the lone competitor in her own Tour de France, peddling from book stores, to universities, to interviews, to book stores in England: Stage 1: Dianne Sawyer; Stage 2: A Costco in Virginia; Stage 3: Okay you get the idea.

But unlike the actual Tour de France, this one doesn't seem to have an end date. No, the Tour de Hillary, which started on June 10, is showing no signs of stopping, leaving many of us asking if the eventual sprint to the finish line could include a motorcade traveling down Pennsylvania Avenue during the 2016 Inaugural Parade.

Let's take a look back at where Hillary, and her book, have been in the last 52 days.

Monday, June 9: Hillary gets off to a rocky start, telling ABC's Dianne Sawyer that the former First Family were "dead broke" after leaving the White House in 2000.

Tuesday, June 10: Hillary sits down with Robin Roberts on Good Morning America, then does a book signing at Barnes and Nobles in Union Square in New York City.

Wednesday, June 11: Hillary travels to her hometown of Chicago for an interview with Mayor and longtime Clinton supporter Rahm Emanuel at the Harris Theater.

Thursday, June 12: Hillary has a tense exchange over gay marriage with NPR's Terry Gross, the same day as her interview on BBC's of Newsnight aired in England.

Friday, June 13: Hillary did a book signing at a Philadelphia library at 11:30am, then traveled south to D.C. for a "conversation" at George Washington University at 6pm.

Saturday, June 14: While signing copies of her book, Hillary casually ran into her BFF Supreme Court Justice Sonia Sotomayor at a Costco in Arlington, Virginia.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sunday, June 15: Hillary looked at pictures from her Wellesley College graduation on CBS Sunday Morning with Jane Pauley. "Yes. Boy, I had long, long hair," she said.

Monday, June 16: Hillary traveled north, first to Toronto, Canada in the afternoon and then to the Harvard Book Store in Cambridge, Massachusetts that evening.

Tuesday, June 17: Back in Washington D.C., Hillary briefly stops her motorcade to greet an intern from the Republican Campaign Committee who is dressed as a giant squirrel wearing a tee shirt reading "another Clinton in the White House is nuts." She then continued on to a CNN town hall with Christiane Amanpour, wrapping things up with a Fox News interview with Bret Baier and Greta Van Susteren.

Wednesday, June 18: Hillary flew to Edmonton in Alberta, Canada to tell more Canadians about her book. Speaking on both a literal and figurative level, Hillary told the packed house "No two countries are closer than we are."

Thursday, June 19: Hillary met Glee Star Chris Colfer at a signing in Los Angeles.

Friday, June 20: Another day in L.A., another celebrity's book to sign. This time it was music superstar Katy Perry who offered to write Hillary a campaign song.

The same day Hillary headed to Austin, Texas where she did another signing at the store BookPeople followed by a speech at the Long Center where she talked about nights spent at the music venue The Armadillo in 1972, The Texas Tribune reported.

Saturday, June 21: An interview with Hillary was published in The Guardian. "I wish I had some stock in a scrunchie company," she told Ed Pilkington.

Sunday, June 22: Hillary went west to Kansas City, Montana for a speech at The Midland Theater where a ticket came with an autographed copy of Hard Choices.

The Hill: "Obama pivots to economic legacy"

By Amie Parnes and Peter Schroeder

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

July 31, 2014, 6:00 a.m. EDT

President Obama is tying his legacy to a growing economy, seizing on the administration's successes in boosting the nation during financial woes.

Bolstered by a string of positive economic reports, the administration hopes it can increase Democrats' chances of holding the Senate this fall by highlighting Obama's stewardship of the economy.

More broadly, the White House hopes to ride the wave of an economic recovery to improve Obama's approval numbers over the final two years of his presidency, setting up a possible Democratic successor at the White House.

"It's the best possible legacy item," said one former senior administration official. "The elections in 2008 and 2012 were all about the economy and if the nation could bounce back after such terrible times. And look, it shows that, not only did we bounce back, but things are going to an even better place, one where a potential predecessor could build a foundation."

On Wednesday, the Commerce Department said the economy grew at a 4 percent annual rate in the second quarter. The report also included revised figures for 2013 that showed much stronger growth at the end of last year.

In the final three months of 2013, the economy expanded at a 3.5 percent rate, up from the previous estimate of 2.6 percent. And in the third quarter, growth was revised to 4.5 percent from 4.1 percent.

Hours after the report was released, Obama adopted a confident and fiery tone while making remarks on the economy.

For much of his speech in Kansas City, Mo., he ticked off the nation's economic successes. Since he took over at the helm, millions of new jobs have been added, he said.

"Manufacturing is back," he said. And "our energy, our technology, our auto industries, they're all booming."

Time and again, he recalled where the nation stood at the height of the financial crisis when he entered the Oval Office at the beginning of 2009.

"The crisis that hit near the end of my campaign back in 2008, it would end up costing millions of Americans their jobs, their homes, their sense of security," Obama told the packed crowd at a theater in the Show Me State. "But we have fought back. We have got back on our feet. We have dusted ourselves off."

The economy has added more than 200,000 jobs per month for the past five months ahead of the release of a new jobs report on Friday, helping to lower the unemployment rate to 6.1 percent. Economists expect that Friday's report will also be over 200,000 jobs.

"None of this is an accident," Obama said on Wednesday. "It's thanks to the decisions we made early on. And now America has recovered faster and come farther than just about any other advanced country on earth."

Republicans argue the country is experiencing the slowest economic recovery since a recession on record, and they say Obama's White House is to blame.

Rep. Kevin Brady (R-Texas), chairman of Congress's Joint Economic Committee, doubled over with laughter when asked about the president's legacy on the economy.

"Seriously?!" he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The GOP has pointed to ObamaCare and the Dodd-Frank financial overhaul, arguing regulations from those laws have led to economic uncertainties that have slowed the growth of business.

Republicans regularly hammer the Senate for not taking up jobs bills passed by the lower chamber.

Brady acknowledged that the president was handed a very rough situation when he took power, but said Obama has had more than enough time to put together a recovery that should be far more robust at this point.

“The truth is, the weakest economic recovery in President Obama’s lifetime is his own,” he said. “We’re wildly applauding a C-minus economic performance.”

But White House aides say Obama will tout the economy as a legacy item in the coming months.

“The president will continue to spend time traveling across the country talking to the American people about his domestic priority: expanding economic opportunity for the middle class,” one White House official said on Wednesday.

“We’ve made important progress over the last several years,” the official continued, before adding, “but the president believes there is more we can do.”

Those close to the White House say Obama’s success on the economy could help Hillary Clinton should she run in the 2016 election. And Clinton allies agree.

“I think she will highlight the successful economic initiatives the president has put in place,” one source close to Clintonworld said. “But if she runs, she will run on her own record and will tout her own policy proposals to keep our economy on track and moving forward.”

In his speech on Wednesday, a flip Obama had some fun with House Republicans, alluding to the fact that there could be a Democratic president in office after he leaves in 2017.

“I know they’re not that happy that I’m president, but that’s OK,” he said. “Come on, I’ve only got a couple of years left. Come on, let’s get some work done. Then you can be mad at the next president.”

Time: “Joe Lieberman: Obama Administration ‘Has Gone Off The Track’ On Israel”

By Zeke J. Miller

July 30, 2014

[Subtitle:] The former Democratic Vice Presidential nominee-turned-independent also says he is watching the rise of Rand Paul "with concern."

After 24 years representing Connecticut in the Senate, Joe Lieberman left Washington in Jan. 2013 as a man without a party—a Democrat-turned-independent-turned-GOP-endorser.

Speaking to TIME 18 months later, Lieberman is content with his decision to quit the Senate, but still has doubts about Washington’s handling of domestic issues and global crises. “I do feel that the Obama administration has gone off the track in the efforts to broker a ceasefire,” he says, saying that the reported terms of a U.S.-offered agreement would have left Hamas stronger from its ongoing conflict with Israel.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The former Democratic vice presidential nominee said he takes issue with the growing “neo-isolationism” within the Democratic and Republican parties, saying he’s watched the rise of Sen. Rand Paul “with concern.” “The world suffers and the American people suffer eventually both in terms of our security and our prosperity—and ultimately our freedom—if we’re not engaged in problems elsewhere,” he says.

Lieberman said he has yet to make a decision about who to endorse in 2016, after drawing fire from Democrats for his outspoken support for Sen. John McCain over then-Sen. Barack Obama in 2008. But he said he believes former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton would keep the Democratic Party engaged in the world.

Lieberman was recently named the inaugural Joseph Lieberman Chair in Public Policy and Public Service at Yeshiva University where he will deliver lectures and teach in the upcoming academic year. Lieberman says he hopes to convince young people to pursue public service despite the gridlock in Washington.

The following conversation has been lightly condensed and edited:

Looking at the dysfunction in Washington today, are you glad you left Congress? How do you plan on encouraging young people to go into public service in this political climate?

I didn’t leave because of the partisanship and the lack of getting anything done, but it made it a lot easier to leave. I will tell you that my last two years was the least productive of my 24 for me and for the Congress really. And I watch it needless to say from here with a sense of, oh, disappointment, frustration, and in some sense embarrassment because I still feel an identity with the institution. And I know how important it is that it gets some problems solved.

Notwithstanding all of that, or maybe in some sense because of all the dysfunction in the federal government and government generally, but the federal government particularly, people like me have to try to convince students that it’s worth getting involved and that they can still make a difference and maybe together with others of like mind and heart they can actually change things for the better. I look back on my years in public service with a lot of gratitude for the various things that I was able to do. Part of my message to the students at YU is going to be I never got, honestly, anything significant done without the support of people in the Republican Party. In other words, I never felt that I could do it alone as a Democrat, and obviously in my last term as an independent I needed support of people in both parties. It’s all about a willingness to put—as formalistic as it sounds—to put the interests of country ahead of the interests of party or ideology.

How do you view the turmoil in the world today and the American response, particularly to the conflict in Gaza?

These events have occurred of their own momentum. They have a life of their own. On the other hand, I’m afraid that the U.S. has sent a message that we’re going to be less engaged in the world than we have been at other times in our history and I’m afraid that encourages some others to try to take advantage of us and our allies. It’s not just President Obama and the U.S. government, I think in many ways it’s the Europeans as well. And I’m afraid that may have encouraged Putin to seize the moment and seize Crimea. So the world suffers and the American people suffer eventually both in terms of our security and our prosperity—and ultimately our freedom—if we’re not engaged in problems elsewhere. So that’s a general statement.

I think in the Hamas-Israel conflict, which is just one of a broader series of conflicts going on in the middle east, the administration has been strong in supporting Israel’s right to defend itself against the Hamas missile attacks and the Hamas terrorist attacks. But lately, I do feel that the Obama administration has gone off the track in the efforts to broker a ceasefire, as much as everybody would like to see the violence stop. Because I think those efforts, if they had been pushed any harder—it seems like they have fallen by the wayside now—would have really allowed Hamas to emerge from this much stronger than they went into it and they began this. Israel is our ally and Israel is a democracy and Israel is governed by the rule of law. Hamas is a terrorist organization that is a declared enemy of the U.S. as well as Israel. And the last proposal made by Secretary Kerry, who I greatly admire and like, but nonetheless if the proposal was as it was reported, it really would have strengthened Hamas and weakened Israel. And in some sense coincidentally strengthened Qatar, Turkey, and Iran who are backing Hamas and weakened our other allies in the Arab world like Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Jordan, the UAE and the Palestinian Authority who don’t want to see Hamas strengthened. So I think it was a mistake and I’m glad it seems to have fallen by the wayside and I hope the Secretary tries again but with another plan.

Looking ahead to the 2016 election, what do you make of the field. Many Democrats are coalescing around former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, do you think you will as well?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I don't know yet. It's good to be out of active politics and watching it. I've known Secretary Clinton for a long time. We met briefly, though I got to know President Clinton much better, when they were both at Yale Law School. And I've known them well. So I have a lot of respect for Hillary Clinton and some of the things that I've worried about in both the Obama administration and the drift of the Democratic party which is away from American international leadership, I hope and believe would not be true with Hillary Clinton as the candidate, and if she's elected, as the president. But it's much too early for me, anyway, to decide what or whether or if anybody cares I will do in this campaign. The more fascinating part of the campaign, of course, will be the Republican presidential primaries.

What do you make of the rise of Sen. Rand Paul and the Republican Party's isolationist wing.

I've watched it with concern, because honestly, as a pro-defense Democrat, there's a way in which I relied for some period of time on the Republicans—and some Democrats, but not other Democrats—to support strong defense, muscular foreign policy, etc. Now there is a certain attrition happening on the Republican side, mostly among the so-called libertarians and to a certain extent among tea party people who are so focused on reducing taxes that they seem more willing than Republicans have in recent years to cut back on support of America's defense. There is—I don't think any of us have found the right word for it, so I opt for neo-isolationism. There is a kind neo-isolationism, certainly a retrenchment from internationalism going on in both parties and to me it's troubling. It's troubling for the future of the country.

How did this appointment come about? What are you hoping to accomplish?

It ended up with an unexpected result. Richard Joel, the president of YU, reached out to me last year about wanting to do something in my name at YU in public policy. For the obvious reason, I suppose, that I am both Orthodox Jewish and was involved in public service. I was touched and honored by that. Because I hoped and still do that it's going to be a permanent, endowed chair, but then they surprised me toward the end of the process asking me to be the first occupant of the chair, which I'll do for a while as long as it's working for me and the students, but i'm exciting about it. It's very much part time. I'm going to give three public lectures in the fall semester in various schools of the university, probably starting with one Yeshiva College, one at Stern [College for Women], and then one at Cardozo [Law School]. And then in the second semester I will teach an undergraduate course in public policy, public service. So I'm looking forward to it. I actually taught this last semester at Columbia law School and I'm going to repeat that course this fall and I enjoyed it immensely, more than I expected actually. It was just very rewarding to try to convey what I experienced and learned to the next generation of students, some of whom, hopefully, will consider public service.

I've taught college courses way back to the late 70s and early 80s at Yale. So those were residential college seminars and I enjoyed that too. But I must say that I'm at a different stage of my life. I finished my time in elected office, I look back at it with great gratitude that I had the opportunities I did. There is no question I was influenced by people who were in once sense or another teachers of mine. So I view this as an opportunity both to try to inform students today about public policy, but also to hopefully attract some of them into public service.

The Week: "Why Mitt Romney is perfectly poised for a comeback in 2016"

By Matt K. Lewis

July 31, 2014, 6:18 a.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] Nobody has ever rooted for that scrappy Romney kid to overcome the odds. Until, maybe, now.

Perhaps it says something about us that our most interesting presidential candidates swear they won't run for president. This is true of Sen. Elizabeth Warren, and it's increasingly true of Mitt Romney.

As regular readers of this column know, I've never been much of a Romney booster. I've also expressed skepticism about the notion he would run again. But let's not let 'a foolish consistency' cloud our judgment. There is reason to believe that a third try wouldn't be an absurd venture.

First, in the intervening years since 2012 — and on a range of issues, not the least of which is Russia — Romney has been proven right. And second — perhaps more importantly — one of the reasons so many observers viscerally disliked Romney was the cloying "goody-goody" quality that this fortunate son seemed to ooze. But do you know what the cure for that is? Losing.

That's right, Mitt Romney the scrappy underdog — the loser who's out to redeem himself — is a more attractive Mitt.

You know the term, "lovable loser?" He should embrace it.

There's a reason why Rocky gets knocked out by "Clubber" Lang early on in Rocky III. The rest of the movie is about the comeback. This journey involves Rocky shedding the trappings of fame and wealth — and getting real.

Romney would similarly have to get real. No more phoniness. No more telling us what he thinks we want to hear. He would have to be utterly authentic, and he would have to show that losing caused him to encounter pain and reflection. (The good news is that the Netflix film, Mitt, already helped show this side of Romney.)

Could Romney III be like Rocky III? Maybe, if the narrative is true and convincing.

There's a reason the "comeback" trope resonates with us (aside from Rocky, it's a prevalent theme in almost every boxing movie, ranging from The Fighter to Cinderella Man). These tropes are timeless precisely because they tap into something that we intuitively understand about nobility, courage, and humility.

People like comebacks. We can identify with the guy or gal who is struggling to redeem themselves (and nobody has ever identified with Mitt Romney before).

Ironically, Romney is almost tailor made to benefit from having lost before. What might be a devastating blow to most political figures — a blight on their resume — actually transforms Romney into a more compelling candidate. Having struggled and stumbled is, for Romney, at least, a feature, not a bug. The same could be said for Hillary Clinton, who only became a compelling candidate in 2008 when she lost her frontrunner status.

People who were hated the first time around — when their lives seemed charmed — can, by facing adversity and overcoming the odds, transform into sympathetic figures — heroes, even — that we actually root for (think Robert Downey, Jr.). Nobody has ever rooted for that scrappy Romney kid to overcome the odds. Until, maybe, now.

Someone who knows a thing or two about comebacks is Pat Buchanan. In fact, his new book is called The Greatest Comeback; How Richard Nixon Rose from Defeat to Create the New Majority.

During a recent discussion, I asked Buchanan about the prospects of Mitt Romney taking a page from the Nixon playbook. After all, George Romney figures prominently into the Nixon comeback story. "First, I admire that Romney is thinking of this," Buchanan told me during a recent podcast discussion, "and he ought to follow what's in his heart."

Buchanan, whose sister was a Romney advisor, believes that Romney should take a page from the Nixon handbook. Having lost to Kennedy in 1960, and then having lost the 1962 gubernatorial election in California, Nixon was assumed politically dead. But he was revived by working hard for other candidates — he worked hard for conservative Barry Goldwater in 1964, and backed liberal Republican Nelson Rockefeller's candidacy in New York — just to name two of the many GOPers he hit the hustings for between 1962 and 1968.

"If I were Romney, there's no doubt I would do it," Buchanan (who thrice ran for president, himself) continued, adding: "But I'm not him."

Thanks, Ami. This is great news. I'm obviously ready to help from CDI side on Malawi, Rwanda, Tanzania. An August visit to Malawi would be after harvest and before planting, so early May or November would give him more farming to see. The impact on people is year round, so the powerful human story can be told first person any month he comes.

We will have a generic version of expansion business plan we've done for Salida ready next week and I can work with others to build it into a comprehensive presentation on WJCF work and collaboration opportunities if that would be a near term step.
Glad to talk further whenever it suits other than 6 hour time difference.

Subject: Howard Buffett

Had a good call today with Howard Buffett. Like WJC, he talked about strengthening agriculture (sustainably) in developing countries in Africa, Latin/Central America, and beyond; and also in reconfiguring US food aid to enable more local purchasing of food aid rather than shipping US farm produce overseas. [Besides running his farm, he runs farms in South Africa and Central America and is currently a UN WFP Ambassador and advocate for their Purchase for Progress initiative.] He was surprised to learn there are so many shared interests. We discussed a few areas of possible future collaboration, all of which effectively are either “talking” or “doing,” on which I’d welcome your feedback:

DOING

- COUNTRY VISIT. We discussed WJC’s agriculture work in Rwanda/Malawi/Peru/Colombia and he is intrigued. He said he’s visiting South Africa (where he runs a 9,000 acre farm) in August and would like to visit Malawi/Rwanda to see CF projects. We can help facilitate his visit. I didn’t mention WJC’s Africa trip but should we consider a joint-visit whenever WJC goes? [He liked the Neno wheat example of working ourselves out of a job.]

- CDI. Funding for scaling-up commercial farms in Malawi/Tanzania. I explained our interest in growing the program, he said he’d like to work together given a lot of shared interests, and that he’ll be able to make a decision after seeing our work first-hand. Whenever he visits Malawi, we should be prepared with a specific ask.

- CARLOS SLIM. He said he has been in discussions with Marco about doing joint agriculture work in Mexico and he asked if we’d be open to discussing it and to WJC being involved as the convener. I said we work with Slim as well and that we’d be happy to discuss it together.

TALKING

- He is writing a book and would like to profile WJC’s agriculture work (we discussed Malawi). I said we’d be happy to discuss it further and provide him with more information about the projects.

- CGI. He’s going to try to come to CGI in September. He said it’s right around corn harvest so he doesn’t like being away from his farm but he will try to come for one day.

- He asked if there any appetite to do joint advocacy on agriculture issues – most notably US food aid. I tried to bring it back to CGI as an opportunity for him to share his message there under the umbrella of CGI. It would be good to give him information on any agriculture-related programming or action networks being contemplated for September, for him to weigh-in on.

Hope this helps, and I’d welcome your feedback. Thanks, Ami

As talks over Iran's disputed nuclear program enter the home stretch, Tehran has placed a major obstacle in the way of a diplomatic solution: insistence on an industrial-scale uranium enrichment program. On July 15 in Vienna, U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry and Iranian Foreign Minister Javad Zarif acknowledged that significant gaps remained between the parties. It now seems almost certain that negotiations will have to be extended for several weeks or months beyond the original July 20 deadline to conclude a comprehensive agreement. But putting extra time on the clock won't make much difference unless Iran is willing to make real concessions on the enrichment issue.

On July 7, in a major speech in Tehran, Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, the ultimate "decider" on the nuclear issue, declared that Iran has an "absolute need" of 190,000 "separative work units" (SWUs) for its nuclear program. This highly technical term represents a measure of the productive capacity of Iranian centrifuges, the cylindrical machines used to enrich uranium to fuel nuclear reactors -- or, potentially, nuclear bombs. Iran currently operates around 10,000 first-generation "IR-1" centrifuges, has installed another 8,000 IR-1s, and has installed but is not yet operating 1,000 more advanced "IR-2m" models. When the efficiency of these machines is calculated, Khamenei's stated goal for Iran's program would represent a ten- to twentyfold increase in Iran's current enrichment capacity.

A program that large could theoretically provide an indigenous supply of fuel for nuclear power plants, Tehran's stated intention. But it could also allow Iran to rapidly "break out," racing to produce bomb-grade uranium so quickly that the international community couldn't stop it.

For the United States and the five other world powers (Britain, China, France, and Russia, plus Germany) known collectively as the P5+1, Iran's apparent bottom line is a showstopper. Until Iran restores international confidence in its nuclear intentions, the P5+1 justifiably sees an industrial-sized enrichment capacity as incompatible with the goal of ongoing talks to ensure Iran's program remains solely for peaceful purposes. For that reason, U.S. President Barack Obama's administration and its negotiating partners are demanding at least a two-thirds reduction in Iran's current enrichment capacity. Even Russia and China, the P5+1 members traditionally most sympathetic to Iran, have told Iranian negotiators that their position on enrichment capacity is untenable.

Given the Grand Canyon-sized chasm between these competing demands, it's no wonder that nuclear diplomacy is teetering on the brink of failure.

Given the Grand Canyon-sized chasm between these competing demands, it's no wonder that nuclear diplomacy is teetering on the brink of failure. Despite days of intense negotiations in Vienna, Kerry and Zarif were unable to bridge this divide. Unless a workable compromise on enrichment can be found soon, the talks will likely fall into the abyss and the prospect of reaching a peaceful solution to the decades-old nuclear crisis will fade.

There are only three possible explanations for Iran's expansive enrichment demands. They range from unconvincing to deeply troubling.

The first possible explanation is that Iran truly believes that it needs such a large productive capacity for its civilian nuclear program. Under theinterim nuclear accord struck between Iran and the P5+1 last November, the parties acknowledged that any final agreement would "involve a mutually defined enrichment program with mutually agreed parameters consistent with [Iran's] practical needs." Iran needs enriched uranium to fuel the Tehran Research Reactor (TRR), which produces medical isotopes, and potentially its Arak research reactor. But Iran already has sufficient enriched uranium for the TRR, and the P5+1's proposal to allow Iran to operate a few thousand IR-1 centrifuges, or their equivalent in more advanced machines, is pegged to meet the needs for the Arak reactor if it is modified to run on low-enriched fuel.

But Iran does not define its practical needs solely in terms of research reactors. Echoing Khamenei's remarks, Ali Akbar Salehi, the head of the Atomic Energy Organization of Iran, recently asserted that Iran needs 190,000 SWUs of uranium enrichment capacity "to produce the required annual fuel for the Bushehr plant," the country's lone nuclear power plant. And if Iran commissions additional nuclear power plants, as intended in the decades ahead, Salehi said, "we will need more SWU [capacity]."

These rationalizations for industrial-scale enrichment are difficult to sustain. In the case of the Russian-built Bushehr plant, Moscow is committed to providing fuel for the reactor through 2021 -- and is willing to renew the supply contract for life. Iran claims , however, that a history of repeated supply disruptions -- dating back to its experience with the multinational Eurodif enrichment consortium in the 1970s -- means it cannot rely on foreigners. But Russia has consistently delivered fuel for Bushehr, and outside experts have pointed out that keeping a rolling stock of several years' worth of foreign-supplied fuel inside Iran, under strict safeguards, could easily address concerns about future disruption. Moreover, even if Iran wanted to produce the necessary fuel assemblies for Bushehr, it lacks both the intellectual property and the technical expertise to do so.

Iran's case is somewhat stronger for future power plants. But this requirement remains purely hypothetical and, in any event, will not materialize for at least a decade -- that is, most likely after the expiration of a time-limited final nuclear deal. If, at that point, Iran cannot secure cheap, reliable fuel from abroad, it will be able to expand its domestic fuel-production capacity. But future contingencies are not a convincing justification for doing so now.

A second possible explanation for Iran's enrichment stance is national pride. The country's nuclear program has cost at least $100 billion in lost oil revenue and foreign investment, and the regime has invested a tremendous amount of domestic legitimacy in defending it in the face of international pressure. The nuclear program has become a potent symbol of Iran's technological prowess -- an underappreciated motivation in a country that sees itself as one of the world's great scientific nations -- and the regime's revolutionary "resistance" to the West.

Indeed, it was the pragmatic recognition that a diplomatic deal was impossible unless Iran was given a face-saving way out that rightly led the Obama administration to acquiesce to a limited Iranian enrichment program last year -- a significant and politically risky concession to a long-standing Iranian demand. Now the onus is on Iran to make the next move. In an interview with the New York Times on July 14, Zarif suggested that Iran may be willing to forgo further expansion of its program for a few years, perhaps suggesting some emerging flexibility. But simply freezing Iran's enrichment capacity in place is not sufficient to allay international concerns -- the program will have to be meaningfully rolled back.

Doing so may require the Iranian regime to swallow a bit of its pride. If Tehran is open to compromise, however, there remain creative ways to frame necessary concessions as consistent with Iran's stated interests and asserted nuclear rights.

One is the use of time. Khamenei's declaration last week on the "absolute need" of 190,000 SWUs for Iran's program included an important caveat: "Perhaps this is not a need this year or in two years or five years." It is conceivable, therefore, that Iran could agree to scale back its program -- limiting both the number of IR-1 centrifuges and its stockpile of low-enriched uranium -- to meet its very modest near-term needs for research reactors. Then, it could grow the program again after a lengthy period of confidence-building (probably a decade or so), when fuel requirements for new nuclear plants actually materialize. A final nuclear agreement could specify these arrangements based on a fixed period of time or on a set of clear conditions related to the availability of foreign supplies of fuel -- or some combination of both . Either way, nothing in the agreement's terms would invalidate Iran's stated requirement to eventually be self-sufficient in the nuclear realm.

Another possible face-saving solution would showcase Iran's technological advances -- playing into the regime's narrative that its nuclear advances are proof of the country's scientific prowess. Iran could "voluntarily choose to retire" all of its "inefficient and obsolete" IR-1 machines, replacing them in the short term with a much smaller number of more efficient second-generation IR-2M centrifuges. A final nuclear deal could also allow Iran to continue pursuing research and development on more-advanced centrifuges, under strict safeguards and with the obligation not to install or operate them for the period of the agreement. Assuming that the number of installed and operating IR-2Ms was relatively small, and research and development was appropriately regulated, this could potentially lower Iran's current enrichment capacity for the period of the agreement -- addressing the P5+1's concerns -- while still allowing the regime to claim that it won international recognition of the nation's scientific achievements. Then, after the expiration of the agreement, Iran could deploy its new technology to meet emergent domestic needs.

So if Iran's goals are indeed to pursue an exclusively peaceful civilian nuclear program, there are ways out of the current impasse. But, of course, there is a third explanation for Tehran's insistence on a large-scale enrichment program: It wants a civilian cover story for the pursuit of nuclear weapons, or at least the capability to rapidly produce them.

Iran's leaders assert they desire no such thing. In 2005, Khamenei issued a binding fatwa -- or religious edict -- against the development, stockpiling, and use of nuclear weapons. And just this past weekend on NBC's Meet the Press, Zarif said, "I will commit to everything and anything that would provide credible assurances for the international community that Iran is not seeking nuclear weapons, because we are not. We don't see any benefit in Iran developing a nuclear weapon."

But, after years of repeated violations of its safeguards obligations under the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, Iran's demand for industrial-scale enrichment makes it hard to take these pledges at face value. With tens of thousands of operating centrifuges, Iran could reduce its theoretical breakout time to produce weapons-grade uranium from a few months, where it currently stands, to a few weeks -- so fast that it might be impossible to detect or prevent. Iran largely dismisses breakout concerns, and a number of outside analysts have recently challenged the utility of the concept. But even critics of using breakout capacity as a measure of a "good deal" tend to concede that leaving Iran only a few weeks away from bomb-grade material is a risky proposition.

Equally troubling is that the same infrastructure that could enable a rapid dash to weapons-grade uranium at known enrichment sites could also facilitate a nuclear "sneak-out" at secret ones. A limited enrichment program can be effectively monitored. But the larger Iran's accepted enrichment infrastructure, the easier it would be for Iran to divert small amounts of enriched material or sensitive technology to covert sites. Transparency and rigorous international inspections of Iranian nuclear facilities -- which Iran appears more willing to accept -- can mitigate, but not eliminate, this risk if Iran is allowed to maintain tens of thousands of centrifuges.

In short, unless Iran agrees to rein in its enrichment program, it will be impossible for the country to reassure the international community of the exclusively peaceful nature of its nuclear program. And that means it will be impossible to get a deal that resolves the nuclear crisis. Even if talks are extended beyond the looming July 20 deadline, the moment for thin rationalizations and excessive revolutionary pride has passed. If Iran's leaders mean what they say about their nuclear intentions, now is the time to prove it.

President Barack Obama plugs his own State of the Union address in a video trailer the White House is releasing Wednesday afternoon as part of an effort to set expectations for the president's speech next Tuesday, which unlike previous addresses won't include a new legislative agenda.

Going into his final year as president, Obama plans to focus more on the big themes that have defined his presidency and eschew a laundry list of policy proposals His explanation: he's got bigger things in mind than Congress, according to details shared with POLITICO.

"What I want to focus on in this State of the Union," Obama says in the video the White House will release late Wednesday, is "not just the remarkable progress we've made, not just what I want to get done in the year ahead, but what we all need to do together in the years to come: The big things that will guarantee an even stronger, better, more prosperous America for our kids. That's what's on my mind."

Standing in front of his desk in the Oval Office, Obama offers a broad preview of what he'll say: where things were when he came in, and how much progress he's led since.

Not mentioned: the Republican majorities in the House and Senate who would have stopped any legislative agenda from moving - especially in an election year- with the possible exceptions of the Trans Pacific Partnership and criminal justice reform.

In an email that will also be distributed on Wednesday, Obama chief-of-staff Denis McDonough echoes Obama's more-optimistic-than-ever theme and lists some of what's likely to be on Obama's brag list: December's budget agreement, the Iran nuclear deal, increased domestic oil production together with new environmental regulations, a peak in high school graduation rates and health insurance coverage, a drop in unemployment, crime and incarceration rates.

"What we have left to do is bigger than any one policy initiative or new bill in Congress. This is about who we are, where we're headed, and what kind of country we want to be," McDonough writes.

McDonough finishes with a plug for his new Twitter account, @Denis44, also inaugurated on Wednesday. His first tweet: "New Year's Resolution: Join Twitter And just in time for @POTUS' final State of the Union," with a link to the Obama video.

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton is hosting a New York City fundraiser for Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., on Monday.

Landrieu, trailing in recent polls to Republican Rep. Bill Cassidy for the Dec. 6 runoff, continues to face an avalanche of negative ads from conservative advocacy groups, such as Karl Rove's American Crossroads. But the National Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee, apparently confident of Cassidy's victory, has canceled planned TV ads in New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Lafayette, according to Politico.

Clinton, who campaigned at a New Orleans rally for Landrieu before just before the Nov. 4 primary, is hosting the Landrieu fundraiser at the home of long-time Clinton supporters Sarah and Victory Kovner. Tickets range from $1,000 to $12,600, with proceeds going to Landrieu's Senate campaign, the Louisiana Democratic Party and Landrieu's political action committee. Clinton, the former First Lady and New York senator, is the current frontrunner for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination.

Meanwhile, outside groups reported new allocations Tuesday to fund efforts aimed at defeating Landrieu.

Ending Spending Inc. reported in a filing Tuesday with the Federal Election Commission reported that it spent $187,000 for "direct contact" with Louisiana voters in opposition to Landrieu. The group was created by Joe Ricketts, founder of TD Ameritrade. Tea Party Patriots reported a $7,000 allocation for e-marketing efforts against Landrieu and $2,031 for automated calls and script writing on behalf of Cassidy.

Vote 2 Reduce Debt, another conservative group, is spending $1,600 on internet ads and phone banks in support of Cassidy, according to an FEC filing Tuesday.

Associated Press: "Hillary Clinton Treads Lightly On Policy Issues As She Eyes 2016"

By Ken Thomas

November 26, 2014, 9:33 a.m. EST

Hillary Rodham Clinton offered praise for President Barack Obama's executive actions to stave off deportation for millions of immigrants living in the U.S. illegally. But the Democrats' favored presidential hopeful has been less forthcoming on other issues in these early days of the 2016 contest.

Clinton is not, so far, a candidate, and she's limiting her commentary about the daily news cycle confronting Obama — a strategy that could keep down chatter about where she and the unpopular president agree and where they diverge.

The former secretary of state, senator and first lady is not talking about the Keystone XL pipeline, rejected by one vote in the final weeks of the Democrat-led Senate. She has yet to speak publicly about a sweeping climate change agreement between the U.S. and China, an extension of talks over Iran's nuclear program or the Senate's move to block a bill to end bulk collection of Americans' phone records by the National Security Agency.

When Obama announced his moves to prevent the deportations for nearly 5 million immigrants living in the U.S. illegally, Clinton quickly embraced the decision on Twitter. The president, she wrote, was "taking action on immigration in the face of inaction" in Congress. In doing so, she signaled that as a candidate, she would run against the Republican-led House and Senate that convenes next year. Clinton also drew a distinction from her would-be GOP opponents who have spoken of immigration reform in large part as a border security problem.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On other weighty policy matters, however, Clinton is mum.

"You've got to make choices if you're not a candidate," said Lanny Davis, a White House special counsel during the Clinton administration who attended law school with Bill and Hillary Clinton. "She is not a candidate for president. When she becomes a candidate, she has to start answering questions."

Nick Merrill, a Clinton spokesman, declined to comment.

Clinton is expected to make her political intentions known in the coming weeks, likely in early 2015. Her speeches are closely watched for signs of how she might offer a rationale for her candidacy.

Clinton campaigned for Democratic candidates during the fall, often pointing to pocketbook issues like equal pay for women, raising the minimum wage and expanded family leave policies. "A 20th century economy will not work for 21st century families," she said at an October rally.

Since then, Clinton has taken a more circumspect posture in public events, appearing at charity events and voicing support for issues related to her work at the Clinton Foundation. That approach allows her to stay above the political fray in the aftermath of Democrats' poor showing during the midterm elections.

Clinton has stayed close to Obama on immigration, releasing a statement that noted that previous presidents of both parties had taken similar steps.

The following night, in an interview at a New York Historical Society event, Clinton reiterated the need for Congress to act on a comprehensive immigration bill. She also put the issue in the context of families, saying the decision probably affected wait staff who were serving the dinner.

"There is probably no more pressing issue at this time than to fix this immigration system," said Alex Padilla, California's secretary of state-elect. "As a leader, it was right for her to speak up. A lot of people wanted to know what she thought."

Other policy issues carry more political risk.

Clinton has avoided weighing in on the Keystone XL pipeline, saying it wouldn't be appropriate for her since the environmental review by the State Department happened during her watch. The issue is tricky for Democrats because labor unions have supported the plan but environmentalists adamantly oppose it.

Clinton has called climate change the nation's "most consequential" issue but has yet to weigh in on the agreement Obama reached with China to set new targets for cutting emissions. The deal was negotiated by John Podesta, a Clinton White House chief of staff who is expected to play a prominent role in a Clinton presidential campaign.

Both issues could receive attention from Clinton on Monday, when she is scheduled to address the League of Conservation Voters in New York.

On NSA surveillance, Clinton has talked broadly about the need to balance the need for security without infringing upon Americans' privacy amid a debate over the government's collection of data. But she has kept a low profile on the issue.

Republicans contend Clinton is being overly political in the lead-up to a presidential campaign.

"Everything Hillary does is for political purposes," said Republican National Committee spokeswoman Kirsten Kukowski, "which includes taking positions for political expediency and not answering tough questions for political reasons."

CNN: "Is the Clinton magic gone in Arkansas?"

By Dan Merica

November 26, 2014, 9:34 a.m. EST

This state launched the Clinton brand two decades ago and handed Hillary Clinton one of the biggest victories of her 2008 primary battle against Barack Obama.

But as she considers another bid for the White House in 2016, Arkansas isn't so friendly.

In the final weeks of the 2014 election, top Democrats in Arkansas told Hillary Clinton and her associates that she wasn't welcome to stump for the party's candidates in the state, according to a knowledgeable source. While there were some in Arkansas who wanted her to come, the "stay away" contingent won the argument and Hillary Clinton was left to raise money for Sen. Mark Pryor from New York.

Bill Clinton made up for the absence, making 13 stops in the state during campaign season imploring voters to not make the election a repudiation of President Barack Obama.

Still, Democrats across Arkansas lost big. The governor's mansion flipped red, along with Pryor's Senate seat. The state's four-member House delegation is solidly Republican.

The rout was part of a broader repudiation of Democrats across the South this election cycle. But the results in Arkansas were particularly tough for the Clintons and raise questions about whether the state most associated with the couple is no longer welcome territory ahead of Hillary Clinton's potential 2016 race.

"The coattails were short," outgoing Democratic Gov. Mike Beebe told CNN. "It is a fact."

Changes in Arkansas

Bill Clinton handily won Arkansas during both of his presidential elections. But the politics of the South changed during his time in office as many states were increasingly dominated by Republicans.

Arkansas was a genuine battleground state during the 2000 election, when Al Gore and George W. Bush both campaigned here and spent money on television ads. Seeking to distance himself from Bill Clinton after his impeachment, Gore didn't campaign with the former President and lost Arkansas to Bush by 5 points.

By 2008, Arkansas was seen as so unfriendly to Democrats that Obama wrote the state off -- even as he won other southern states like North Carolina and Virginia that Republicans carried for decades.

Before the 2014 election, Hillary Clinton's supporters -- many at the grassroots level in Arkansas -- would quietly talk about the former first lady's chances of competing and winning Arkansas in 2016. They touted her standing with white women and working class voters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But after Election Day, those optimistic Democrats are harder to find.

"Limited," said Vincent Insalaco, the chair of the Arkansas Democratic Party, when asked about Hillary Clinton's chances of winning the state. "It is limited here in Arkansas."

"I think she could run a strong race here, but I think the electorate has changed," said Clarke Tucker, a newly elected Democratic state representative. "The state has changed."

Hillary Clinton moved to Arkansas in 1974, joining her soon-to-be husband, Bill, who was already a rising political star in the state. The couple would go on to dominate the state's politics for the better part of two decades and left a long list of confidants -- known as FOBs or Friends of Bill -- in key Democratic positions across the state.

But times have changed. Republican power bases in northwest Arkansas have grown, religious conservatives are a powerful voting bloc and the state's Latino population has yet to become a force at the ballot box.

"Arkansas is a real demographic nightmare for Democrats," said Andrew Dowdle, the vice chair of political science at the University of Arkansas. "It is a complete reversal of fortunes."

All of this complicates the idea that Hillary Clinton could win Arkansas in 2016. During the 2008 primary, Hillary Clinton dominated Obama, winning 70% of the state, her largest victory during that year's primary fight. That was the only time she has been on the ballot in the state, however, and was a contest with just Democratic voters.

The 2014 exit polls in Arkansas weren't positive for Hillary Clinton, either. Thirty-nine percent of voters said she would make a good president, according to the exit polls. Fifty-six percent said she would not.

Those same exit polls found that former GOP Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, who is also considering a 2016 run, is seen as a better presidential option in the state than Hillary Clinton. Fifty percent of voters in Arkansas said he would be a good president, compared to 46% who said he wouldn't.

With the former first lady eyeing another run at the presidency in 2016, Democrats and Arkansas experts said that while she would easily win the Democratic primary, she would struggle mightily to overcome what has become a changed state.

Democrat's silver lining: Obama is gone in 2016

Democrats in Arkansas blame Obama -- not the Clintons -- for their losses.

One reason Beebe, the outgoing governor, sees things getting better for Democrats in 2016 and beyond is because "Obama will be gone."

"I think it is all Obama," Beebe said. "I don't think there is any question that most folks feel like it was a repudiation of the president and the president's policies. But I think it is cyclical and the reason I say that is if you look at the history."

"Democrats are looking at what can she do different from Barack Obama," said Dowdle. "If you are a Democratic party activist, you would end up hoping she would win white women. ... That idea that a woman candidate could end up running and making the gap grow is not going to happen."

Exit polls show that Beebe is partly right: Nearly 70% of voters in Arkansas said they disapprove of Obama. Only 30% said they were satisfied with him.

For Inalasco, 2016 -- and a Hillary Clinton run - is a moment to rebuild.

"I would hope that she would carry Arkansas," he said, rejecting the idea that Democrats are done in the state. "But if she runs it is so, so positive for us on the local level, here, for what we can do with her popularity."

As for whether the Clinton magic is gone in Arkansas, Inalasco deferred his answer for two years.

"I guess," he said, "we will see what happens in 2016, won't we?"

Washington Post blog: "Clinton has a clear lead among Democrats — but would face stiff competition from Romney, Christie"

By Jose DelReal

November 26, 2014, 8:26 a.m. EST

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton continues to lead the 2016 Democratic presidential field — it's not even close — but another Clinton administration is far from a sure thing, even if the election were held today: A new poll out Wednesday shows that even as the clear Democratic favorite, she would face stiff competition from several would-be GOP candidates.

The new Quinnipiac survey has Clinton with support from a whopping 57 percent of Democrats, followed at a distant second by Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren, at 13 percent. Vice President Joe Biden trails with 9 percent, while no other candidate breaks the 4 percent threshold.

Clinton has yet to announce whether she will run but is widely expected to enter the race. The vice president has publicly flirted with the idea of running, while Warren has so far dismissed the possibility of a 2016 candidacy.

The field is far less clear on the GOP side, where former presidential candidate Mitt Romney remains the favorite with 19 percent support. The 2012 Republican presidential nominee has publicly said that he is not interested in mounting a third presidential bid. The poll has former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush following Romney among GOP voters with 11 percent support.

When Romney is taken out of the equation, Bush leads with 14 percent support, is followed by New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie at 11 percent. Both Bush and Christie have said publicly that they are considering throwing their hats in the ring, but have not formally entered the race.

Despite Clinton's enormous lead among potential rivals in the Democratic primary, the survey indicates she would struggle against several GOP candidates. Romney has 45 percent to Clinton's 44 percent, if the election were held today. And Clinton would have 43 percent to Christie's 42 percent.

She is a clearer favorite when matched against other GOP candidates, with a 46 percent to 41 percent edge over Bush, and a 46 percent to 42 percent advantage over Wisconsin Rep. Paul Ryan. And Clinton trounces Texas Sen. Ted Cruz, 48 percent to 37 percent.

The telephone survey of 1,623 registered voters was conducted by cell phone and landline between Nov. 18 and Nov. 23. The survey has a margin of error of plus or minus 4 percentage points.

New York Times opinion: "Who Will Save the Democratic Party From Itself?"

By Thomas B. Edsall

November 25, 2014

Not everyone agrees that Hillary Clinton's selection as the Democratic nominee is unstoppable. The first to challenge her is Jim Webb, a one-term former senator from Virginia.

Here is the case for the Democratic Party renegade.

When Webb, who served as secretary of the Navy under Ronald Reagan, announced the formation of a presidential exploratory committee on Nov. 19, he sought to capitalize on Democratic discontent. Taking a swipe at both Wall Street and Clinton's potential bid for the nomination, Webb declared:

"Our Constitution established a government not to protect the dominance of an aristocratic elite, but under the principle that there should be no permanent aristocracy, that every single American should have equal protection under the law, and a fair opportunity to achieve at the very highest levels."

Webb suggested that he could bring working class whites back into the Democratic fold and restore the biracial Democratic coalition:

"We have drifted to the fringes of allowing the very inequalities that our Constitution was supposed to prevent. Walk into some of our inner cities if you dare, and see the stagnation, poverty, crime and lack of opportunity that still affects so many African-Americans. Or travel to the Appalachian Mountains, where my own ancestors settled and whose cultural values I still share, and view the poorest counties in America – who happen to be more than 90 percent white, and who live in the reality that "if you're poor and white you're out of sight.""

The Democratic Party used to be the place where people like these could come not for a handout but for an honest handshake, good full-time jobs, quality education, health care they can afford, and the vital, overriding belief that we're all in this together and the system is not rigged.

Webb's exploration of a presidential bid is based on the premise that he can tap into a crucial but alienated segment of the electorate.

This bloc includes voters convinced that Wall Street owns both parties, voters tired of politicians submitting to partisan orthodoxy and voters seeking to replace "identity group" politics with a restored middle- and working-class agenda.

Webb's election history – his victory in Virginia is the only race that he has run – suggests that he will have difficulty achieving his goals. Before we turn to examine the forces that will make his candidacy a difficult one, let's take a look at some positives.

Webb is a decorated veteran – he served from 1968 to 1972 in the Marine Corps in Vietnam, and was awarded the Navy Cross – as well as a pointed critic of military intervention in Iraq, Libya and Syria. Opposition to the war in Iraq was a centerpiece of his 2006 Senate campaign.

Webb is a prolific author of both novels and nonfiction. His books are dominated by themes of war and fighting from “Fields of Fire” to “Born Fighting” to “A Time to Fight.” Webb notes with pride on his website his heritage as the descendant of “between 250,000 and 400,000 Scots-Irish” who migrated to America in the eighteenth century, traveling in groups of families and bringing with them not only long experience as rebels and outcasts but also unparalleled skills as frontiersmen and guerrilla fighters. Their cultural identity reflected acute individualism, dislike of aristocracy and a military tradition, and, over time, the Scots-Irish defined the attitudes and values of the military, of working class America, and even of the peculiarly populist form of American democracy itself.

Webb is one answer to the weaknesses of today’s center-left, the so-called “upstairs-downstairs” coalition described by Joel Kotkin, presidential fellow in Urban Futures at Chapman University. Kotkin argues in his recently published book, “The New Class Conflict,” that the Democratic Party has been taken over by what he calls “gentry liberals,” an elite that has undermined the historic purpose of the Democratic Party.

Kotkin contends that “The great raison d'être for left-wing politics – advocating for the middle- and working classes – has been refocused to attend more closely to the policy imperatives and interests of small, highly affluent classes, as well as the powerful public sector.”

I asked Kotkin what he thought of the themes Webb intends to raise, and he wrote back “I think he’s onto something.”

The Democrats, Kotkin believes, need “someone — Sherrod Brown, Webb, Jon Tester, somebody! — who speaks to the issues of upward mobility and incomes.” Both Senator Brown and Senator Tester have staked out populist positions in support of their working-class constituents in Ohio and Montana.

Most Democratic politicians and strategists, according to Kotkin, “just have no feel at all — as Harry Truman and Bill Clinton did, for example — for the aspirations of the middle class. This is why they are losing them, and deservedly so.”

Morris Fiorina, a political scientist at Stanford, is similarly critical of the “upscale capture” of the Democratic Party. In an email, he wrote that in the aftermath of the financial collapse of 2008, “the country is desperate for economic relief, but as time goes on it becomes clear that the administration’s economic policy is to take care of the financial sector, where hundreds of people are clearly guilty of fraud in any layman’s view. The result is building disappointment, resentment, and rage in the public, which results in the 2010 debacle.”

“Today,” Fiorina writes, “We have a situation where voters can choose between a party that openly admits to being a lap dog of Wall Street and a party that by its actions clearly is a lap dog but denies it. At least vote for the honest one.”

Asked about Webb, Fiorina replied, “the emotional side of me loves him.” But, Fiorina cautioned, “the rational side is worried about how he would actually behave if he were president.”

Further to the left side of the political spectrum, Krystal Marie Ball, co-host of the MSNBC show The Cycle, waxed poetic on the air about the former Virginia senator on Nov. 22, telling viewers that Webb was “such a contrast from Hillary Clinton.”

"Clinton," Ball said, “is polished and produced and perfectly calibrated. He is not. He is rough. He is authentic. He cares about issues. He speaks plainly. He doesn’t try to oversmile, for example, he just is exactly who he is. And there’s something very compelling about that, and it is a stark contrast from the very carefully packaged and branded Clinton image.”

Al Hunt, a Bloomberg columnist, warned that Webb “could be Hillary Clinton’s worst nightmare,” noting that Webb seems an improbable candidate. He has taken illiberal positions, was President Ronald Reagan’s Navy secretary, has few relationships within the Democratic Party, and has no serious fund-raising network. What he does possess is a long-held and forceful opposition to U.S. interventions in Iraq and Libya, and potentially Syria, as well as solid anti-Wall Street credentials. In Democratic primaries, these may be Clinton’s greatest impediments to rallying a hard-core activist base.

To gauge Webb’s prospects, I looked at the exit poll data for the 2006 Virginia Senate race, when he unseated George Allen, the favored Republican. I then compared Webb’s performance among key constituencies to the performance of all House Democrats running nationwide in the same year.

The results of this comparison do not support the portrayal of Webb as a candidate equipped to win over key white constituencies.

Take, for example, the ballots cast by white men. Webb lost among these voters by a 24-point margin, 38-62. Exit poll data on all House races in 2006 shows that Democratic House candidates lost white men by a smaller 9-point margin, 44-53. White women voted for Allen over Webb by 53-47; while House Democratic candidates split the votes of white women, 49-50.

Similarly, self-identified conservatives chose Allen over Webb by a 76-point margin, 12-88, while House Democratic candidates lost this segment of the electorate by a substantial but smaller margin, 58 points (20-78). Webb did not do any better with white evangelical and born-again Protestants, losing these voters by a larger margin than did House Democratic candidates.

To further check the validity of these comparisons, I looked at 2006 exit polls in two other close Democratic Senate contests, in Montana, where Tester beat Conrad Burns by less than 3,000 votes, 198,302 to 195,455, and Claire McCaskill in Missouri, who beat the incumbent Republican Jim Talent, 50-47.

Tester and McCaskill both performed better among white men and women, conservatives and white born-again and evangelical Protestants, than Webb did.

Let's forget Webb for a moment and take the question a step further. What are the prospects of winning the presidential nomination for a candidate who challenges current Democratic Party strategic orthodoxy? This strategy calls for identity group, rather than class-based, mobilization, on the assumption that turning out single women, the young, and racial and ethnic minorities is more effective than an uphill struggle to revive support in the recalcitrant white middle and working class.

As much as such a shift to a class-based strategy might result in economic policies more beneficial to less affluent Democratic constituencies, and therefore to more votes in the long haul, so far there has been insufficient intraparty pressure to force a change in strategic orientation.

It is not lost on Democratic strategists that President Obama won twice deploying a group-based rather than a class-based strategy. Even if the next Democratic nominee does not inspire the high minority turnout levels of 2008 and 2012, the 2016 electorate will be less Republican than it was in 2012. Every four years, the heavily Republican white share of voters drops by a little over 2 percent, and the disproportionately Democratic minority share grows by the same amount.

There are, however, fundamental problems with the current Democratic strategy, not least of which is that it is a strategy for winning presidential elections but not necessarily for exerting real political control.

The current approach depends on a Republican Party that refuses to adjust to the transforming composition of the electorate. The 2014 elections demonstrated, however, that the Republican Party and its candidates are not immune to feedback and will change if they have to in order to win.

Insofar as the Republican Party tempers its retrograde stance on social-sexual and moral-racial issues, Democratic campaigns stressing alleged threats from conservatives — the threat to freedom and privacy posed by the Christian right; the threat to Hispanic family unity posed by anti-immigrant activists; the threat to programs serving the poor posed by deficit hawks — will run out of gas.

That moment may be closer than expected. An Oct. 15 Washington Post/ABC poll found that the public held the Democratic Party "in worse regard than at any point in the past 30 years." An Oct. 24 Pew Research Center survey found, in turn, that the public favored Republicans over Democrats on such key issues as handling the economy, the budget deficit, immigration and terrorism.

Democrats, according to Pew, retained an advantage on less tangible qualities such as empathy, honesty and a willingness to compromise.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As attractive as those characteristics are, they are not top priorities for voters. Both Pew and Gallup have found that, except in times of crisis – for example, in the aftermath of the 9/11 attacks — voters' top priorities consistently include bread-and-butter issues, jobs and the economy.

In September 2006, just before Democrats regained control of the House and Senate, the party held a 30-point advantage, 58-28, on the question, "which party is better able to handle the economy," according to Gallup. Going into the 2014 elections, Gallup found there had been a huge swing on this question, with Republicans now ahead 48-43.

If those numbers do not change significantly before Nov. 8, 2016, it won't matter whether the nominee seeks to strengthen a biracial coalition by broadening white support or by increasing turnout among the party's identity group constituencies. The Democrats' lack of credibility on economic issues will hobble, if not extinguish, the party's prospects. Unless the Democrats develop a coherent, comprehensive strategy for the have-nots, it won't matter whether the party's nominee is Clinton, Webb or anyone else.

New York Observer: "Hillary Clinton's Deafening Silence On Ferguson"

By Lincoln Mitchell

November 26, 2014, 10:15 a.m.

"The frustrations that we've seen," said President Obama in a statement yesterday about recent events in Ferguson, Missouri, "are not just about a particular incident. They have deep roots in many communities of color who have a sense that our laws are not always being enforced uniformly or fairly. That may not be true everywhere, and it's certainly not true for the vast majority of law enforcement officials, but that's an impression that folks have and it's not just made up. It's rooted in realities that have existed in this country for a long time." The comments demonstrate the President's keen understanding of the environment that has contributed to the demonstrations and frustration felt in Ferguson and elsewhere in the U.S. following a grand jury's decision not to indict Darren Wilson. "Next week," the President continued, "we'll bring together state and local officials, and law enforcement, and community leaders and faith leaders to start identifying very specific steps that we can take to make sure that law enforcement is fair and is being applied equally to every person in this country." That sentence should provide great succor to those who want to see few if any changes to the system that produced Darren Wilson and subsequent demonstrations.

Meanwhile, few aspirants hoping to succeed President Obama had much to say about Ferguson.

Most of the Republicans seeking their party's nomination for the presidency in 2016 said little or nothing about the grand jury decision and the events that followed. This was wise and reflected a strategic environment in which Republicans no longer compete for African American votes. By saying anything at all, Republican candidates such as Ted Cruz, Marco Rubio or Bobby Jindal would only risk making a verbal gaffe that would hurt them with the white moderates they need to win in a general election. Somewhat predictably, the most visible Republican presidential candidate in the hours since the grand jury decision has been Rand Paul. Mr. Paul indicated that there is a need for reforms in the criminal justice system and that issues related to drug use and poverty should be addressed as well.

The voice most glaringly absent in recent days has been that of Hillary Clinton. Ms. Clinton the front-running non-candidate for the Democratic nomination for President has, in recent months, not been shy about offering opinions about Ukraine, Isis or President Obama's various foreign policy foibles, but for some reason has not had very much to say about the grand jury's decision or the demonstrations that followed that decision. This is a reflection of Ms. Clinton's generally cautious political style, but also raises questions about Ms. Clinton and the Democratic Party itself.

African Americans are a huge part of the Democratic Party base. It is extraordinary that the party's second most visible leader does not see it necessary or helpful to speak out during a moment that is so important to so many African Americans. There are lots of things that can go wrong for a politician when she speaks out at during times like these, but taking risks defines leadership.

Subject: Proposed "Loose Canon on Deck" Political Ad v. Donald Trump

Hello Mr. Podesta,

As a lifelong Democrat who has majored in political science and practiced law for many years, I take great interest in the 2016 Presidential Campaign. Of mutual concern to all of us is the egotistic and fear mongering "sound bites" spewed by Donald Trump on many serious policy issues. His overly simplistic, and often unconstitutional, solutions and have profound negative social and national security consequences.

Many of us react, when hearing his views on issues such as Muslim immigration and undocumented aliens, with the thought that he is a dangerous "loose canon." This suggests a potential political ad with the theme of Trump being the "loose canon on deck." While we all find negative political ads to be distasteful at best, it is evident that the Hillary for President Campaign will need to apply "back-pressure" to what is sure be a string of highly negative personal attacks from the Trump Campaign.

A well-conceived and professional produced 30 second "loose canon on deck" ad can have a similar impact to the classic Goldwater little girl/nuclear explosion and Willie Horton ads that have been cited by political scientists as having been seminal in reinforcing public opinion.

The reference to a "loose canon on deck" conjures the image of a tall man-o-war sailing ship of the line. This "ship of state" scene would cut between several highly provocative Trump statements and the cannon breaking free and rolling around the deck; getting ever closer to the "powder magazine" with each statement.

Finally, the canon crashes into the "powder magazine" causing an explosion with a small mushroom cloud (not uncommon in any large explosion), with a fade to a caption or voice-over such as:

"The ship of state needs a steady experienced hand; not a loose canon. Elect Hillary Clinton for President."

I hope you find this suggested of interest.

Regards,

Steve White

Subject: Re: Iran

I am still studying the details, but based on the briefings I received and a review of the documents, I support the agreement because it can help us prevent Iran from getting a nuclear weapon. With vigorous enforcement, unyielding verification, and swift consequences for any violations, this agreement can make the United States, Israel, and our Arab partners safer.

"In light of the international community's long history and experience with Iranian behavior, the highest priority must be given to effective enforcement of the agreement. Signing is just the beginning. As President, I would use every tool in our arsenal to compel rigorous Iranian compliance. At the outset, we must see the verified roll back of the Iranian nuclear program required by the agreement. We can never permit Iran to evade its obligations or to place any suspicious site off limits to inspectors. And the response to any cheating must be immediate and decisive - starting with the return of sanctions but taking no options off the table, including, if necessary, our military options.

"The message to Iran should be loud and clear: We will never allow you to acquire a nuclear weapon; not just during the term of this agreement - never.

"Today's agreement is the culmination of a sustained strategy of pressure and engagement executed over many years. As Secretary of State, I logged tens of thousands of miles and twisted a lot of arms to build a global coalition to impose the most crippling sanctions in history. That unprecedented pressure delivered a blow to Iran's economy and gave us leverage at the negotiating table, starting in Oman in 2012. I know from experience what it took to build a global effort to get this done; I know what it will take to rally our partners to enforce it.

"Going forward, we have to be clear-eyed when it comes to the broader threat Iran represents. Even with a nuclear agreement, Iran poses a real challenge to the United States and our partners and a grave threat to our ally Israel. It continues to destabilize countries from Yemen to Lebanon, while exacerbating the conflict in Syria. It is developing missiles that can strike every country in the Middle East. And it fuels terrorism throughout the region and beyond, including through direct support to Hamas and Hizballah. We have to broadly confront and raise the costs for Iran's destabilizing activities, insist on the return of U.S. citizens being held in Iranian prisons, and strengthen security cooperation with our allies and partners. Sanctions for terrorism, and other non-nuclear sanctions, must remain a key part of our strategy and must be vigorously enforced.

"Israel has to be confident that the United States will always ensure its Qualitative Military Edge in the region and its capacity to defend itself by itself. As President, I would invite the senior Israeli leadership to Washington for early talks on further strengthening our alliance. We must also deepen our security relationship with our Arab partners threatened by Iran. This includes our continued presence and providing needed capabilities. Iran should have no doubt about our support for the security of our partners.

"I know that there are people of good faith who oppose this deal - people I respect. They raise concerns that have to be taken seriously. They are right to call for extreme vigilance. I am as familiar with Iranian behavior and the need to confront it as anyone. I support this agreement because I believe it is the most effective path of all the alternatives available to the U.S. and our partners to prevent Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon.

"So we should applaud President Obama, Secretary Kerry, and Secretary Moniz for getting this done, and proceed with wisdom and strength in enforcing this deal to the fullest and in meeting the broader Iranian challenge."

Dear Jake,

Subject: Nuclear Power - the elephant in the climate change room

Dear Dr. Podesta,

I am one of the millions receiving e-mails from the White House and recently received one from you on climate change. After reading the President's plan I was disappointed (but not surprised) by how politically correct it was. "The future is renewable energy," was the message. No mention of nuclear power, which is the only feasible, clean substitute for the base-load electricity generation currently provided by fossil fuels. Even in his second term, even when some argue that the future of mankind is at stake, the President (and his science advisor) hang onto the fiction that renewable energy is the primary substitute for carbon-based fuels. I have been responsible for the design and construction of coal-fired power plants and nuclear power plants (military and civilian), was a DAS at the Energy Department and Deputy Director of the Princeton Plasma Physics Laboratory, and have 10 KWp of photovoltaic panels on my property, i.e., I have some knowledge of the technology and the science.

Replacing all of our fossil-fired power plants would require building 400-500 nuclear plants (8 per state, on average). That would give us a nuclear power plant "density" about 1/2 that of France today. What we need is a Manhattan-project-style building program for carbon-free power plants (nuclear and renewable), not more political correctness, from our leaders.

Bottom line - the Administration is not serious about reducing carbon pollution.

Abbas to Bibi: Only Replacement of PA is a Palestinian State

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas rejected Wednesday Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's concerns of a possible collapse of the Palestinian Authority, saying there was no plan in place for a break down of the interim self-governing body, which he said could only be replaced by a Palestinian state. "The PA will remain and any replacement must be a [Palestinian] state," Abbas said, adding that the PA "was one of the Palestinian people's achievements. They won't give up on it and no one should even dream of its collapse."

Tel Aviv Terrorist Believed to Have Fled to Territories

The security establishment hopes that they are closing in on Nashat Milhem, the murderer from the Hasimta pub: after six days of an unprecedented manhunt throughout Israel, the assessment is consolidating among the police and the GSS that Milhem has fled to the territories. His family in the village of Ara is also certain that he is no longer in the country. "The family believes, mainly Nashat's father, that his son is in the territories—and not inside the Green Line," said the family's lawyer attorney Nahmi Feinblatt.

Erdan: 90% of Illegal Weapons in Northern Israel from IDF

Missiles, grenades, rifles, explosives materiel and demolition blocks—these are just some of the illegal arsenal common in the Arab sector. This was stated yesterday at a rowdy meeting of the Interior Committee discussing the phenomenon of illegal weapons in the sector against the backdrop of the Dizengoff Street attack. Public Security Minister Gilad Erdan revealed at the meeting, "90% of the illegal weapons in northern Israel come from the IDF." An IDF official provided the committee with data on weapon thefts from the IDF in 2015 that 67 firearms were stolen from IDF bases. This surprised the committee as other reports held that number of illegal weapons much higher.

New Mossad Head Says Iran Remains Israel's Key Threat

Yossi Cohen, the new head of Israel's Mossad Intelligence agency, yesterday outlined the challenges facing the country as he assumes his role, highlighting the threat posed by Iran. At a ceremony to mark the start of his term in office, Cohen said, "The key challenge is the Iranian threat," saying that July's long-term nuclear deal between Iran and the P5+1 powers (UK, US, France, Russia, China and Germany) had increased the danger. He commented, "Despite the nuclear deal — I think because of it — the threat has significantly increased."

Israel Busts Hamas Cell That Planned Kidnappings, Murder

Hamas terror cell that planned to kidnap and kill Israeli citizens was discovered by Israeli law enforcement in December, the Shin Bet security service announced on Thursday. The group, whose members were from Jerusalem and Hebron, had planned to use the corpses of their victim or victims in order to negotiate the release of Palestinian prisoners from Israeli jails, similar to the motive behind abduction and killing of the three Israeli teenage boys in June 2014 .

Palestinian Authority Sides with Saudis in Iran Spat

The Palestinian Authority is standing behind Saudi Arabia in the current political row with Iran, Ramallah's envoy to the desert kingdom told a leading Arab daily. In an interview Wednesday with the London-based newspaper Asharq al-Awsat, Palestinian ambassador Basem Al-Agha said that his government's position has been clear from the outset, and that when it came to Saudi sovereignty and security, it stood firmly on the side of Riyadh. "The Iranian government doesn't support the Palestinian Authority, which is at the forefront of confronting the Israeli enemy," he said. Al-Agha went on to say that "the Palestinians have suffered from Iran's actions and strange behaviors, which aim to undermine the legitimate Palestinian powers and to create 'conglomerates' against these legitimate powers."

Egypt Asks Israel to Keep Turkey Away from Gaza

Egypt has approached Israel asking for clarifications regarding recent progress in its reconciliatory talks with Turkey. Senior officials in Jerusalem told Ha'aretz that Egypt expressed its reservations regarding granting Turkey a role in the Gaza Strip, and asked whether Israel had committed to any easing of restrictions in the closure imposed on Gaza. These officials, who asked to remain anonymous due to the delicate diplomatic nature of the issue, stated that what caused the Egyptian government's displeasure was Israeli media reports from a few weeks ago, according to which a breakthrough had been reached in reconciliation talks with Turkey, as well as reports in the Turkish media that Israel had agreed to take significant steps in easing the maritime siege on Gaza.

Bigger Budgets Won't Buy Israel's Arabs Equality

Startup Nation is doomed unless Israeli Arabs become better integrated, which isn't a function of government spending, but of Jewish Israelis changing their attitude.

By David Rosenberg, Economics Editor, Ha'aretz

The one thing we know for certain about last Friday's Tel Aviv shooting attack is that three people were killed, two of them Jews at a bar and one of them an Israeli Arab taxi driver. The presumed killer is Nashat Melhem, an Israeli Arab, but the police haven't caught him and don't know what motivated him to kill.

But it was enough for the media to routinely refer to him as a "terrorist" – and therefore an enemy of the state – because he was an Arab who had killed Jews, ignoring the fact that one of his victims was a fellow Arab). The prime minister used the tragedy of the shooting to make it an issue of Jewish-Arab relations, with a stern warning about Arab lawlessness and religious extremism. Days later, panicked Israeli passengers refused to let an airplane take off from Greece until two Israeli Arabs were taken off.

Apparently all it takes is one incident to arouse latent fears in many Jewish Israelis (including, it seems, Netanyahu) that Israeli Arabs are a threat that must be dealt with rather than fellow citizens. We ignore them most of the time but when they do make a brief visit to our conscious, it's usually as members of the Knesset making outrageous statements or young men running off to join Islamic State, setting off the same hysteria that followed last week's shootings.

But there are much bigger and more important things happening that tell a different and truer story. More and more Israeli Arabs are doing civilian national service and count for more than a quarter of the total, and polls routinely show they are content to be citizens of Israel. As the Paris attack showed, Europe has a much bigger problem with Muslim violence and alienation than Israel does within its borders. But the exceptions, and the media coverage they elicit, end up becoming the conventionally accepted rule.

Relative freedom for a people apart

Neglect and fear have created an unusual situation for Israeli Arabs, giving them the kind of cultural autonomy that would never pass muster in the West. They are educated in their own schools in their own language, they are subject to Muslim (or Christian) religious law on personal status issues and they live for the most part in their own self-governing towns. There are no bans on minarets as there are in Switzerland or the veil as in the case in France, Belgium and the Netherlands. Arabic is an official language and appears on road signs and product labels. Muslim Arabs aren't drafted into the army.

It's been a tacit agreement that satisfied everybody. Arabs could preserve the culture, religion and values, and the Jews could go ahead and build their Jewish state without having to be too concerned about making its institutions and ideologies relevant or accessible to a large minority of its citizens, or even have much daily contact with them.

But – European multiculturalists take note – this autonomy has made Israeli Arabs a population apart, cut off from the mainstream and the opportunities it brings.

Arabs are less likely than Jews to hold a job, and Arab women are the least likely of all. The poverty rate for Arabs is nearly four times as high as it is for Jews. Arabs perform worse than Jews on standardized school exams, and far fewer finish high school ready to go on to higher education. Arab towns get much less money for infrastructure and services, they have less land available for expanding and are not served well by public transportation.

Discrimination plays a role in this, but it is also a function of separation. If your mother tongue is Arabic, it's much harder to compete in a Hebrew-speaking environment. If you don't serve in the army, you don't share in a key experience of Israeli life, make friends and connections, or learn skills.

When he isn't baiting Arabs, there is a pragmatic side of Bibi that understands that it can't continue like this.

Netanyahu may or may not be concerned about justice or equality, but he does understand that Israel will be in trouble economically if more isn't done to raise educational standards for Israeli Arabs, bring more of them into the workforce and provide them with better-paying, i.e., more productive, jobs. According to a projection by the Central Bureau of Statistics, the non-Haredi Jewish portion of Israel's population will shrink to 50% by 2059, from 68% today. The two growing segments of the population – Haredim, whose share will more than double to 26.6% and Arabs whose share reach 23.1% – are both less educated and less productive than the core Jewish population.

Unless Israel does something to narrow the gaps, we risk dropping out of the ranks of the world's developed economies. Startup Nation, which requires a highly educated and motivated workforce, will be history.

That's why the cabinet last week approved a plan to spend 15 billion shekels ($3.8 billion) over the next five years on a wide-ranging program to shore up Arab communities with extra budgets for things like roads and public transportation, better housing, daycare subsidies, helping build industrial zones and education. Nearly everything in in plan is geared toward making Israel's Arabs better prepared for the job market – and not just as construction workers or cleaners.

But even if the plan is carried out – and past government's record on initiatives like this has not been very good – it does nothing to change attitudes. In fact, even as Bibi gave his backing to the proposal, he couldn't help worrying about the political fallout from the right. His official statement on the plan didn't use the word "Arab," instead calling the beneficiaries "minorities," and devoted more words to their needing to be law-abiding citizens than Israel's need to close socio-economic gaps.

The message is we're giving you money but nothing else. We still don't trust you.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

You can build roads and industrial parks and improve educational standards, but if a young Arab engineering graduate doesn't get the job because he doesn't "fit in" or because another Arab murdered someone the week before somewhere, it will be all for naught. The buck doesn't stop with the budget. It stops with attitudes.

Bennett: We're Literally the Border Between ISIS and Free World

Interview with Naftali Bennett By David Horovitz

Education Minister Naftali Bennett's athletic response to the Dizengoff attack made for quite a contrast with that of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who issued a bitter denunciation of lawlessness, disloyalty and incitement against Israel within Arab-Israeli society. In our interview, Bennett was strikingly upbeat about Israeli Arabs. "Israeli-Arab society is in a very positive trend," he said, calling Friday's attack "an anomaly" and stressing that the Israeli-Arab "mainstream wants to be part of Israeli society." In a conversation that covered Palestinian terrorism but began with Jewish terrorism, he was also strikingly critical of the radical fringe of Jewish extremists from whose ranks the alleged Duma murderer sprang.

Horovitz: The Duma murder case is immensely troubling. And watching film of that "hate wedding ," you see that this is not just a handful of people with that kind of mindset. How troubled are you by a) the killing and b) the wider phenomenon of an extremist fringe?

Bennett: First of all, I am troubled. But I do want to say, it is a fringe. It is. The actual ring is in the single figures, the people around it are in the tens, and I would say the sympathizers would be in the hundreds, but only hundreds. The more I learn about them, the more I see it's troubled youth, that in other circumstances, if they were in the city or something, they might have done drugs or something like that. They were hijacked by this very radical ideology. We now have to act in two directions. Obviously, whoever is involved in this murder, whether directly or indirectly, (there must be) full criminal (legal) action against them, which is happening. As you know, I backed providing the (security) services with special authority in interrogation.

We also have to act on the education side to get to these kids (in the wider circles). And again, it's not a big number, but the impact of their actions is huge. We have to pull them out of the grip of these people and get them back into society.

Horovitz: Where does the ideology come from? I'd like to believe that very few are capable of murder. But seeing the empathy for the notion, that this was something to celebrate, seeing dozens of people at that wedding, and then hearing from people that they've been to other weddings which, well, weren't quite so bad, but they were singing that song and waving knives…

Bennett: I'm not so familiar. Apparently the song is a song from the Bible. You can take anything and turn it into a terrible thing. For this fringe group, the murder is only a means. Their end is to dismantle Israel. That's their goal. In fact, you can see it in what they write. They are looking for the most sensitive issues, you know, the Arab-Jewish issue. They use the terminology: put the oil barrels there and blow them up. So, their very goal is to bring the world (down) upon us. It's the antithesis of the religious Zionist ideology which sees the state as something almost sacred. These people want to dismantle the state because they think the state of Israel is not legitimate. As I say, it's very, very rare.

There's a couple of rabbis at the very fringe that were involved in earlier stages. These people don't have rabbis. They don't have any leaders. No rabbi is extreme enough for them.

Horovitz: The rabbis planted the seeds?

Bennett: First, this term, "the rabbis," infers many, but one or two were a stage in the process of radicalization.

Horovitz: Should the authorities not be looking at them?

Bennett: I believe we are also looking at them. They were not involved in any murder, so it's a complicated situation, but we're looking at them. As (far as) we know right now, they no longer influence anyone. These kids are like a satellite that left orbit.

Horovitz: Netanyahu was quoted recently as saying we'll always have to live by the sword. I don't want always to have to live by the sword. As long as we have to, so be it. But I'd like to change that, if at all possible.

Bennett: I'm the last person who wants to live by the sword. I'm saying it as someone who participated in every military conflict as a soldier, as platoon commander, as a company commander. I served in the First Intifada, the Second Intifada, southern Lebanon in the 90s, Operation Defensive Shield (in the West Bank in 2002) and the Second Lebanon War. There's nothing worse than fighting in battle and losing your best friend, which happened to me in the Second Lebanon War. No one desires war.

(But look at) the reality of the Middle East, and this has nothing to do with Israel: Look at our borders. We've got Hezbollah on the Lebanese border. We have Jabhat al-Nusra on the Syrian border. We have Islamic State in Sinai. We have Hamas in Gaza. None of these players could care less about a peace deal or a certain piece of land. They have a grand vision, a very clear one, which can be boiled down to two words — an Islamic state. An Islamic caliphate. They're going to continue as long as they can. So the reality is that we need to live by the sword. I prefer living by the sword than not living. The reality, though, is that if we are overwhelmingly strong, if we are overwhelmingly powerful in our economy, in our morals, and in our willingness to use power, our power to defend ourselves, we'll see less loss of life. If we waver, we will face unprecedented battles and conflicts.

I'm very optimistic about Israel, notwithstanding the threats on our borders. We've always had difficult borders. When I look at the mega trends in Israel: We've talked about Arab society. We can talk about the haredim, who are gradually joining society. Not as fast as I'd want it, but they are joining. Look at high-tech. This year, new investments in start-ups in Israel are equivalent to almost all of Europe combined. That's unbelievable. What we're doing in water technology, in medicine, in cyber-security.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Horovitz: The death toll in Gaza last summer, Israel is being destroyed, image-wise over that. Even now, with a hundred plus Palestinians dead in the latest terror wave, Israel is being battered over that, even though most of those who have been killed were in the act of trying to kill us.

Bennett: Look, the ancient and new sport is to apply the same tools that were applied to individual Jews to the Jewish state. You place any state in our shoes, in perhaps the toughest location on earth, with an amazing tower of democracy, with the way we treat our minorities, the way we conduct ourselves, the vibrancy of this House over here, the Knesset, I'm so proud to be Israeli… you put any other country in our situation: no one would act as morally as we are.

It's very easy to sit somewhere thousands of miles away from here and second guess us. But we're fighting the battle of the free world. We're literally the border between Islamic State and the free world. Quite literally. The Golan Heights, that's where radical Islam meets the free world. The Lebanese border is where Hezbollah and Iran meets the free world. Physically. And it's tough. And if we weren't here, you'd see it all flow to the West. So we're the front bastion of the free world. That's how we should be presenting it. We're being treated unfairly. It's nothing new. It's thousands of years old.

> > BERNIE SANDERS: well, not really. you know, i understand that secretary clinton and her campaign understand that, you know, they're losing ground. we've started this campaign off 359% in the poll at 3% in the polls, we're closing in in iowa and we're ahead in new hampshire. so i sense in the next few weeks you'll see more --

> > BERNIE SANDERS: what i said several months ago, having a d-minus voting record from the nra, voting to ban assault weapons in 1988, yeah, that was a piece of legislation i wanted to relook at. but what that legislation had is a prohibition on armor-piercing bullets, it had language for a child lock safety for our kids, important provision. there were things i do not like and i was willing to rethink. we have rethought it. there's a bill apparently being introduced, i like that bill, it makes good changes and we will be supportive of it.
> > CHUCK TODD: another thing that will come up on the issue of gun safety is the issue of a waiting period. the clinton campaign is hitting you on not being supportive of something longer like a five day or seven day window and the reason this is being brought up is if dylann roof, the man who killed those nine folks in charleston last year, if there had been a longer waiting period he might have been prevented from buying a gun.

prayer with people then takes out a gun and shoots nine people. i believe very strongly in instant background checks. i think we have to expand it and make sure 100% that we keep guns out of the hands of people who should not have that, people with criminal backgrounds, people who are mentally unstable. that has been my view from day one. but you know, chuck, i think the reason the clinton campaign is getting defense sieve they see that we have the momentum. they see the issues we are talking about, a disappearing middle-class and new income and going to the top 1%, a corrupt campaign finance system where people like secretary clinton can raise millions of dollars through super pacs, those are the issues they don't want to discuss so tonight we're going to be discussing a lot of issues and the main issues is why the rich get richer, almost everybody else gets poorer and the fact that we have got to stand up to the billionaire class and change those dynamics.

CHUCK TODD: so you're in in favor of a longer background check? a five, seven-day background check?

BERNIE SANDERS: we are willing to look at anything that makes sense, that keeps guns out of the hands of people who should not have them. but i'm not going to be defensive on that issue. i lost an election in 1988, probably lost an election because i had the courage back then to say assault weapons should not be sold in america.

CHUCK TODD: let me ask you quickly about the iran deal. is iran still an enemy of the united states given what's going on? the improved diplomatic relations?

BERNIE SANDERS: it's funny. if you think back to 2007 during the campaign in which secretary clinton ran against barack obama she was critical of him, a question was asked to obama and said "would you sit down and talk to the iranians?" and he said "yeah, i would." point bag in you talk to your adversaries, you don't run away from that. secretary clinton i think called him naive. turns out that obama was right so clearly we have many, many issues and many concerns with iran but clearly also we want to improve our relationship with this very powerful country. i think the agreement to make certain iran does not get a nuclear weapon was a huge step forward. the fact we have the prisoner release was a good important step forward. so i hope we can continue to go forward to improve relations with iran.

CHUCK TODD: senator sanders, i'll leave it there. we'll look forward to seeing you, secretary clinton and martin o'malley on stage on nbc thank you, sir. it's going to be a humdinger of a debate. you heard senator sanders there mentioned hillary clinton in almost every single answer.

Subject: The Iran Nuclear Deal: A Definitive Guide

Colleagues & Friends,

The Joint Comprehensive Plan of Action is one of the most critical – and consequential – documents that many members of Congress will ever review.

Does it really block Iran's pathway to nuclear weapons? Does it help the United States better detect and deter future illegal Iranian nuclear activity? What are its strengths and weaknesses?

To help all of us with a stake in this debate answer these and related questions, the Belfer Center's team of Iran, nuclear, and arms control experts have worked together to publish "The Iran Nuclear Deal: A Definitive Guide."

Definitive Guide Here

Our booklet systematically assesses the agreement, offering balanced summaries and analysis of all its major provisions. This is neither a partisan nor a consensus document. Reflecting the range of its authors – Republicans, Democrats, independents, and internationals who have served at the highest government, military, and policy posts – "The Iran Nuclear Deal" articulates both the pros and cons of the key issues in the agreement.

We hope you find this guide valuable. I welcome your feedback.

Given all on your plate, and what I can imagine is a huge volume of incoming, I've been reluctant to add to it. But, please forward this to whomever is handling homeland security transition. Kevin McAleenan had a senior staff position at DHS for several years and knows the current vulnerabilities of the Department. He is preparing a short paper on do's and don'ts and I will forward it to whomever you suggest. But this note gives an idea of what he has to offer. He is not seeking to come back to the government.
I've been sending worthy candidates to Federico. Let me know if I can help further.
All best.

Thank you very much Sir. I have set aside time to work on the paper tomorrow, and will try to send it by tomorrow night or Wednesday. The premise is that there are a number of key issues that the incoming Administration will need to be prepared to address in the initial weeks and months of taking over the Department that are not widely understood--as few senior Democrats have spent time working in the new Department of Homeland Security, and its numerous agencies and complex headquarters' structure are not transparent. For example, with three "new" agencies represented by the creation of Customs and Border Protection, Immigration and Customs Enforcement, and Citizenship and Immigration Services merging people and functions from multiple departments, and the establishment of the Transportation Security Administration all occurring since the last Democratic Administration, there are a number of difficult cultural, policy, and operational issues to be addressed. Additionally, with new incident management mechanisms, including Homeland Security Presidential Directive-5, the National Response Plan, and the NIMS, the new DHS team will need to be prepared to manage responses to new threat information, natural or man-made disasters, a pandemic, and potentially even a terrorist attack.

Further, there are a number of key programs with high profile policy and operational issues that will present opportunities, but also major pitfalls, in the early weeks and months of the new Administration. The paper will discuss the major programs involved in air traveler risk assessment currently being implemented, including Secure Flight, pre-departure APIS, the Electronic System for Travel Authorization, and U.S. VISIT exit. Each face significant implementation challenges or policy concerns, including media, private sector, and Congressional scrutiny or opposition. Other areas, such as the SBInet program, which is intended to provide next generation technology to secure the border between Ports of Entry, and the Domestic Nuclear Detection Office's Radiation Portal Monitoring program, have been harshly criticized and are at crossroads. These and several other programs will need to be understood and addressed early on. I have had the opportunity to be involved in many of these areas from my experience as Executive Director of CBP's Office of Antiterrorism, and then, operationally, as Port Director at LAX for CBP. I would welcome the opportunity to transfer this knowledge to the incoming team and help them hit the ground running. I will send the paper on as soon as possible, and hopefully it will prove useful to you and the team charged with getting a handle on these concerns in the next 70 days or so.

Thanks and best regards,

Kevin

Senator Hart,

Just thought I would check in with you Sir. What an exciting new time in American politics! Than you again for putting Steve Flynn in contact with me. We had a great breakfast last week and I'm hoping to be able to work with him as he determines his role in the transition. I trust that the President-Elect's team will be seeking your sage counsel as well.

If you do get called upon, and you need someone, or are aware that the transition team needs someone who has worked at senior levels of the Department of Homeland Security to help provide ground truth on a number of issues, I would be happy to do that. My concern is that, as no senior Democrat has managed in the upper levels of the Department, there are a number of pitfalls on management issues, culture, key programs and policies, that are not transparent. I'm currently working on a paper on these points that I will forward to you.

In the meantime, best regards, and let me know if I can be of any service to you or your contacts; I have attached my CV. I'm not looking for a job in the Administration and have secured a commitment from my firm to give me the time necessary to support transition efforts if I should be called upon. Take care,

Kevin

Attachments:	Econ Inequality Conference Final.docx

Dear Colleagues,

As a recent article in the Scientific American notes, "The average American believes that the richest fifth own 59% of the wealth and that the bottom 40% own 9%. The reality is strikingly different. The top 20% of US households own more than 84% of the wealth, and the bottom 40% combine for a paltry 0.3%. The Walton family [of WalMart], for example, has more wealth than 42% of American families combined . As the journalist Chrystia Freeland put it, 'Americans actually live in Russia, although they think they live in Sweden.'" Or, as comedian George Carlin put it many years ago, "The reason they call it the American Dream is because you have to be asleep to believe it."

What will it take to wake up? We will be taking a modest step in that direction by hosting a day-long Friday, December 4 conference on Economic Inequality: Causes, Consequences, and Responses. It will feature a distinguished group of thinkers who will be discussing the multiple dimensions of inequality on both a domestic and global level. I'm attaching a schedule for the day.

Our attention has of course been riveted in the past week on the horrific events in Paris, and we are all understandably anxious about the threat of terrorism. At the same time, economic inequality is a profound challenge to our sense of a common life. As one column put it, "The challenge America faces is not simply a matter of equity. The bloated incarceration rates and rock-bottom life expectancy, the unraveling families and the stagnant college graduation rates amount to an existential threat to the nation's future."

I hope that you can join us on Friday, December 4 on the twelfth floor of Gewirz for a wide-ranging discussion of this urgent issue. Please RSVP here, so that we can plan accordingly and you can indicate your lunch preference: http://goo.gl/forms/ufxX1D977H

Hello All,
Unfortunately we weren't able to send a tracker to this event. But good news: we were able to capture the event via online-streaming video. Below are the notes from that effort.

Big Highlights

- McCain says Obama would have the troops come home in defeat -- someone yells "Un-American!"
- Says w/ 13 days to go in election, Obama has changed his tax plan again. Obama will say anything to get elected - now if youre unemployed, his tax plan wont help you; while his tax incr. will hurt you.
- Says yesterday obama tried to explain away biden's comments by saying sometimes his RM engages in "rhetorical flourishes" -- really? thats another way of saying he sometimes gives some straight talk
- Repeats, on Biden crisis comments, i know how close to nuclear war we came - i have been tested, obama hasnt -- it shows in his responses to challenges abroad (e.g. meeting w/ some world's worst dictator, incl. castro bros)
    - again mixes up obama and biden: says "sen obama" told campaign donors that they'd need to stand w/ them
    - are you ready to trust america's natl security to an untested leader in a time of war? 2 wars we're in
- McCain promises we'll share revenues w/ crist and any state who wants it (on offshore drilling)
- Intro speaker, Patty the small business leader, says Most small business owners earn over Obama's "magical" $250k limit

So proud. Reform family. Very proud and know you are too.

Honored to be back, spent part of navy career.

Straight talk, we need to win and bring real change to Washington. We need your vote, 12 days. Lots of words and after months of campaign trail eloquence, told the plumber "speard the wealth around". Redistributing the wealth, not growing the economy. Obama is more interested in controlling your piece of the pie than growing the pie. joe the plumber, or joe here, joes all over here. We shouldn't be taxing small business more. We need to be helping them expand, create jobs.

The small business owners, raise your hands. Thank you and god bless you. Same dream as joe the plumber. Obama wants to spread it around. Fewer jobs result. Obama is concerned that his plan is seen as welfare. He changed his tax plan after American learned the truth about it. He'll say anything to get elected. Unemployed, he wont help you at all. More concerned about using taxes to spread wealth than creating jobs, growing economy.

Worst possible time, especially for small business. small businesss would tax, provide 16 million jobs. He'd kill jobs. I'm not gonna let that happen. Mccain palin tax cut is for real. Cut cap gains tax, business tax. Keep jobs in America. Joe and small business owners, America didn't become the greatest by giving money t o gov. we spread opportunity.

Next president wont have time to get used to office. Lots of challenges. Ill bring troops home in honor and victory ,not in defeat. Obama woud have them come home in defeat [someone yells "un-american!"]

Biden crisis. We don't want a president that invites crisis. Obama tried to explain this away saying it was a "rhetorical flourish" - really? really? what he means is it was straight talk. Biden accidently delivered some straight talk to America.

Biden referred to jack Kennedy. I had a little experience with that and I was ready to go. I know how close we came to nuclear war. I have been tested, he has not.

Obama told camp donors . apparent. We know he wont have the right response. We've seen the wrong response over and over. Against surge. Sit down unconditional with dictators, including castro brothers. He's wrong on all. Ready to trust security to untested.

we cant spend next 4 yrs as we have the last 8, waiting for our luck change. We have to act, new direction and we have to fight for it. I've been fighting for this country since 17 and have scar to prove it. I'll fight to shake up Washington. I'm not afraid of the fight, im ready for it. Not gonna spend 750 billion to bailout. Sub prime crisis. Make sure we take care f these people. Will protect the value of your home. Buy mortgages, stay in home. Realize the American dream, buy up these mortgages, keep people in their homes. Why isn't the sec of treasury doing this? Retirees. Hold line on taxes to make America competitive.

Raising taxes makes economy worse. Obama wants to raise taxes in bad economy, I will never do that. Explosion of gov spending has put us into debt to countries that don't like us. I wont spend more of your money, Obama will and he want without taxing or debt. Government will live on budget like you. Ill freeze government spending on all but most important programs. Ill veto every single pork barrel and you'll know their names. 1 million a day in pork for Obama. You need jobs.

I wont make it harder to sell ur goods oversees. Make sure trade is free and fair. Obama wants to raise taxes. Last time – depression. History lessons and I wont make the same mistake Obama seeks to repeat. If – when I'm elected [on his own here] president we're gonna stop sending oil money abroad.
I acknowledge Obamas eloquence. Consider off shore drilling. We'll drill now and share revenue with the people of florida. You deserve it. Bring down the cost of oil. Invest in all alternative. Manufacture of hybrid, flex fuel. Create millions of new jobs.

Straight talk – FL is battleground state, gotta win. 12 days. America needs a fighter, who puts all cards on table. I have fought most of life. Sidelines. I know you're worried. America is great but we are at a moment of national crisis that will determine our future. Will we continue to lead the world's economies or will we be overtaken? Will the world become safer or more dangerous? Will our military remain the strongest in the world? Will our children and grandchildren's future be brighter than ours?

My answer to you is yes. Yes, we will lead. Yes, we will prosper. Yes, we will be safer. Yes, we will pass on to our children a stronger, better country. But we must be prepared to act swiftly, boldly, with courage and wisdom.

I am an American and I choose to fight.
Don't give up hope. Be strong. Have courage. And fight.

Fight for a new direction for our country. Fight for what's right for America.

Fight to clean up the mess of corruption, infighting and selfishness in Washington.

Fight to get our economy out of the ditch and back in the lead.

Fight for the ideals and character of a free people.

Fight for our children's future.

Fight for justice and opportunity for all.

Stand up to defend our country from its enemies.

Stand up, stand up, stand up and fight. America is worth fighting for. Nothing is inevitable here. We never give up. We never quit. We never hide from history. We make history.

Now, let's go win this election and get this country moving again.

TY and god bless you and god bless the united states of America. I need your help. Thank you and god bless…

> > SCHWEIZER: Well, I think it's -- if you look at a couple of recent examples. For example, Governor McConnell down in Virginia, or you look at Senator Menendez , in these cases, you didn't have evidence of a quid pro quo. What you had was funds flowing to elected officials, some of them gifts, some of them campaign contributions and actions that were being taken by those public officials that seemed to benefit the contributors.

Certainly, I think it warrants investigation. What that investigation will reveal, we'll see.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But a criminal investigation?

SCHWEIZER: Well, we'll see. I mean that's what the Governor McConnell has faced and that's what Menendez has faced.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But the...

SCHWEIZER: And I think the evidence here is far more widespread in terms of repeated action than there were in those two instances.

STEPHANOPOULOS: As you know, the Clinton campaign says you haven't produced a shred of evidence that there was any official action as secretary that -- that supported the interests of donors.

SCHWEIZER: Well...

STEPHANOPOULOS: We've done investigative work here at ABC News, found no proof of any kind of direct action. And an independent government ethics expert, Bill Allison, of the Sunline Foundation (ph), wrote this. He said, "There's no smoking gun, no evidence that she changed the policy based on donations to the foundation."

No smoking gun.

Is there a smoking gun?

SCHWEIZER: Yes. The smoking gun is in the pattern of behavior. And here's the analogy I would give you. It's a little bit like insider trading . I wrote a book on Congressional insider trading a couple of years ago and talked with prosecutors.

Most people that engage in criminal insider trading don't send an e-mail that says I've got inside information, buy this stock.

The way they look at it, they look at a pattern of stock trades. If the person has access to that information and then they do a series of well-timed trades. That warrants investigation.

I think the same thing applies here.

By the way, what's important to note is it was confirmed on Thursday, both by "The New York Times" and "The Wall Street Journal ," that there are multi-million dollar, non-disclosed donations that were made to the Clinton Foundation that were never disclosed by the Clintons.

This is a direct breach of an agreement they suggested with the White House.

STEPHANOPOULOS: That -- that is an issue for them, but it's not a criminal -- it's nothing that would warrant a cmii.

So let's look at some of the specifics behind your pattern.

SCHWEIZER: Sure.

STEPHANOPOULOS: A lot of focus on the sale of a company, Uranium One, to a -- to a Russian company. Of course, Frank Drisdra (ph), who had committed, what, a $130 million, a pledge to the Clinton Foundation back in 2006, had had an interest in this company.

But he actually sold it.

SCHWEIZER: Well, he sold his stock, but his firm, Endeavor Financial, continued to do finance deals well after that. And the individuals involved in the book, as you probably read, there are nine -- count them, nine major contributors to the Clinton Foundation who were involved in that nuclear deal.

The two individuals who were the financial advisers on the deal of the sale to the Russians, they're both major Clinton Foundation supporters. The chairman of that Foundation, Ian Telfer, whose donations were not disclosed, campaign -- and sorry, Clinton Foundation contributor. And there are others.

So this is not just about Frank Giustra. This is multiple layers (INAUDIBLE)...

STEPHANOPOULOS: OK, but you didn't disclose in your book that he had sold the interest.

SCHWEIZER: Yes.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Beyond that, this deal was approved by a -- a board of the government called the CFIUS Board.

SCHWEIZER: Correct.

STEPHANOPOULOS: This actually chaired by the secretary of the Treasury...

SCHWEIZER: Correct.

STEPHANOPOULOS: -- not the secretary of State.

SCHWEIZER: Right.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Eight other agencies on board, the secretary of State, Homeland Security, Defense, Commerce...

SCHWEIZER: Right.

STEPHANOPOULOS: -- Energy, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission...

SCHWEIZER: Right.

STEPHANOPOULOS: -- signed off on it. And even though the State Department was one of nine agencies to sign off on it, there's no evidence at all that Hillary Clinton got directly involved in this decision.

SCHWEIZER: Well, I think it warrants further investigation. And there's a couple of things that need to be clarified.

Number one, she was one vote -- or the State Department was one vote on CFIUS. But any agency has veto power. So it needs to be unanimous. So they had to support this agreement.

The second thing that I would say is that in the midst of all of this, Hillary Clinton was in charge of the Russian reset. She was in charge of -- in -- of the A123 nuclear agreements with the Russians. She was the one that was meeting with Lavrov. There were four senior congressmen on national security issues that raised concerns about this issue...

STEPHANOPOULOS: But wait a second. There were nine different agencies...

SCHWEIZER: Sure.

STEPHANOPOULOS: -- who approved it.

Doesn't that suggest that that was because there was no national security concern, not because of some nefarious influence by Hillary Clinton?

SCHWEIZER: But -- but look at the nine individuals that were on the CFIUS committee, the nine agencies represented.

Who was, by far, the most hawkish on CFIUS issues in the past?

Hillary Clinton. She was big on rejecting the Dubai ports deal. She was big on other issues. She sponsored legislation when she was in the Senate to straighten CFIUS.

This was a signature issue for her and this is totally out of character...

STEPHANOPOULOS: But the assistant secretary who sat -- the assistant secretary of State who sat on the committee said she never intervened on any CFIUS issue at all.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SCHWEIZER: Well, I think that deserves further scrutiny. I would question that.

To argue that (INAUDIBLE)...

STEPHANOPOULOS: But based on what?

Based on what?

SCHWEIZER: Well, I think based on her (INAUDIBLE)...

STEPHANOPOULOS: Do you have any evidence that she actually intervened in this issue?

SCHWEIZER: No, we don't have direct evidence. But it warrants further investigation because, again, George, this is part of the broader pattern. You either have to come to the conclusion that these are all coincidences or something else is afoot.

STEPHANOPOULOS: And that -- that is that -- the Clintons do say it's a coincidence. As they say, you have produced no evidence. And I still haven't heard any direct evidence and you just said you had no evidence that she intervened here.

But I do want to ask a broader question.

It's been reported that you -- you briefed several Republicans on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, including the chairman, Bob Corker.

Did you offer any briefings for Democrats?

SCHWEIZER: No, but I'd be glad to give them before the book is released. This was a -- a friend that asked me. He thought it would be a good idea to talk to these individuals. This was the committee that confirmed her.

And I was glad to meet with them. They did not get copies of the book. They did not get any material. It was simply a verbal briefing.

And I'd be glad to brief any Democrats before May 5th, when the book comes out.

STEPHANOPOULOS: As you know, the Democrats have said this is -- this is an indication of your partisan interest. They say...

SCHWEIZER: Well...

STEPHANOPOULOS: -- you used to work for President -- President Bush as a speechwriter. You're funded by the Koch brothers.

How do you respond to that?

SCHWEIZER: Well, George, what did I do when this book was completed?

I went to the investigative unit at "The New York Times," the investigative unit here at ABC. I went to the investigative unit at "The Washington Post." And I shared with them my findings, OK. These are not cupcakes. These are serious researchers and investigators.

And they are confirming what I've reported. So people can look at the facts and...

STEPHANOPOULOS: They haven't come -- they haven't confirmed any evidence of any crime.

SCHWEIZER: Well, but -- but it's not up to an author to prove crime. I mean do you think that when people first started looking at Governor McConnell or they started looking at Menendez, that they immediately had evidence?

You need subpoena power. You need access to records and information. You need access to e-mails.

There's all sorts of things that you can do. You can't leave it up to an author to say that an author has to prove a criminal case.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Finally, Bloomberg News is reporting that you're going to be looking into Jeb Bush's business dealings, as well.

Is that true?

What have you found?

Where and when will you publish?

SCHWEIZER: We've been working on it for about four months. We've been looking at land deals. We've been looking at an airport deal. We've been looking at some financial transactions involving hedge funds based out of the UK.

We have already reached out to several media outlets and we're going to adopt a similar model that we have here, which is to share that information with investigative journalists at established news outlets, share with them that information.

And I think that people will find it very, very interesting and compelling.

Peter Schweizer, thanks very much.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Thanks for having me, George.

Up next, the roundtable on this Hillary book and augways (ph) from the campaign trail.

Plus, same-sex marriage coming to the Supreme Court this week.

Bruce Jenner's big announcement puts transgender issues in the spotlight. We debate the next frontier in civil rights.

And we're back in just two minutes.

Maybe I'm being too literal here but that was my thought process.

If others think I'm overthinking this, we can use it.

Here's Obama in 2007:

Barack Obama, 2007

Thank you so much. To the great Governor of Iowa and Lieutenant. Governor of Iowa. To my dear friend Tom Harkin for the outstanding work that he does. To the congressional delegation of Iowa that is doing outstanding work and to Nancy Pelosi , Madam Speaker, thank you all for the wonderful welcome and the wonderful hospitality.

[Responding to audience] I love you back.

A little less than one year from today, you will go into the voting booth and you will select the President of the United States of America. Now, here's the good news -- the name George W. Bush will not be on the ballot. The name of my cousin Dick Cheney will not be on the ballot. We've been trying to hide that for a long time. Everybody has a black sheep in the family. The era of Scooter Libby justice, and Brownie incompetence, and Karl Rove politics will finally be over.

But the question you're going to have to ask yourself when you caucus in January and you vote in November is, "What's next for America?" We are in a defining moment in our history. Our nation is at war. The planet is in peril. The dream that so many generations fought for feels as if it's slowly slipping away. We are working harder for less. We've never paid more for health care or for college. It's harder to save and it's harder to retire. And most of all we've lost faith that our leaders can or will do anything about it.

We were promised compassionate conservatism and all we got was Katrina and wiretaps. We were promised a uniter, and we got a President who could not even lead the half of the country that voted for him. We were promised a more ethical and more efficient government, and instead we have a town called Washington that is more corrupt and more wasteful than it was before. And the only mission that was ever accomplished is to use fear and falsehood to take this country to a war that should have never been authorized and should have never been waged.

It is because of these failures that America is listening, intently, to what we say here today -- not just Democrats, but Republicans and Independents who've lost trust in their government, but want to believe again.

And it is because of these failures that we not only have a moment of great challenge, but also a moment of great opportunity. We have a chance to bring the country together in a new majority -- to finally tackle problems that George Bush made far worse, but that had festered long before

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

George Bush ever took office -- problems that we've talked about year after year after year after year.

And that is why the same old Washington textbook campaigns just won't do in this election. That's why not answering questions, because we are afraid our answers won't be popular just won't do. That's why telling the American people what we think they want to hear instead of telling the American people what they need to hear just won't do. Triangulating and poll-driven positions because we're worried about what Mitt or Rudy might say about us just won't do. If we are really serious about wining this election Democrats, we can't live in fear of losing it.
This party -- the party of Jefferson and Jackson; of Roosevelt and Kennedy -- has always made the biggest difference in the lives of the American people when we led, not by polls, but by principle; not by calculation, but by conviction; when we summoned the entire nation to a common purpose -- a higher purpose. And I run for the Presidency of the United States of America because that's the party America needs us to be right now.

A party that offers not just a difference in policies, but a difference in leadership.

A party that doesn't just focus on how to win but why we should. A party that doesn't just offer change as a slogan, but real, meaningful change -- change that America can believe in. That's why I'm in this race. That's why I am running for the Presidency of the United States of America -- to offer change that we can believe in.

I am in this race to tell the corporate lobbyists that their days of setting the agenda in Washington are over. I have done more than any other candidate in this race to take on lobbyists -- and won. They have not funded my campaign, they will not get a job in my White House, and they will not drown out the voices of the American people when I am President. I'm in this race to take those tax breaks away from companies that are moving jobs overseas and put them in the pockets of hard working Americans who deserve it. And I won't raise the minimum wage every ten years -- I will raise it to keep pace so that workers don't' fall behind.

That is why I am in it. To protect the American worker. To fight for the American worker.
I'm in this race because I want to stop talking about the outrage of 47 million Americans without health care and start actually doing something about it. I expanded health care in Illinois by bringing Democrats and Republicans together. By taking on the insurance industry. And that is how I will make certain that every single American in this country has health care they can count on and I won't do it twenty years from now, I won't do it ten years from now, I will do it by the end of my first term as President of the United States of America.

I run for president to make sure that every American child has the best education that we have to offer -- from the day they are born to the day they graduate from college. And I won't just talk about how great teachers are -- as President I will reward them for their greatness -- by raising salaries and giving them more support. That's why I'm in this race.

I am running for President because I am sick and tired of democrats thinking that the only way to look tough on national security is by talking, and acting, and voting like George Bush Republicans.

When I am this party's nominee, my opponent will not be able to say that I voted for the war in Iraq; or that I gave George Bush the benefit of the doubt on Iran; or that I supported Bush-Cheney policies of not talking to leaders that we don't like. And he will not be able to say that I wavered on something as fundamental as whether or not it is ok for America to torture -- because it is never ok. That's why I am in it.

As President, I will end the war in Iraq. We will have our troops home in sixteen months. I will close Guantanamo. I will restore habeas corpus. I will finish the fight against Al Qaeda. And I will lead the world to combat the common threats of the 21st century -- nuclear weapons and terrorism; climate change and poverty; genocide and disease. And I will send once more a message to those yearning faces beyond our shores that says, "You matter to us. Your future is our future. And our moment is now."

America, our moment is now.

Our moment is now.

I don't want to spend the next year or the next four years re-fighting the same fights that we had in the 1990s.

I don't want to pit Red America against Blue America, I want to be the President of the United States of America.

And if those Republicans come at me with the same fear-mongering and swift-boating that they usually do, then I will take them head on. Because I believe the American people are tired of fear and tired of distractions and tired of diversions. We can make this election not about fear, but about the future. And that won't just be a Democratic victory; that will be an American victory.

And that is a victory America needs right now.

I am not in this race to fulfill some long-held ambitions or because I believe it's somehow owed to me. I never expected to be here, I always knew this journey was improbable. I've never been on a journey that wasn't.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I am running in this race because of what Dr. King called "the fierce urgency of now." Because I believe that there's such a thing as being too late. And that hour is almost upon us.

I don't want to wake up four years from now and find out that millions of Americans still lack health care because we couldn't take on the insurance industry.

I don't want to see that the oceans have risen a few more inches. The planet has reached a point of no return because we couldn't find a way to stop buying oil from dictators.

I don't want to see more American lives put at risk because no one had the judgment or the courage to stand up against a misguided war before we sent our troops into fight.

I don't want to see homeless veterans on the streets. I don't want to send another generation of American children to failing schools. I don't want that future for my daughters. I don't want that future for your sons. I do not want that future for America.

I'm in this race for the same reason that I fought for jobs for the jobless and hope for the hopeless on the streets of Chicago; for the same reason I fought for justice and equality as a civil rights lawyer; for the same reason that I fought for Illinois families for over a decade.

Because I will never forget that the only reason that I'm standing here today is because somebody, somewhere stood up for me when it was risky. Stood up when it was hard. Stood up when it wasn't popular. And because that somebody stood up, a few more stood up. And then a few thousand stood up. And then a few million stood up. And standing up, with courage and clear purpose, they somehow managed to change the world.

That's why I'm running, Iowa -- to give our children and grandchildren the same chances somebody gave me.

That's why I'm running, Democrats -- to keep the American Dream alive for those who still hunger for opportunity, who still thirst for equality.

That's why I'm asking you to stand with me, that's why I'm asking you to caucus for me, that's why I am asking you to stop settling for what the cynics say we have to accept. In this election -- in this moment -- let us reach for what we know is possible. A nation healed. A world repaired. An America that believes again. Thank you very much everybody.

Marco Rubio, once sunny, turns dark to try matching the GOP mood

BY JAMES HOHMANN

THE BIG IDEA:

MARSHALLTOWN, Iowa—If you read the transcript of Marco Rubio's town hall meeting here yesterday, you could be forgiven for thinking the speaker was Ted Cruz.

Commentators often put the Florida senator in the so-called establishment lane, pitting him against Jeb Bush, Chris Christie and John Kasich. But on the trail this week, he sounds nothing like an establishment candidate.

Asked for his "current thinking on immigration" by a woman in an overflowing community center an hour outside of Des Moines, Rubio freely acknowledged a shift. He warned that ISIS is recruiting doctors and students to sneak into the United States. "This is no longer the issue it used to be," he said. "ISIS understands out immigration system and is deliberately manipulating it to get killers in…and we cannot allow that to happen."

Asked about Common Core, Rubio began his answer by declaring: "First of all, I don't even think we need a federal Department of Education." The answer that followed largely involved promising to cut off federal funding for sanctuary cities and his opposition to amnesty. (He ignored a reporter's question about whether he still supports a pathway to citizenship afterward.)

— The 44-year-old's stump speech has been undeniably influenced by the populist anger that Donald Trump has tapped into. "We are going to be a great country again," Rubio said as he closed the town hall. "America's going to be greater than it's ever been, if you give me the chance to be your president."

— He has de-emphasized the optimistic language about "a new American century" that was the hallmark of 2015. The Post's Rubio beat reporter, Sean Sullivan, also observes that "his criticism of Obama and Clinton is more piercing, the elbows he is throwing at his GOP opponents are sharper and his warnings about the national security risks of siding with them over him are more dire and more frequent."

— Rubio is also stepping up outreach to social conservatives. He's going up this weekend with a new commercial in Iowa that says his Christian faith shapes every decision he makes. "Our goal is eternity, the ability to live alongside our Creator for all time, to accept the free gift of salvation offered to us by Jesus Christ," he says to camera. "The struggle on a daily basis as a Christian is to remind ourselves of this. The purpose of our life is to cooperate with God's plan. To those who much have been given, much is expected. And we will be asked to account for that. Were your treasures stored up on earth or in heaven?" (Watch here.)

— The Floridian is making inroads with Bush voters in Iowa, who think he would post up better against Hillary Clinton in a general election. Doug Butler, 55, who works at a local manufacturer, planned to caucus for Bush until he came to see Rubio. "Jeb certainly knows the issues … but I'm ready for the next generation," he said afterward. "My biggest reason for shifting support is he can communicate. I don't know what it is about the Bushes. That little hesitancy they have when they talk is just disorienting."

— Rubio promised to spend a lot more time in Iowa over the final weeks, but he's still not staking his hopes on any one of the first four states. One of the big knocks on Rubio over the past year, especially in the Hawkeye State, has been how little time he spends engaging with voters. That's changing in the final weeks, as he steps up his public schedule. "A lot of people are just starting to pay attention," said state Sen. Jack Whitver, the chair of Rubio's Iowa campaign. "After New Year's is when a lot of people go from the dating stage to the marrying stage."

Rubio's aides were trying to get him to wrap up the town hall here so that he could get on to a meeting with the editorial board of the Des Moines Register. Rubio wanted to stay a little longer. "I'm fired up now," he said. "The coffee is kicking in!"

— John McCain questioned Ted Cruz's eligibility to be president. The Arizona senator, who has long clashed with Cruz in the Senate, said in an Arizona TV interview that "it's worth looking into" whether Cruz is a natural born citizen, a requirement to be president. When asked how Cruz could run for president if he was born in Canada, McCain answered, "I do not know the answer to that." McCain was born in the Panama Canal Zone in 1936, and the Senate unanimously passed a resolution declaring him a natural born citizen when he ran for president in 2008, Katie Zezima notes. "McCain said Wednesday the issue is different because the Canal Zone was a territory and U.S. Military base and there was precedent set when Barry Goldwater, who was born in Arizona when it was a territory, ran for president. 'That's different than being born on foreign soil,' he said. 'I think there is a question,' he said of Cruz. 'I am not a constitutional scholar on that but I think it's worth looking into. I don't think it's illegitimate to look into it.'" This is happens when your Senate colleagues, especially the Republicans, hate you.

There was a spate of anti-Cruz birtherism across the Republican spectrum yesterday:

- Ann Coulter said it is "absolutely false" that Cruz is a natural-born citizen.
- Rand Paul brought up the issue at an event, noting that Cruz is eligible to be prime minister of Canada.
- Trump called on Cruz to go to court and ask for a declaratory judgment to clear up the matter.

Cruz defended his eligibility in Iowa. Speaking to reporters before an event in Rock Rapids yesterday, Cruz said that his birth in Canada to a Cuban father and American mother did not change the fact that he was a natural born citizen. “It’s settled law,” Cruz said. “The child of a U.S. citizen, born abroad, is a U.S. citizen. People will continue to make hay of it as a political matter, but as a legal matter it’s quite straightforward. It’s occurred many times in history.” He even invoked McCain. (David Weigel)

— Hillary Clinton made pointed overtures to Bernie Sanders supporters in Nevada at a dinner that drew 2,200 Democrats. “It was the Sanders boosters who were loudest, maybe because … they were eager to be heard in a state where Sanders is fighting for relevance,” Abby Phillip and John Wagner report from a much-anticipated cattle call in Las Vegas. “Clinton comes into this contest with significant advantages. She won the state in 2008 and has the edge to win it a second time on Feb. 20. Still, the former secretary of state also faces an energized opposition — many of them younger voters and caucuses who she will need if she is the nominee.”

- Clinton told Sanders supporters that she, too, is on their side, but is more prepared than other Democrats running to do the job. “I need you,” she told the room. “You can also count on me to stand my ground especially when it comes to those powerful interests that are holding back American families. If Republicans weren’t worried why are hedge fund billionaires already running ads against me?”

- “Sanders used his remarks to try to make the case that he could energize more voters in the fall, citing the large turnouts he’s had at his campaign rallies, particularly among younger voters. ‘That result will not happen with establishment politics and establishment economics,’ he said. ‘We will not succeed unless we galvanize the American people.’”
- As Clinton spoke, the crowd remained divided. “Sanders supporters shuffled their seats, others raised their signs and at times grumbled vocally,” Abby and John relay. “At one point, campaign organizers walked through the aisles gesturing with a finger to the mouth that supporters should express their disagreement with Clinton silently.”

Jeb Bush in New Hampshire (Reuters/Brian Snyder)

— Jeb Bush told The Post that the GOP primary in New Hampshire is now a five-way race for second-place behind Trump. “Trump’s the front-runner and there’s a jump ball for second,” he said in an interview with Ed O’Keefe . Asked whom he would consider in that five-way race, Bush said himself, Christie, Cruz, Kasich and Rubio. Bush then honed in on Christie and his fiscal record. “New Jersey’s credit ratings has been downgraded nine times during Christie’s tenure due to shortfalls with the state’s pension system.” Bush noted he took Florida from a double-A to triple-A bond rating. “Our pension was never raided to pay for the current obligations,” Bush said in a clear knock at the Christie.

— Iran accused Saudi Arabia of delivering an airstrike on the Iranian Embassy in Yemen's war-battered capital, a claim that could not be immediately verified but reflected the deepening tensions between the regional powers. "The Associated Press reported there was no visible damage at the embassy compound in Sanaa, which is held by rebel fighters who have faced more than nine months of airstrikes from a Saudi-led military coalition," per Hugh Naylor and Brian Murphy. "Iran gave no immediate details on its claim, which was carried by state-run media."

— "Report: Clinton-led State Department gave 'inaccurate' answer on email use, " by Carol Leonnig and Rosalind S. Helderman: "Two years before the public learned of Hillary Clinton's private server, the State Department gave an 'inaccurate and incomplete' response about her email use when it told an outside group that it had no documents about Clinton's email accounts beyond her government address, according to a report from the State Department's inspector general to be released Thursday. The State Department made its statement in response to a 2012 records request from the independent watchdog group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington. The response came even though Clinton's chief of staff, who knew about the secretary's private account, was aware of the inquiry … In addition, the IG review found that agency staff had not searched Clinton's office for emails. … His office is preparing an additional report that could touch even more directly on Clinton's conduct — examining the use of personal email and its effect on the department's compliance with its duty to preserve records."

–"For Hillary Clinton, old news or new troubles? " by Karen Tumulty and Frances Stead Sellers: "The ghosts of the 1990s have returned to confront Hillary Clinton, released from the vault by Donald Trump and revved up by a 21st-century version of the scandal machine that almost destroyed her husband's presidency. This is a moment that her campaign has long expected. What remains to be seen is whether a reminder of allegations of sexual impropriety against Bill Clinton — which were deemed to have varying levels of credibility when they were first aired — can gain new traction in a different context. The fresher case being made is that Hillary Clinton has been, at a minimum, hypocritical about her husband's treatment of women, and possibly even complicit in discrediting his accusers. And it is being pressed at a time when there is a new sensitivity toward victims of unwanted sexual contact, and when one of the biggest news stories is the prosecution of once-beloved comedian Bill Cosby."

"Juanita Broaddrick had accused Bill Clinton of raping her in 1978, when she was working on his Arkansas gubernatorial campaign. … Broaddrick, now a Trump supporter, tweeted Wednesday: 'I was 35 years old when Bill Clinton, Ark. Attorney General raped me and Hillary tried to silence me. I am now 73. . . .it never goes away.' In an interview, she said she had watched Bill Clinton's first solo campaign appearance on his wife's behalf on television Monday. 'He looked so beaten, and he looked like everything in his past was catching up to him. He looked so downtrodden. It made my heart sing,' Broaddrick said."

North Korean leader Kim Jong Un (Undated photo released by North Korea's news agency, distributed by Reuters)

— "Few options on the table to pressure Pyongyang " after nuclear test, by Karen DeYoung and Anna Fifield: "Any additional pressure on North Korea — already the most severely sanctioned country in the world — would have to involve major action by China, its largest trading partner and supplier of much of its foreign aid. … But Beijing has been reluctant to risk action that could seriously destabilize North Korea, sending hordes across its border, perhaps leaving nuclear weapons unsecured, and ceding a strategic bulwark against the powerful U.S., Japanese and South Korean military alliance in the northern Pacific. … Attempts to impose further restraints on North Korea's nuclear supply line are viewed as likely to have only modest, if any, effect. The country received most of what it needed from abroad to develop nuclear weapons years ago, and its program is now mostly indigenous. … One avenue for further economic pressure would be to sanction Chinese banks that do business with North Korea, although there is widespread reluctance to take measures against major Chinese institutions that are pillars of the international financial system."

- The Obama administration and nuclear experts are increasingly confident that it was not actually a hydrogen bomb.
- A1 analysis — "North Korea got less attention as Obama focused on Iran nuke deal," by David Nakamura: The administration "pursued a decidedly less-clear strategy on containing North Korea, a rogue state that already possesses an atomic weapon."

GOOD READS FROM ELSEWHERE:

— New York Times, "Pentagon will extend military honors to drone operators far from battles," by Michael S. Schmidt: "The Defense Department on Thursday is scheduled to announce that it has created a designation to recognize service members who had a direct effect on combat operations even though they were operating remotely, Pentagon officials said. Drone pilots are likely to receive many of the awards, but they may also be given to operators who launch cyberattacks. … Current and former military officials had been deeply divided about whether to recognize the drone pilots. An initial Pentagon plan in 2013 to honor them with a 'Distinguished Warfare Medal' was criticized by some veterans' groups, which feared that the award would rank higher than combat medals like the Bronze Star and the Purple Heart. The Veterans of Foreign Wars sent a letter to Mr. Obama expressing its objections to the proposed medal. Some veterans have derided such recognition as a 'geek cross.' Defense Secretary Leon Panetta announced the planned medal during his final days at the Pentagon in 2013. But the proposal was scuttled by his successor, Chuck Hagel, amid the fury from the veterans' groups."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

— Politico, "Rubio ditches thrift and flies private jets almost exclusively, " by Shane Goldmacher: "After spending most of 2015 bragging about his thriftiness when it came to flying commercial and coach, Marco Rubio quietly has been using a private jet almost exclusively for his campaign travel for nearly two months and plans to continue to do so through the primaries. The jet-setting represents a dramatic about-face for the Rubio campaign. As recently as September, Rubio campaign manager Terry Sullivan bragged that 'Marco flies 95 percent commercial, always coach.' … Rubio has traveled overwhelmingly by chartered jet since the Republican debate held in Milwaukee in mid-November. Now, Rubio is spending an estimated tens of thousands of dollars every day to keep a Cessna Citation Excel plane by his side. The jet can comfortably sit a half-dozen passengers, with room for a couple more to squeeze on. … Without a single early-voting state to bank on, Rubio faces an imperative to cover long interstate distances quickly, perhaps more than any other candidate."

–Fast Company, "How the Hillary Clinton campaign built a staff as diverse as America," by Alyson Krueger: Nathaniel Koloc is the campaign's director of talent acquisition and development, a role the writer believes is unprecedented in the campaign world, which usually hires friends of friends and by word-of-mouth. It transformed the Clinton campaign's roster: "Each department boasts steals from impressive firms including IBM, General Assembly, Etsy, Yelp, Google, Gawker, Facebook, Kiva, and DreamWorks. The digital team has talent from the New York Times and the analytics team from New York University's formidable think tank on housing policy. The number of people from within politics is striking—for being so low. Less than half of the analytics team and almost none of the tech team ever held a campaign position … The campaign's diversity extends far beyond career history. Over 50% of the campaign is female. Of the campaign's more than 500 staffers nationwide, more than one-third are people of color; nearly 40% of Hillary for America's senior staff are people of color."

HOT ON THE LEFT

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce endorsed the Trans-Pacific Partnership. From David Nakamura: "The backing from the nation's largest business coalition is a boost to the administration's efforts to rally the private sector behind the deal, which represents the largest regional trade pact in U.S. history. The Chamber joins the National Association of Manufacturing and the Business Roundtable in issuing formal endorsements this week."

HOT ON THE RIGHT

A New Hampshire gun store owner gave Donald Trump an AR-15 rifle, but the Secret Service had to first inspect it. From the Washington Examiner: "Black Ops Arms owner Mark Limoges said, 'A Secret Service agent came to the store, took the gun. We removed the bolt out of it. They took possession of the weapon and then presented it to us before we went into the room to present it to Mr. Trump.'"

–At the White House: President Obama will participate in a town hall on gun violence hosted by CNN's Anderson Cooper at George Mason University. Vice President Biden will attend afternoon meetings at the White House before heading to Wilmington, Delaware, where he'll spend the night.

QUOTE OF THE DAY:

"Donald Trump has America's pulse," Gov. Rick Scott (R-Fla.) writes in a USA Today op-ed. "I know Donald Trump personally, and while I currently have no plans to endorse a candidate before Florida's March presidential primary, there is no doubt that Donald is a man who speaks and tweets his mind freely. But I don't think his ability to give the most interesting interviews or speeches is the only thing that has him leading in the polls. I think he is capturing the frustration of many Americans after seven years of President Obama's very intentional government takeover of the U.S. economy."

As a Senior Member on both the Homeland Security and Judiciary Committees and the Ranking Member on the Subcommittee on Border and Maritime Security, I have worked diligently on human trafficking issues and seen its devastating impact in the city of Houston, which is known as the epicenter of human trafficking.

Human trafficking is a form of modern-day slavery where men, women, and children are forced into servitude. Some victims are trafficked for sex; some are trafficked for domestic labor. All are held against their will.

It's hard for many in the United States to fully comprehend that this goes on within our borders and on our streets. But it does, and it breaks my heart.

Did you know that there are more individuals enslaved today than at the height of the transatlantic slave trade?

Even more surprising, human trafficking doesn't just occur in illegal or underground operations. Victims of this horrible practice can also be found working in private homes, hotels, nail salons, restaurants, and bars.

In Secretary Clinton's new book "Hard Choices," she so adeptly reminds us, "The crime of human trafficking is not limited to Cambodia or Southeast Asia. Nearly 30 million people around the world are in modern-day slavery of one form or another, trapped in prostitution or laboring in fields or factories or on fishing boats." She continues, "The United States is not immune."

While Hillary Clinton has been engaged in this issue since the 1990s, she played a key role at the State Department in bringing modern-day slavery to the forefront of United States' foreign and domestic policy.

As Sec. Clinton herself wrote in 2009, "The United States funds 140 anti-trafficking programs in nearly 70 countries, as well as 42 domestic task forces that bring state and local authorities together with nongovernmental organizations to combat trafficking. But there is so much more to do."

Having the privilege to serve on the two jurisdictional committees, I am thankful for the steps Hillary Clinton took while Secretary of State. Presently and looking forward, I want to work with more leaders who will draw attention to this horrific practice and take action to eradicate it by working with members of the faith community, law enforcement officials, and community leaders. We must rescue victims, strengthen our justice system, and bring criminals to justice.

Let's all take Secretary Clinton's lead, for, as she said, "this is a moment for people to ask themselves not just what government can do to end modern slavery, but what can I do, what can we do together." We can save lives. We can change history.

Washington Examiner: Clinton, Clinton, Clinton! Read all about Hillary

It's the summer of Hillary Clinton -- but not exactly on her terms.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton had planned a triumphant return to the political arena with the campaign-style rollout of her new memoir, Hard Choices. The book's first printing of 1 million copies showed that her publisher expected a good return on its $14 million advance, especially since Clinton's book tour would receive the kind of blanket coverage accorded a prospective presidential candidate.

But sales of the book have been disappointing, with only about 200,000 hard copies having sold so far. And while Clinton has received extensive media attention, much of it has focused on her missteps, notably her assertion that she and her husband Bill were “dead broke” when they left the White House in January 2001.

Still, Clinton has become the most valuable name in the publishing industry this summer, although only in part because of her own memoir. She and former President Clinton have also inspired three other heavily promoted books, all by right-leaning authors: Blood Feud: The Clintons vs. The Obamas by Ed Klein; Clinton, Inc.: The Audacious Rebuilding of a Political Machine by Daniel Halper; and The First Family Detail: Secret Service Agents Reveal the Hidden Lives of Presidents by Ronald Kessler, parts of which have been leaked ahead of its Aug. 5 release.

Klein’s Blood Feud, in spite of its many dubious claims and some outright fact errors, surpassed Clinton’s memoir recently to become the No. 1 New York Times bestselling nonfiction work. Even after it fell a few spots this week, it still outsold Hard Choices.

"I've been amazed at what a cottage industry it is,” Clinton said of books about her. She made her observation during a recent appearance on “The Daily Show” with Jon Stewart.

“Another book?” Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill marveled to the New York Post when asked about Kessler’s work.

Merrill and other Clinton allies are navigating familiar territory. In the summer of 2007, Clinton faced the publication of three major books about her alone or in combination with her husband: A Woman in Charge: The Life of Hillary Rodham Clinton by Carl Bernstein, Her Way: The Hopes and Ambitions of Hillary Rodham Clinton by Jeff Gerth and Don Van Natta Jr. and For Love of Politics: Inside the Clinton White House by Sally Bedell Smith.

In 2007, Clinton's team tried to dismiss the books and their revelations as nothing new. "Is it possible to be quoted yawning?" her spokesperson Philippe Reines said at the time. But all three books became bestsellers.

This time, Clinton’s allies are working to discredit Halper’s and Kessler’s books in a more aggressive fashion, as they have with Klein’s, dismissing their authors as “despicable” and agenda-driven.

“With Klein, Halper and Kessler, we now have a Hat Trick of despicable actors concocting trashy nonsense,” Merrill charged in an interview with theWashington Examiner. “Their behavior should neither be allowed nor enabled, and legitimate media outlets who know with every fiber of their beings that it is completely made up should not get down in the gutter with them.”

Halper speculated in a recent Politico Magazine column that other counter-offensives have been launched behind the scenes, including a leak of his book in its entirety to hundreds of journalists. (Clinton's office, for its part, has denied any involvement.)

“Why might they leak the book early?” Halper wrote. “The best explanation is so that the book’s contents could come out well before publication and the Clintons can then rely on another standard mode of operation — denouncing any unfavorable allegations as ‘old news.’ ”

But Clinton’s allies insist that they aren’t losing sleep over the new books. If they’re looking to sully Clinton’s reputation, said Adrienne Elrod, communications director at Correct The Record, a pro-Clinton group, “the right-wing’s tactics are ineffective and are not working."

"The anti-Clinton literature industry has been pushing lies and profiting off the Clinton’s for well over two decades,” Elrod said, “yet Bill and Hillary Clinton remain two of the most popular, admired individuals throughout the world.”

New York Times blog: The Caucus: “10 Questions for Hillary Rodham Clinton”

By John Harwood

As she ponders a second bid for the presidency in 2016, former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton continues a string of media appearance promoting her foreign policy memoir, “Hard Choices.” She spoke Thursday with The Times’s John Harwood on the National Public Radio program “On Point” about America’s current foreign policy crises, potential presidential rivals and her relationship with the press.

What follows is a condensed, edited transcript of their conversation.

Q.

I'd like to start with simply the range of problems facing us in the world: Syria, Iraq, Afghanistan, Ukraine, Gaza. I'm well aware of the propensity for an out-party to look at events like that and say the party in the White House is to blame for all of it. The party in the White House says, "Well, we can't control events in the world." But how much responsibility should the Obama administration accept, and should you accept, having run foreign policy for four years, for the chaos that we see right now?

A.

Well, John, that's why I wrote this book, "Hard Choices." One of the main points I make in the book is that we are living in a much more complex, fast moving world for many reasons. Obviously the end of the bipolar world with the collapse of the Soviet Union, which I think we're still trying to adjust to and manage, the increase in nonstate actors, terrorist groups first and foremost, but also other players, for good and for bad. The rise of technology, which has been overall a real positive, but which has empowered all kinds of people and groups.

It doesn't do us much good to point fingers at each other. What we should be trying to do is re-establish a bipartisan consensus on foreign policy that requires America to demonstrate leadership, to be deeply involved in trying to do what we can to manage these crises. I negotiated the last cease-fire in Gaza November 2012. It lasted until this month. I fully support Secretary Kerry's efforts to try to end the violence once again. But look at what happened in just two years. You had Hamas getting access to much more technologically sophisticated missiles, to launch at Israel. You had the very serious problem of the tunnels. You had a change in leadership in Egypt that we certainly had nothing to do with, the overthrow of the Muslim Brotherhood president, Morsi. So you constantly have to be evaluating, where can we make a difference? But the one big lesson that I hope Americans are taking from this is when we back off, or step away, that doesn't bode well for either managing or resolving a lot of these disputes.

Q.

For Americans who are looking and saying, "Well, do we want the party that's controlling foreign policy now, or do we want to make a different choice when we move forward in elections," are you saying to them, "These problems are not to any degree our fault or my fault?"

A.

Well, I'm saying that every administration, every party in the White House, has the responsibility during the time it's there to do the best we can, to lead and manage the many problems we face, and I think we did in the first term.

If you look at what we accomplished, number one, restoring American leadership and reputation after inheriting two wars, Guantánamo, Abu Ghraib and a collapsed economic system, I think that President Obama's leadership and those of us who were his partners did a great deal to move us forward in the right direction. The pivot to Asia was necessary because many of our Asian friends and partners thought the United States had basically walked away from being a presence in the Pacific. I brought about three face-to-face meetings between Netanyahu and Abbas in an effort to continue to push for a two-state solution. The United States can help facilitate, but not dictate to other people what they should be doing for their own self-interest.

But we never stopped working, and I think it's not just the headlines, John, it's what I call the trend lines. Not only re-establish our reputation and our leadership, but beginning to do more to try to improve conditions around the world that affect women and girls. That's not just a nice thing to do, that's very integrated into our foreign policy objective, because where women are treated fairly and equally you're likely to see more stability, more democracy, less insecurity and terrorism. I think there was an enormous amount accomplished in four years.

Q.

Let's talk about Russia for a second. There is a line of criticism that the president's reset didn't work, that he was played by Vladimir Putin. You point out in your book, of course, that when George W. Bush with a doctrine of preventive war was president, Russia seized parts of Georgia. You say in the book that America can't solve everything, but nothing can be solved without America; we're the indispensable nation. If neither approach — the Bush administration's or the Obama administration's — worked with Putin, what exactly are we indispensable for?

A.

Well, I would take issue with the way you characterize that, because what I think I demonstrate in the book is that the reset worked. It was an effort to try to obtain Russian cooperation on some key objectives while Medvedev was president. Of course Putin still pulled the strings but he gave Medvedev a certain amount of independence to negotiate, number one, a new arms control treaty, which was absolutely necessary. We brought Russia around to understanding why we thought there needed to be international sanctions against Iran.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I'll never forget the meeting that we had, the president and I and just one other person on our side and Medvedev and two on his side, where we told him that we had evidence, conclusive evidence, about Iran building an underground facility. And the Russians were shocked because they thought they knew what was going on in Iran. So we brought them to the table, at the Security Council, we got those tough sanctions, and we were eventually able to get to the negotiations that are going on now with the hope that something real can come out of them. We got support from the Russians to go across Russia, to resupply our troops in Afghanistan. The reset was a device to try to refocus attention on the transactional efforts that we needed to get done with the Russians.

Now, when Putin announced in the fall of 2011 that he was coming back, I had no illusions. I wrote two memos to the president pointing out that we were going to have to change our thinking and approach. We'd gotten all we could get from the reset. The reset succeeded, but we had to make adjustments, given the fact that Putin was going to resume both the real position of presidency and begin, I thought and argued, to be more aggressive in his foreign policy.

Q.

Let me go back to Gaza for a second. Are you pleased that the F.A.A. reversed its decision after complaints from Mike Bloomberg and Prime Minister Netanyahu and allowed U.S. flights back into Tel Aviv even though many European countries have not?

A.

Well, a number of Europeans have reversed their policy as well. Look, I think it needs to be based on the best understanding of the circumstances and I think that the F.A.A. received additional information about steps that Israel has taken. From my understanding, with the reversal here and then the reversal in a number of European nations, they were basically sending a message out to passengers that we're going to keep a close watch on this and you'll have to be aware of potential changes in plans as we go forward.

Q.

I'm a Methodist, as you are. You say in your book that you were inspired to go into public service by the Methodist faith — do as much good as you can for as long as you can. The United Methodist Church yesterday signed a letter with other religious organizations saying the underlying cause of the resumption of violence after repeated cease-fires is what they call the "legal, structural, physical violence inherent in Israel's siege of Gaza and the West Bank." Do they have a point? Are they right?

A.

Well I'm very proud to be a Methodist too, John, and very grateful for my lifetime involvement in the church. Of course they have a point. There are always arguments that can be made that have merit to them. But I think that particular analysis right now misses what I believe to be the central reason why this conflict has once again flared up, and that is the desire by Hamas to assert itself since it feels it's got its back to the wall. It doesn't really have very many friends left in the region — thrown out of Damascus by Assad, basically losing their relationship in Cairo.

I think they're doing it both out of a calculation that they can engender more sympathy and support for their cause, but also to put Israel on the back heel. And I have no doubt it was a deliberate provocation. Now, I do think if we can get to another cease-fire — which I think is going to be difficult because Hamas wants to hold out for all kinds of substantive negotiations, which will be very difficult to negotiate and agree upon in the kind of time pressure that a cease-fire requires — then issues like greater access to Gaza or food and another materials can certainly be taken into account. But I think in this particular case, I think the responsibility falls on Hamas. I think they knew exactly what they were doing, which was to try to put Israel in this position and try to engender some sympathy because they don't really have support very much anymore.

Q.

Another thing you say in the book when you're describing your role as secretary of state: It includes the policy element, but it also involves being the C.E.O. of the big, vast State Department apparatus. Every four years when people run for president, governors say, "You ought to elect a governor because we've run things, we know how to manage." Are part of the problems we're now seeing in the Obama administration, both in foreign policy and domestically, a function of the fact that their leading figures, President Obama, Joe Biden, you as secretary of state, were legislators who came out of the Senate and not people who had run things before?

A.

Oh, you don't expect me to agree with that, do you? Look, I think it depends on the individual. I had serious disagreements with George Bush and he was a two-term governor.

Q.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But is there a management deficit in this administration?

A.

I think there is a political deficit in Washington because of gridlock and opposition to the president that started the first day he went into office. And I find that so regrettable. I don't want to sound naive or Pollyanna-ish about it, but I think we've got two big crises in our country.

One of them is the economic crisis, which we all know has just dramatically increased inequality and stagnated middle-class incomes and outcomes. But we also have a political crisis. Our democracy is not working and I do not see how we're going to resolve a lot of our issues. If you look at the reforms our president has put forward time and time again that would make the government more manageable, move it into the 21st century, they're just met by a solid wall of resistance.

Q.

A couple of things before we run out of time. Paul Ryan's out with a plan today proposing that states be allowed to take all of the programs for those in need in one revenue stream as a way of finding better ways to make them work. Is that a good idea?

A.

No, not in the current atmosphere. It is not a good idea. All one has to look at is that nearly half the states refuse to expand Medicaid to realize why it's a bad idea. If states won't even take what are very generous terms from the federal government to give working people and poor people access to health care, how can we turn over all of the resources that are meant to assist those in need?

Q.

Jeb Bush, former governor of Florida, is out with an op-ed calling for comprehensive immigration reform as you do, but saying that the law his brother signed, which passed when you were in the Senate in 2008, ought to be changed to make it easier to send those other than the "deserving few" back to their home countries in Central America. Should that law be changed?

A.

I think it should be looked at as part of an overall package. We have two categories of people that are represented by these poor children that have come across our border. We have migrants, children who are leaving for a variety of reasons — economic, they want to reunite with family members. And we have refugees, people who have reason to be threatened, people who have bad probabilities if they return home as to what might happen to them.

So we do need more resources very quickly deployed, which is what the president and the Democrats have asked for. We need some flexibility within the laws. Our laws right now are not particularly well-suited for making the kind of determinations that are required, and that we should, as Americans, want to see happen.

Q.

Last question. It's about you and the press. Jill Abramson, my long-time boss and friend, said recently "Hillary Clinton has terribly unrealistic expectations for journalists." And my question for you is, have you been so scalded by your past interactions that it makes it difficult for you to communicate in the way that you would need to as a presidential candidate or otherwise?

A.

I don't think so. I think maybe one of the points Jill was making is that I do sometimes expect more than perhaps I should. I'll have to work on my expectations. But I had an excellent relationship with the State Department press that followed me for four years and I enjoyed working with them. Whatever I do in the future, I look forward to having the same kind of opportunities.

[Subtitle:] Top Democratic and Republican strategists weigh in.

Hillary Clinton's book tour is winding down, so it's time to assess what the Hard Choices rollout means for what just about everyone in American politics assumes is her coming presidential bid.

Thus far, the former secretary of state has made a few blunders—her comment about being "dead broke" after leaving the White House, for instance, tied her in knots for days—and invited fresh scrutiny toward her very well compensated speeches (since leaving Foggy Bottom, she's pulled down an estimated $12 million). Her book itself, though lauded by some, has also been panned by critics as a cautious, colorless account of her time as secretary of state. If Hillary Clinton is headed for a coronation, the chattering class hasn't gotten the invitation.

So we asked a panel of top strategists and analysts in both parties: What, if anything, does Clinton's 2014 book tour teach us about 2016? From Karen Hughes to Newt Gingrich, Joel Benenson to Anita Dunn, here's what they told us.

Karen Hughes

Republican strategist and former George W. Bush adviser

The 2014 book tour made me think a 2016 Hillary Clinton presidential race would feel like a replay of the Bob Dole campaign, only two decades later. She seemed defensive and cautious, with not much new to say. Her husband had inspired us with the "bridge to the 21st century," but it seemed as if she was stuck on the wrong side of it. And her "dead broke" comment was revealing because it shows she still feels put upon despite the many advantages she has.

Anne-Marie Slaughter

President of the New America Foundation and former State Department official

Having taught a course that featured secretary of state memoirs from Acheson to Albright (paired with some international relations theory for ballast), I can attest that it is a rather specialized genre. Secretary Clinton followed in the footsteps of Albright's Madame Secretary, which was the first such memoir to mix the high politics of foreign policy brinkmanship with personal anecdotes (how and when she got her hair done) that would make the business of the State Department more accessible and enjoyable for lay readers. Clinton similarly combines some genuinely new ideas about how to conduct foreign policy in a world of digital communication and mass politics with personal stories about other world leaders (Aung San Suu Kyi, Angela Merkel) and her own life (preparing for Chelsea's wedding). From my perspective, the chief lesson of the 2014 tour for 2016 is that it is very hard to write a book about being secretary of state for a press audience that is primarily interested in whether you will be president.

Mark McKinnon

Former media adviser to George W. Bush and co-cofounder of No Labels

The one thing that is absolute about Hillary Clinton is that when it comes to the press, she's damned if she does, and she's damned if she doesn't.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Before the book tour she was being criticized for being too cloistered, and not opening herself up in public and not being available to the press. Now she's being criticized for being too spontaneous, too off the leash and too exposed.

At the end of the day, I think it hardly matters. I think just given the physics, there was a real need for her to get out of the bubble. She did. Took a few hits. But she also relieved a lot of pressure that had been building to be more public, answered a bunch of questions and still looks like the Ferrari of the field.

Joel Benenson

Democratic pollster

I don't believe that a single voter will care at all about Secretary Clinton's book tour or the media coverage of it. Elections—especially presidential elections—are about big things that are going on in people's lives at that time. and should Hillary Clinton decide to run, her success, like any other candidate, will hinge solely on how strongly she makes that connection.

Newt Gingrich

Former speaker of the House and presidential candidate

Hillary Clinton's book tour was a grim reminder of what happened during the 2008 presidential campaign. She is very smart and very hard-working. She would have been a very powerful senator if she had stayed. She seems to find it very hard to find the rhythm of public media at a national level. Her performance did no damage among Democratic loyalists, but for independents it raised dismaying questions about how out of touch she is with reality. For Republicans, it was a wonderful comedy break from the pain of the Obama presidency.

Douglas E. Schoen

Democratic political consultant and former pollster for President Bill Clinton

The book tour underscores in fine relief the challenges facing a prospective Hillary Clinton candidacy for president in 2016. As in 2008, there is a compelling need for former Secretary Clinton to develop an overarching message of change and inclusion—something the book tour suggests quite compellingly is still very much a work in progress.

William Kristol

Editor of the Weekly Standard

Hillary Clinton's book tour should have emboldened any Democrat who's ever toyed with the idea of running in 2016 to get to work organizing his or her campaign. Hillary has sold many fewer books than expected. If she runs, she'll win many fewer delegates than expected.

Anita Dunn

Senior partner at SKDKnickerbocker and former Barack Obama adviser

I've been amused by the many "lessons" being drawn about 2016 out of a 2014 book tour, because the one lesson the press and political establishment never seem to learn is what is important to voters and what isn't. A book tour in 2014 teaches us very little about a presidential campaign in 2016, particularly because the book was a memoir as opposed to being the classic "presidential campaign book" filled with policy proposals for the future. Should Secretary Clinton decide to run for the presidency, voters are going pay a lot more attention to the vision she outlines for the future as a candidate than to what happened in the spring of 2014 when she was talking about her book, and they will have a lot of questions for her. Their questions will be tough and pointed across a number of issues. How Secretary Clinton answers to the voters, should she choose to run, is what will determine the success of her candidacy, not this book tour. And that is a lesson I think Secretary Clinton, who has run before, understands better than most of the other potential candidates.

Beth Myers

Mitt Romney campaign adviser

Bill and Hillary Clinton have created a new post-presidential model that includes self-promotion, corporate consulting, paid speaking fees, mega-book deals and massive wealth accumulation. There is nothing necessarily wrong with accumulating great wealth, but no former first family has done anything like it before. The Washington establishment may have embraced this model, but Hillary 2014 demonstrates that American voters will want to understand "Clinton, Inc." a whole lot better before they are sold on a Hillary Clinton candidacy.

Alex Vogel

Co-founder and managing partner, VogelHood research

First, it shows the broader Democratic primary base that she is not in close touch with the populist mood of her own party. Her struggle to deal with questions about her own wealth highlights that disparity. Second, while her popularity remains high, her stumbles show there is a real opportunity for someone else in the race—and will encourage them to hang around in case she trips harder. Third, and maybe most importantly, her less-than-amazing book sales show that people aren't looking for a new definition of Hillary. Americans have a fairly defined view of her—something that cuts both ways—and aren't hyper-interested in laying down hardcover money to listen to a new version of it.

Hillary Clinton's book tour doesn't tell us much about how she will do in 2016—but what it does tell us isn't good news for her. She can't be happy about the gaffe-filled coverage of it, or the fact that her favorability ratings have been dropping. She will be a formidable candidate but not an unbeatable one. But then we already knew that.

2016 that she had going into 2008. And she has one more: Now she has to stay within the lines of the Obama administration's coloring book.

Jetting around world capitals as secretary of state to talk lofty issues with international leaders is very different from U.S. retail politics. She came across as rusty. It was just crazy to see her dig herself deeper and deeper in trying to explain her personal wealth. Calling the way she dealt with it "unartful" is being charitable.

We also learned that she views not having seized in 2008 the historical aspect of being the first woman candidate as a mistake. This time around, she obviously plans to embrace it fully.

Lanhee Chen

Former Mitt Romney adviser

Hillary Clinton's book tour showed us how out of touch a rusty politician can look. But beyond the gaffes, I think it demonstrated that Clinton's efforts to showcase her record as secretary of state will end up backfiring. In fact, what she thinks is her biggest political strength will actually be her biggest liability if she decides to run for president. The world is in tumult, in no small part because of the role Clinton played as the chief executioner of President Obama's failed foreign policy. One needs to look no further than her obsession with pursuing a "reset" in our relations with Russia, her coddling of Bashar Assad in Syria or her inability to successfully negotiate a Status of Forces Agreement with the Iraqis to see how her time as America's chief diplomat will come back to haunt her. The media and political elites in Washington may have focused on Clinton's gaffes and other missteps during her recent book tour, but the bad news for her is that it showed us that the worst is yet to come.

In 2008, the Obama campaign ran circles around Clinton, and the cycle has gotten exponentially faster since. It appears that the Clinton staff has been effective at getting one-off predetermined tweets through approval, but much has changed since 2008, and their success will be contingent on their ability to adapt and be more responsive than their current communications strategy.

The Hill blog: Briefing Room: "Clinton would back changing border law"

By Jesse Byrnes

July 24, 2014, 1:31 p.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton said Thursday that she was open to changing a 2008 trafficking law to help the administration deal with an influx of child migrants crossing the border illegally.

"I think it should be looked at as part of an overall package," Clinton said on NPR's "On Point."

Clinton said Obama needed more "flexibility" to deal with the crisis on the border, noting the large number of migrants are fleeing their countries for many reasons.

"We do need more resources very quickly deployed, which is what the president and the Democrats have asked for. We need some flexibility within the laws," she added.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The 2008 law has become a sticking point in the debate over how to handle the large number of child migrants who have entered the U.S. this year.

About three-quarters of the unaccompanied children crossing the southern border are from El Salvador, Guatemala and Honduras. More than 50,000 have immigrated to the U.S. since October.

The William Wilberforce Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2008, named after the 19th-century British abolitionist, prevents officials from quickly deporting migrants from countries other than Canada or Mexico.

A House GOP border working group called for changes to the law, which Republicans say creates an incentive for children to cross the border. Republicans will likely include those changes in their $1.5 billion emergency funding bill for the border, while Senate Democrats are moving a $2.7 billion plan without changes to the 2008 law.

Congressional Democrats oppose changing the law, saying that doing so would weaken legal protections for young migrants.

But the Obama administration has called for measures to help speed up the deportation process.

On Tuesday, Homeland Security Secretary Jeh Johnson said the law should be changed to expedite processing for those ineligible for asylum.

House Speaker John Boehner on Wednesday urged President Obama to publicly support changing the law.

Clinton at a CNN Town Hall last month said unaccompanied immigrant children would have to be sent home.

“The laws, our laws right now are not particularly well suited for making the kind of determinations that are required, and that we should, as Americans, want to see happen,” Clinton said Thursday.

Fast Company: “Most Americans Think the U.S. Would Be Better Governed If More Women Were In Charge”

By Kathleen Davis

July 25, 2014, 5:43 a.m. EDT

Tina Fey famously quipped on SNL in 2008 that “bitch is the new black,” asserting that the reason that Hillary Clinton was trailing Barack Obama was because of a lot of not-so-subtle misogyny.

Of course it’s not just Hillary Clinton who has faced an uphill battle; many female politicians have found themselves the subjects of questions, criticisms, and scrutiny that their male counterparts never have to face.

However, a new poll from Gallup shows that 63% of Americans say the country would be better governed with more female political leaders, which is up slightly from 57% in past polls in 1995 and 2000. But not everyone feels this way: While 78% of liberals as well as 78% of unmarried women think we need more female political leaders, only 46% of Republicans feel that having more women in office would result in better government, and almost one in five (19%) feel it would be worse.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

[GALLUPPOLLS]

Meanwhile, four in five Americans (81%) say the U.S. would be better governed if more people with business and management experience were in political office. Which means in theory that everyone in the tiny pool of women CEOs should run for office.

Of course, a lot goes into the public's voting decisions, and while Americans may claim to view demographic and professional backgrounds in a certain way, their final voting decisions can be swayed by many other factors. And there's the argument that less women than men run for public office in the first place.

Still, the proportion of women in elected offices remains staggeringly low when you consider that women make up 51% of the U.S. population: Women's representation in both the House and the Senate hovers around 20% (there are currently 20 female U.S. senators and 79 female U.S. House members), and there are only five female state governors in office.

According to Gallup's research however, we are at least slowly moving in a more equitable direction. "Far more women have been elected to federal or statewide office in the years since 1990," writes Justin McCarthy in the Gallup report. Maybe next we can finally stop talking about what they are wearing.

U.S. News & World Report blog: Washington Whispers: "Another Pro-Hillary PAC Tries to Make Clinton Cool"

By Nikki Schwab

July 24, 2014, 6:01 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] But who's the most grass-roots of them all?

If Eric Williams had his way, you'd be kicking back, sipping a pantsuit cocktail and supporting Hillary Clinton.

Williams, a 22-year-old from Alabama, who now lives across the Potomac from Washington in Alexandria, Virginia, is a founder of Hillary 2016 PAC, yet another outside group supporting a potential Clinton 2016 presidential run.

On Thursday night, he's throwing down. The group is hosting a second Washington fundraiser at the Soho Tea & Coffee shop, a Dupont Circle joint with bright art, mismatched tables, cement floors and, of course, a bar.

"Soho Tea & Coffee brings a unique flavor to D.C., like the candidate Hillary Clinton," Williams told Whispers. (The owner is also a big Clinton supporter.) The event promises specialty drinks, fun and music. Beverages served will include the nonalcoholic "Hillary's Hammerhead," a coffee drink, and a "White House Wine Spritzer," a boozy one. The pantsuit-themed drink was served at the group's first fundraiser, which took place in June, at a bowling alley in Georgetown, that's also a bar.

Tickets for the Thursday night event are $16. "A 'suggested donation' of $16 we felt would make it accessible to anybody who wanted to attend," Williams said. "And it's a suggested donation as well," he repeated, suggesting someone could get into the party for even less.

There's a similar flavor here to what Ready for Hillary has tried to accomplish with small dollar donation parties, though the organizers of that PAC, which is more connected with the Clintons, ask attendees for $20.16.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Williams said Hillary 2016 PAC isn't a copycat, but more authentically grass roots.

That's because Williams has no ties to the Clinton family – he was born when they were already in the White House.

"I fell in love with Hillary when I was 3 years old," Williams explained.

The super PAC came about earlier this year when Williams joined forces with Kelley Johnson, a veteran of Terry McAuliffe's successful campaign for governor of Virginia in 2013, who also voted for Clinton when she ran for the U.S. Senate in New York. Together, the two of them are trying to get young people involved. "The things that we value and the things that the young progressive movement values … [Clinton] spent her entire life on those issues," Williams explained, noting that young people don't necessarily know her record.

Evidence of that delighted conservatives when, in May, right-of-center video journalist Michelle Fields went to the campus of George Washington University and failed to find a college student who could really pinpoint Clinton's record as secretary of state. (Though Fields found a lot of fans.)

Williams, however, has seen progress. "I see it first hand," he said. "I think more and more every day my generation has become more familiar with her as she's become the hot topic."

He aims to have the Hillary 2016 PAC educate, along with raise funds. So far, the super PAC, which can raise unlimited money, has only brought in about $10,000, with much of that eaten by operating expenditures. That doesn't seem to bother the founder.

"The stigma of political action committees is that we're just raising tons of money, we're just going to raise money to sway their opinions or whatever," Williams said. "But we believe in political action being action."

CNN: "Why liberals don't trust Hillary Clinton"

By Dan Merica

July 25, 2014, 5:45 a.m. EDT

To prove she wasn't just an opportunist hoping to use a U.S. Senate seat in New York as a ticket to bigger things, then-first lady Hillary Clinton tried to show voters that she cared about their values and views -- she listened.

More than a year before the 2000 election, Clinton sat in farmhouses and in community centers, listening to voters' needs and concerns and their problems with government.

Many liberal and progressive activists don't trust Clinton because they think she sides with big banks and big money instead of the middle class and they're wary of her on national security. With a Clinton presidential campaign a possibility, they want the same treatment New York voters got.

"If there was an actual, authentic 'I am going to listen to you about your issues' from Clinton, instead of kind of pounding the drum of inevitability and stampeding over the left on her way to assumed victory, that would be effective," said Sally Kohn, a progressive activist, CNN contributor and Clinton critic.

Until then, the trust deficit between Clinton and the left of her party will grow, Kohn and other liberals predict.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Activists point to Clinton's voting record in the Senate, where she voted to authorize the Iraq war and increase domestic surveillance. They say that and decisions her husband made while president, like the Defense of Marriage Act and the authorization of the North American Free Trade Agreement, give her little street cred among liberals and populists.

Possibly the biggest concern among liberals is Clinton's coziness with Wall Street, their big bogeyman. Since leaving the State Department in 2013, she has spoken at events sponsored by Wall Street giants like Fidelity, Goldman Sachs and Ameriprise Financial, and during her Senate runs and 2008 presidential run, Clinton defended lobbyists.

"I don't think she has been aggressive on the banks," said Nelini Stamp, a progressive political organizer from New York. "When I think of Hillary Clinton, I actually think she is in bed with some of the banks and Wall Street is her ally."

There is also an overarching suspicion among liberals that Clinton is saying what she needs to get elected, but would govern differently.

"You wonder if it is a pivot or whether she is saying what the moment demands," Kohn said.

Starting in May, before Clinton crisscrossed the country selling her book "Hard Choices," the former secretary of state started to talk about populist and liberal issues like college affordability and income inequality.

Clinton told an audience at the liberal New American Foundation in May that "the dream of upward mobility that made this country a model for the world feels further and further out of reach" and because of that, "many Americans understandably feel frustrated, even angry."

Clinton has also recently labeled college affordability "one of the biggest problems we have in the country," and says if she were elected president she would "tackle growth, which is the handmaiden of inequality." People close to her have started to trumpet her record on pay equity and the minimum wage.

"She has come with a more populist tone because she knows what people want to hear," Stamp said. Asked if she trusts Clinton when she talks about income inequality, Stamp said bluntly, "Right now, not that much."

Clinton's changing message has been overshadowed by gaffes during her book tour, like countering questions about her wealth by saying her family was "dead broke" when it left the White House.

At the same time, possible opponents from the left -- like Sen. Elizabeth Warren, Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley and Vice President Joe Biden -- have generated more buzz among liberals as alternatives to Clinton.

Other than changing her tune, Clinton hasn't been quick to address liberals who have questions for her. Instead of sitting down with them -- something that a candidate would certainly do, especially one battling distrust -- she has continued to hold events around her book and her family's foundation.

Polls might explain why she hasn't reached out yet: Right now, liberals don't matter that much to whether Clinton would win the Democratic nomination in 2016.

A CNN/ORC International Poll from June found that only 11% of Democrats want a more liberal option to Clinton. Twenty percent want someone more conservative and 63% want Clinton.

What's more, a Washington Post/ABC News poll from the same time showed that 72% of self-described liberals supported Clinton, a number that was larger than moderate and conservative Democrats.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But liberals do make a lot of noise. Some of that has already boosted possible opponents from the left.

Earlier this month both Biden and Warren ignited the crowd of liberal bloggers and activists at the annual Netroots Nation conference in Detroit. Warren's speech was interrupted by chants of "Run, Liz, Run" from eager supporters who want to see her challenge Clinton for the presidency.

Clinton wasn't there, instead continuing with her "Hard Choices" memoir tour in St. Paul, Minnesota, and Madison, Connecticut.

While Stamp, who attended Netroots Nation, said there wasn't an overarching feeling of being snubbed by Clinton, she acknowledged, "It would have been interesting to hear her in a progressive setting."

"People want to hear from a potential candidate and have those candidates hear about the work they are doing on the ground," she added.

After the conference, left-leaning Democrats said they felt more energized and organized than ever -- and they hope that will lead to more influence on who their party nominates in 2016.

"She shouldn't be the inevitable candidate," said Erica Sagrans, the campaign manager for Ready for Warren, an effort to enlist Warren to run for president in 2016. "Our take is that no one should feel like they can't support a candidate that they like or are excited about just because there is a lot of support for Hillary."

Ready for Warren is a direct response to what many liberal organizers say is an assumption of inevitability among the cadre of groups and political operatives organizing for a possible Clinton campaign. The name itself is a play on Ready for Hillary, an organized group of Clinton loyalists who have raised over $8 million to help Clinton if she chooses to run in 2016.

Sagrans, whose group received a great deal of attention at Netroots this month, said it hopes to "channel the excitement about Warren into tangible results and a tangible organization."

But just as much as the group's goal is to "elevate Warren," as Sagrans said, progressives also want to direct the 2016 conversation.

On this goal, progressives seem to be winning. Clinton has talked more about populist issues since embarking on the book tour and will likely be forced to continue this rhetoric if she runs for president.

And liberals hope their influence will grow with time.

"There is this sort of inherent question, is Hillary ready for us?" Kohn said about 2016. "It is not enough to just be the next in line. The question is: Are you really, truly listening?"

Politico: “Deval Patrick: I'm not 'pals' with Hillary Clinton”

Massachusetts Gov. Deval Patrick, who raised eyebrows earlier this year by questioning the sense of “inevitability” around Hillary Clinton’s potential presidential candidacy, emphasized Thursday that he's worried Clinton's inner circle will perpetuate an "off-putting" feeling of "entitlement" surrounding her possible White House bid.

"I worry about the campaign; I don't think it's so much her," the Bay State Democrat said during an appearance on WGBH-FM, a public radio station in Boston.

Patrick added that he had a chance to speak with Clinton at a biotech conference in San Diego last month but said that he and the former secretary of state aren't close.

"It's not like we're pals," he said.

Patrick, echoing comments he made to CNN earlier this year, said the feeling of inevitability played a role in sinking Clinton's 2008 presidential campaign.

"The worry of that is that that can be interpreted by people as entitlement. And that can be off-putting to folks," he said. "They want you to sweat for it."

Patrick wasn't asked directly if he'd consider running for president in 2016, but, asked by a listener whether he believes a presidential candidate from "liberal Massachusetts" could ever win the presidency, Patrick rejected the premise.

"Massachusetts is not that liberal," he said. "We have more unenrolled independents than we do registered Democrats and registered Republicans combined. … We have Democrats in Massachusetts who would be Republicans anywhere else."

He added that he thinks Americans prefer "good leadership" no matter the candidate's home state.

MSNBC: "Hillary Clinton: You're lucky 'Hard Choices' isn't longer"

By Alex Seitz-Wald

July 24, 2014, 7:12 p.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton's new book "Hard Choices" is many things: a best-selling memoir, a detailed record of her time as secretary of state, a careful campaign document and, as Clinton likes to joke, a handy door stop. It's very thick.

The book's 650 pages have drawn complaints from the likes of Google CEO Eric Schmidt, who compared its length unfavorably to his own 37-page book while interviewing Clinton this week. "This would just slip under the door. You can't imagine using that as a door stop," Clinton scoffed while holding Schmidt's slim text on stage. To other interviewers, Clinton has joked that her book can be used as an exercise weight, encouraging audiences to buy two copies so they can work out both arms at once.

But, Clinton revealed Thursday, her book could have been even longer. Much longer. Speaking with CNBC's John Harwood, who was guest-hosting the public radio show "On Point," produced by WBUR in Boston, Clinton said her book is a slimmed down version of what it could have been.

"I know I wrote a long book, but I cut about two-thirds of it out!" she added with a laugh. Harwood heartily agreed it was long.

With about 600 pages of text (minus the lengthy index, and other appendages), that suggests the potential presidential candidate could have produced a roughly 1,800 page manuscript. "War and Peace" runs about 1,400 pages in the Oxford World's Classic paperback printing.

More seriously, Clinton defended the Obama administration's controversial "reset" policy with Russia, which has been criticized in the wake of Russia's incursion into Crimea and the downing of Malaysia Airlines Flight 17 last week. "What I think I demonstrate in the book is that the reset worked," she told Harwood, insisting it was successful in extracting key concessions from then-Russian president Dmitry Medvedev before Vladimir Putin resumed power. "We'd gotten all we could get from the reset. The reset succeeded, but we had to make adjustments, given the fact that Putin was going … to be more aggressive in his foreign policy."

Environment America released an analysis of McCain's McNuke plan today. The cost to tax payers is as much as $280B in what we are calling the mother of all sub-prime loans.

Senator McCain's Nuclear Plan: An Economic and Environmental Disaster

Washington, DC – Sen. John McCain's plan to build up to a 100 new nuclear reactors could cost taxpayers an estimated $280 billion and presents a significant risk for the economy and the public, while doing little to solve America's energy problems, according to a new report by Environment America .

"America needs a new direction on energy, but Sen. McCain's plan would be serious setback to our economy and to prospects for clean energy," said Anna Aurilio, of Environment America. "These 'McNukes' would super-size our tax bills, our energy bills and our nuclear waste problems," she added.

Since private investors have been unwilling to finance new nuclear power plants, the industry has been applying to the federal government for taxpayer-backed loans. The Congressional Budget Office assumes that these loans are so risky at least 50 percent would default. Environment America estimates that taxpayers could be on the hook for $126 billion to $280 billion in failed nuclear loans.

"As the country struggles with an economic meltdown, it's astonishing that Sen. McCain is proposing massive subprime loans to the nuclear industry," said Aurilio. "We've all seen what happens when Wall Street takes foolish risks, now Sen. McCain's plan asks taxpayers to foot the bill for building new nuclear plants that even Wall Street has refused to pay for," she added.

Sen. McCain has repeatedly called for building 45 new nuclear reactors before 2030 with an ultimate goal of building 100 new plants. Environment America's report shows:

A $280 Billion Cost to Taxpayers: Nuclear plants are enormously expensive. The cost of 45 reactors is likely to be at least $315 billion, while 100 reactors would cost at least $700 billion. Under Sen. McCain's plan, taxpayers are estimated to be on the hook for $126-280 billion in failed nuclear loans, with the average American household paying $1,100 to more than $2,400 for failed nuclear loans.

A Job Creation Fantasy: New nuclear power plants would create, at best, one- fourth as many jobs as Sen. McCain claimed during the second presidential debate, costing taxpayers as much as $19 million for each permanent job created.

Failure to Take Advantage of Cleaner, Cheaper Alternatives:
Clean energy technologies like energy efficient products, super-efficient buildings and wind and solar power can deliver environmental results and meet more of our energy needs much sooner than building new nuclear power plants, and create more jobs at a lower cost to taxpayers—without the collateral environmental and security risks.

Environment America estimates that Sen. McCain's plan would create enough highly radioactive waste to fill a second Yucca Mountain-sized dump and dramatically increase the amount of nuclear waste transported on our roads and rails. The report also concludes that the plan would do nothing to deal with our current energy crisis since no new power would be generated until at least 2019.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Sen. McCain is so vehement about building these nuclear plants that he has turned a deaf ear to what we just learned about risky loans and how much they can hurt tax payers," said Aurilio. "This is especially alarming given Sen. McCain's consistent failure to support the kinds of clean energy investments that can strengthen our economy and save us money," she concluded.

MSNBC: "Benghazi coming back with a vengeance in September"

By Alex Seitz-Wald

September 1, 2014, 7:12 a.m. EDT

After several mercifully Benghazi-free months, the 2012 attack on the diplomatic compound in Libya is about to be thrust back into the spotlight around its September 11 anniversary.

The special House committee investigating Benghazi is finally expected to begin its work, in earnest, with its first hearing the week Congress returns from August recess. Meanwhile, two books promising explosive new allegations about the terror attack will hit shelves in September, and Fox News plans to air a new, one-hour documentary on the attack this week, featuring exclusive interviews with Americans who fought in the onslaught.

Add that to the usual fare that accompanies the anniversary of any major news event and you get a headache for the teams surrounding Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama. For both, it's a stubborn political problem that will likely never go away, no matter how many investigations clear the senior players of the worst allegations of wrongdoing. And it's little doubt why: Polls suggest that Clinton is vulnerable on Benghazi ahead of a potential 2016 presidential run, with members of both parties listing it as her biggest weakness.

Partisans on both sides are gearing up for the return of Benghazi. Tim MIller, for example, who is the executive director of the GOP super PAC America Rising, told msnbc his team is prepared to jump on "anything that comes up in these books/hearings that call into question Sec. Clinton's claims." And Clinton defenders at Democratic groups like Correct the Record and American Bridge say they will be ready to respond to any incoming fire, and are already passing along research to undermine the books.

On Sept. 9, conservative talk radio host Aaron Klein's "The Real Benghazi Story" will hit bookstores. Published by an imprint of World Net Daily (the website that promotes the notion that Obama was not born in the U.S.), the book promises "to blow the lid off" "shocking," "devastating," and "mind-blowing" new details of the terror attack. It's the story "the White House and Hillary don't want you to know," the book's subtitle claims.

Klein's audience is undoubtedly the already-converted, but three of his previous books have made it to The New York Times bestseller list, and his latest is easy fodder for the conservative echo chamber. Klein has plans to promote the book in New York and Washington, and already "has interview commitments with top-tier cable, radio and print outlets," according to his publicist.

Then, at the end of the month comes "13 Hours: The Inside Account of What Really Happened In Benghazi." The book is likely to gain more traction in the mainstream press, considering its author, Boston University journalism professor Mitchell Zuckoff, and publisher, Hachette, a well respected house.

Zuckoff got unprecedented access to the six Americans who defended the CIA annex in Benghazi and tells their story from the ground. Paramount reportedly bought the film rights months ago and has a screenwriter and producers attached to the project.

Zuckoff's book promises to "set the record straight" on what happened on the ground, but will not dwell much on the politics or bureaucratic wrangling in Washington. Still, even if Clinton barely makes a cameo, anytime people are talking about Benghazi its bad for Clinton. The book may also provide embarrassing new details from people closest to the attack.

Zuckoff's work also spawned an hour-long Fox News special, set to air Friday, in which host Bret Baier interviews the security operators. The documentary is being promoted by Fox and will likely further stir the pot on the right.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The House Select Committee on Benghazi – the seventh congressional committee that has looked into the attacks – has been quiet since its inception this spring, will hold its first hearing the second week of September. Led by South Carolina Republican Rep. Trey Gowdy, Republicans last week hired the Army's former top lawyer to be their general counsel. They're finishing staffing up, but are revealing little about future plans beyond the first hearing. The Democratic side, led by Maryland Rep. Elijah Cummings, say they are mostly staffed up.

Rep. Adam Schiff, a California Democrat who sits on the select committee, said that while Gowdy has been inclusive of Democrats and responsible thus far, he'll have to deal with high expectations from the conservative base. "I'm not sure where we're headed. I'm not sure the House leadership knows where we're headed. But I do think there's going to be a lot pressure on the chairman to produce something," he told msnbc.

Gowdy told The New York Times Friday that it will likely take until at least the end of 2015 for the committee to complete its work, but that it could go into 2016 if agencies are slow to turn over requested documents.

Some Democrats and Clinton allies, who have long dismissed the slew of Benghazi investigations as being politically motivated, say they expect the committee will be used to attack Obama in anticipation of the midterm elections, before turning attention to Clinton afterwards. But Schiff said the committee is unlikely to produce anything in time for 2014 elections. He did, however, say there will be tremendous pressure on Gowdy to bring Clinton as a witness.

Other Democrats are treating a Clinton testimony request as a certainty.

"I don't think there are many new facts to be found there," Schiff added.

Washington Post: "Clintons keep up with a sprawling, yet aging, political network in Arkansas"

By Philip Rucker

August 31, 2014, 10:31 p.m. EDT

LITTLE ROCK — While Bill and Hillary Clinton were vacationing in August at their rented mansion on a scenic bluff in the tony Hamptons, they read a flurry of e-mail updates from an earlier life.

At 7:41 one Monday morning, the Clintons received word that the elderly mother of longtime Little Rock radio and television personality Craig O'Neill had passed away.

A few days later, another bulletin: Rufus Ellis "Buddy" Tate Jr., a farmer and lumberer from Marvell, Ark., died five days shy of his 100th birthday. His only child, Sherman Tate, is an old friend of Bill's.

Then another: Dorothy Jean Darr Martinous, who managed the bridal salon at J.C. Penney and was a prize-winning dancer of the Charleston, died at age 98. She had been active for decades in Arkansas Democratic politics.

In each case, the notices came from a 70-year-old retiree named Lynda Dixon, who worked as Bill Clinton's personal secretary when he was governor of Arkansas and now fires off e-mails to her old boss, Hillary Rodham Clinton and their aides from her home here in downtown Little Rock, within view of the Clinton Presidential Center.

"Lynda's List," as her under-the-radar alumni news service is called, is a telling example of the Clintons' attention to detail in maintaining and nurturing their formidable political network, which extends around the globe yet remains perhaps deepest in Arkansas. The couple's strong ties to the state have been highlighted this year as Bill spends time here stumping on behalf of Democratic candidates in the November midterms.

After the Clintons packed up from Arkansas in 1993 to move to the White House, never to return permanently, Dixon stayed behind and kept the couple up to date with news from their sprawling — and aging — network of friends and acquaintances. Once full of wedding and baby announcements, or reports of a new job or award, Dixon's notices nowadays more commonly deliver word of who is sick, who has died and who needs a helping hand.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I am the one that knows who his friends were, all his constituents that were important to him — I just send notices to him and Hillary,” Dixon said in a rare interview. Unlike many Clinton hands who lead public careers, Dixon has served the couple in near-anonymity.

In anticipation of Hillary Clinton’s potential 2016 presidential campaign, the Clintons are keeping their Arkansas network especially active. Their allies here insist she would put Arkansas in play, even though the state has become more Republican since Bill Clinton carried it in the 1990s. President Obama lost here by 20 percentage points in 2008 and by 24 percentage points in 2012.

The Clintons have staffs in New York and Washington, but, Dixon said, those aides “don’t know the Devoe Bollingers of the world. He was one of the president’s constituents, one of his supporters, an old cattle farmer from Horatio, Arkansas.”

Dixon said she scours the obituary pages of local newspapers and calls funeral homes looking for familiar names. At the top of each e-mail to the Clintons, Dixon writes the name, address and phone number of the subject — or, in the case of death, a next-of-kin. Like clockwork, that person often gets a call from Bill. A few days later, a warm letter from Hillary might show up in the mail. And in some instances, the Clintons fly home to attend funerals, as Bill did on Aug. 15 in Hot Springs, where he bade farewell to Margaret “Marge” Mitchell, a close friend of his late mother. The former president was an honorary pallbearer.

“You may move from your home town, you may move from your home state, but you don’t forget from where you came, and Bill Clinton is the prime example of that,” said Skip Rutherford, a longtime Clinton adviser and friend who serves as dean of the University of Arkansas’s Clinton School of Public Service.

When Bill returned to Little Rock on Aug. 15 to address a meeting of the Southern Governors’ Association, he referred to Arkansas as “our state.”

“I’m feeling pretty nostalgic,” he said, noting that he woke up in New York that morning at 4:45 to fly to Hot Springs for Mitchell’s funeral.

At a time when the Clintons are under scrutiny for their family’s exploding wealth and extravagant lifestyle on the paid speaking circuit, reminding voters of Hillary’s Arkansas roots has political benefits. This is where she married Bill, raised daughter Chelsea, practiced law, came of age politically, and, as first lady, championed state education and children’s health initiatives.

In July 2013, both Clintons attended the dedication of the Hillary Rodham Clinton Children’s Library in Little Rock, a gleaming facility where, as Bill marveled in his recent speech to the governors, “they’ve got a 3-D printer!” At the opening, Hillary read “The Very Hungry Caterpillar” to youngsters sitting around her feet.

Hillary returned this May for the opening of the Clinton Presidential Center’s temporary blown-glass exhibit by artist Dale Chihuly. And she came in June to sign copies of her latest book, “Hard Choices,” at a suburban Wal-Mart.

But in this high-stakes election year, it’s Bill who’s been an especially frequent visitor, throwing himself into Arkansas races. With his sky-high popularity — his favorability rating was 68 percent among registered voters in Arkansas in a May NBC News-Marist poll — he is trying to boost three longtime friends: Sen. Mark Pryor, gubernatorial candidate Mike Ross and congressional candidate James Lee Witt.

In August, Clinton headlined a Democratic Party fundraiser at Little Rock’s historic Capital Hotel, and associates said he is coming back in September and October to campaign.

“If he could get away with it, he’d live here for the two to three weeks before the election,” said Vince Insalaco, the state Democratic Party’s chairman and a longtime Clinton friend.

Arkansas Gov. Mike Beebe (D) said that when he asked Clinton’s staff if he would come to the August events, “they weren’t real high on him coming” because the Clintons were vacationing in the Hamptons. But once Beebe got the former president on the phone to personally invite him, it was easy to get to “yes.”

“A vacation from vacation is probably consistent with his personality,” Beebe said. Here in Arkansas, he added, “he soaks up information like a sponge. He’s always wanting to know the politics, he’s always wanting to know the policy, and even more often than when he comes, I’m getting a phone call from him.”

Before the Little Rock fundraiser, Clinton huddled with Pryor to talk politics. Pryor said he met Clinton when he was about 12; his father, David Pryor, served as governor when Clinton was climbing the political ladder as attorney general, and then as a U.S. senator when Clinton was governor and president.

"It's not unusual if you're in Arkansas for the phone to ring at an odd hour and it be Bill Clinton at the end of the line," Mark Pryor said as he rested his hands on his Bible during an interview on a recent Sundaymorning before church.

Clinton is eyeing the race to succeed Beebe with special interest. The Democratic nominee is Ross, a protege who got his start in politics as Clinton's 21-year-old driver during the 1982 governor's campaign.

"We had a one-car motorcade: It was him and me in a Chevy Citation," Ross recalled. "People wanted their photo taken with him. I'd take it with one of those old Polaroid cameras where the picture shoots out the front. He would autograph the bottom and say, 'You'll have your picture developed in a couple minutes.' "

Clinton helped persuade Ross — a former congressman who graduated from Hope High School, in Clinton's birthplace — to run for governor and has counseled him throughout the race.

The Republican nominee is Asa Hutchinson, who as a congressman in the late 1990s was a floor manager of Clinton's impeachment proceedings following the Monica Lewinsky scandal. For many Clinton loyalists here, Hutchinson's role still stings.

"It's kind of like being against the Razorbacks," Insalaco said, referring to the University of Arkansas sports teams. "It wasn't just being against Clinton, but against the whole state. . . . Insiders remember, but voters outside, I think they may need to be reminded."

Hutchinson said Democrats were "grasping at straws." And he argued that Bill Clinton's popularity would not rub off on Ross. "Arkansas is not really a coattails state," he said.

Bill Clinton, busy reconnecting with old friends here, is trying to challenge that prophecy.

After Clinton's August fundraiser at the Capital Hotel, George Hale, 69, settled into a couch in the lobby. When a reporter introduced himself, Hale said, "I'm an F.O.B. Friend of Bill."

This May, after Hale's wife died, Hale said Clinton "sent me a little handwritten note saying he was very sorry for the loss. He said, 'Hang in there, George.' "

How did Clinton know about Hale's loss? Lynda's List, of course.

Jewish Journal opinion: Lazar Palnick: "Hillary, Israel and the Jews"

By Lazar Palnick

August 29, 2014

Last month, I read an opinion piece in a Jewish publication wrongfully accusing Hillary Clinton of being anti-Israel and not fighting for the issues that matter most to Jewish Americans. This couldn't be further from the truth. Throughout her career, Hillary Clinton has fought for and been a strong ally and representative of the Jewish community. To suggest otherwise is just absurd.

I have been lucky enough to know Hillary Clinton for more than 35 years, ever since I was a teenager in Arkansas in the 1970s. I don't know anyone who is more able and ready to work on the issues that matter and to make sure that the ideas and concerns of the Jewish people are addressed.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I first met Hillary when my father, who was a Rabbi in Little Rock, went to Fayetteville to perform the town's first ever Bar Mitzvah. At the reception, we met a nice young couple, Bill and Hillary Clinton. My parents and the Clintons became friends, and thus began a long history working together in public service.

The author of the piece I read cites obscure references to Hillary Clinton's life and work back in Arkansas. Having witnessed that time in her life, I can say how misleading and unrepresentative these are to her history fighting for and understanding important issues to the Jewish community.

Hillary was always close to the Jewish community, and she and I worked together on many projects. Behind the scenes, Hillary became one of the leaders of a group of civic-minded professionals who worked together to help people of all faiths strive for communication and cooperation. While Hillary was a Methodist and Bill a Baptist, they always supported interfaith activities.

Hillary was always good at thinking outside the box and finding unique solutions to problems. While traveling, Hillary discovered an Israeli educational program that was designed to help immigrants and their children adjust to life in new countries. Hillary studied the groundbreaking program and figured out that it could be adapted to help economically disadvantaged families in Arkansas. Hillary brought the HIPPY program to Arkansas, where it was soon offered statewide and now operates in 21 states, serving 15,000 families.

I also noticed that the author conveniently chose to exempt from his argument Hillary Clinton's eight years in the Senate where, as a Senator from New York, she came to know the largest Jewish constituency outside of Israel and was an outspoken defender of Israel. Hillary Clinton's support within the Jewish communities of both New York and Arkansas is a testament to her friendships and relationships that have been developed over a lifetime.

Conflicts in Israel and the Middle East weigh heavy in the hearts and minds of the Jewish community. Strong leadership from leaders who understand our history and share the interests of the Jewish people is needed to bring about peaceful resolutions. The article chooses to neglect this in passing judgment on Hillary Clinton's record as Secretary of State.

As Secretary of State, Hillary Clinton continued her strong support for Israel. One of her greatest achievements as Secretary of State was negotiating a cease-fire to avert an all-out war in Gaza. She also helped lead efforts to prevent Iran from developing nuclear weapons. On the U.S's relationship with Israel, Hillary said, "Israel and the United States are united by a deep and unbreakable bond based on mutual interests and respect."

The domestic issues that the Jewish community cares about - freedom of religion and separation of church and state, personal freedoms and rights, education, and health care - are issues Hillary Clinton has worked on her entire life. Her passionate support of the Jewish community culminated with her being awarded a lifetime achievement award from the American Jewish Congress.

From her foreign policy abroad to her work back home, Hillary Clinton has consistently shown her support and dedication to the issues that matter most to Jewish Americans.

I share in the thoughts of Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in saying to Hillary Clinton, "you are a great friend and a great champion of peace," and I hope the rest of the Jewish community can share in this long-lasting bond with Hillary Clinton.

Washington Times: "O'Hillary: The Ready for Hillary superpac journeys to Ireland, raises $50,000"

By Jennifer Harper

September 1, 2014

Fundraise for Hillary Clinton in Ireland: faith and begorra, that's exactly what Ready for Hillary did. The independent grass-roots activist group traveled all the way to Ballsbridge - that's an exclusive suburb of Dublin - to raise $50,000 for Mrs. Clinton, a potential White House candidate.

A hundred fans showed up on Friday night for the event, organized by New York-based attorney Brian O'Dwyer and hosted by local power couple Linda and Brian Farren, who also have raised money for former President Bill Clinton in the past.

The Irish press was intrigued, boasting headlines like “Is Ireland ready for Hillary?” and suggesting that the nation feels ignored by the Obama administration. Meanwhile, only American citizens could donate to the cause, though organizers suggested Irish folks would donate if they could. Mrs. Clinton herself was not at the event. Iowa, rather than Ireland, is calling.

She will attend retiring Sen. Tom Harkin’s 37th annual steak fry on Sept. 14 in the company of Mr. Clinton - which might be problematic, as he is a vegan. But no matter. He can have a veggie fry. Ready for Hillary will also be there, incidentally. The group is raffling off an all-expenses-paid trip to the event for an eager Clinton fan.

Washington Examiner: “Six signs Hillary Clinton is running”

By Rebecca Berg

September 1, 2014, 5:00 a.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton isn't officially running for president. But unofficially, the signs are everywhere.

Most Democrats expect the former secretary of state won't make a public decision before the midterm elections in November. But her actions so far this year have pretty much confirmed what most people already thought.

Here are six steps she's taken toward a presidential campaign:

The memoir.

A carefully crafted, inoffensive memoir is nearly a prerequisite to the modern presidential campaign, a convenient way for a candidate to tell her story on her own terms. Clinton released her memoir "Hard Choices" this summer, detailing her tenure as secretary of State, and outlining her policy perspectives on a wide range of foreign policy and national security issues. The book tour was not unlike a presidential campaign: Clinton crisscrossed the nation for book signings, speeches, and interviews, receiving outsized media attention all the while.

The super PACs.

Without money, there is no presidential bid — and Clinton will be able to count on plenty of the former. Two super PACs, although by law directly unaffiliated with Clinton herself, have already set to work raising money and building lists of volunteers to help Clinton hit the ground running if she decides to seek the presidency. The first, Priorities USA, which supported President Obama in 2008, has aligned itself early with Clinton and has brought on former Obama campaign manager Jim Messina to help attract the party's biggest donors. The second group, Ready For Hillary, has been methodically building a nationwide network of Clinton supporters and collecting mostly small-dollar donations.

The office upgrade.

Clinton recently relocated her personal office to a larger space in midtown Manhattan, an important step should she want to add to her existing staff in advance of a presidential bid. The office likely would not house her presidential campaign headquarters, but serve as a transitional space.

The trip to Iowa.

In 2008, Clinton posted a disappointing result in the key Iowa caucuses, where she finished third behind Obama and former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards. This time, she's launching her Iowa charm offensive early, with a trip to the Hawkeye State in September. Clinton will headline the annual Steak Fry of Sen. Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, an important political event, along with her husband, former President Bill Clinton.

The cautious remarks.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton drew some criticism for taking more than a week to respond to the protests in Ferguson, Mo., but her caution was hardly surprising. Clinton appears to have made a deliberate calculation that any newsmaking statements that could later pop up in a campaign setting where views have changed. That's not to say Clinton hasn't taken some risks, however. In an interview with The Atlantic, Clinton attempted to distance herself from some of the president's foreign policy by calling his decision not to intervene early in Syria a "failure."

The celebrity endorsements.

Should she run for president, Clinton will likely have no trouble lining up celebrity surrogates on her behalf. In fact, they're lining up already. Singer Katy Perry snapped a photo with Clinton earlier this year, with the caption: "I told @hillaryclinton that I would write her a 'theme' song if she needs it..." Actresses Liv Tyler and Aubrey Plaza, among others, have also expressed their early support for Clinton.

Wonkette (satire): "At The New York Times, A Slow News Day"

By Doktor Zoom

August 31, 2014, 3:38 p.m. EDT

Things have quieted down in Ferguson and we have a holiday weekend, so the New York Times is full of analysis-type stuff today. There's a pretty good piece on Democrats' attempts to mobilize African-American voters who are outraged over Michael Brown's shooting (and another story about that effort in Ferguson, specifically). There's also longish story about the Chinese Communist Party's attempt to prevent Hong Kong from doing free-n-fair elections, which is both well-reported and interesting, but which we bet you won't read because it is not sexxay, you laggards. Go on, we dare you! You probably can't handle it! The big breaking news of the morning, we guess, is the St. Louis Rams' cutting Michael Sam, and if you read the New York Times for sports news, that's in there too.

How about more analysis stuff? ISIS is both medieval in its politics, and pretty darn modern in its use of social media, doing what the Times calls "jihad 3.0." Also, too, five years after everyone freaked out about "Death Panels" in Obamacare, insurance companies are increasingly covering end of life planning sessions, and the American Medical Association has recently requested that Medicare do the same. The Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services is considering the proposal but not saying anything about how it may decide, so get ready for a Return of the Death Panels — or not, maybe, since aging Boomers really want coverage for their visits to plan living wills and such. And here's some cheery news: "Temporary" jobs are becoming a bigger part of the employment picture, and we're all doomed (OK, we skimmed that one).

The Social Q's advice column is as terrible as it ever was, and fun to read because you can thank your personal deities (ours are Molly Ivins and George Carlin) that you don't know any people like these:

An old friend has a perennial problem being faithful to girlfriends. His current mate, whom he met while cheating on his former girlfriend, recently discovered a number of his dalliances. She decided to stay with him, but asked me to stop being friends with one of the women he cheated with. (I was not aware of the affair while it was going on, if that matters.) Trouble is, I am not that close with the girlfriend, but I've become quite friendly with the woman I've been asked to drop. Thoughts?

We can't really quibble with the advice — "Simply ignore the request. You are not that close" — and the suggestion that if the new GF continues to press the issue, it would be best to sympathize but add "You focus on your relationships, and I'll tend to mine." But yeesh, we're happy we don't have any friends who are apparently still in junior high school. Also, too, there is a question about diarrhea, right there in the Paper of Record:

A sweet friend, who is justifiably modest about her culinary abilities, had us to dinner at her house. The next day, when I called to thank her, she said her husband had been up all night, feeling queasy. I did not confess that I, too, had suffered symptoms associated with travel in third-world countries because my friend (who has a low self-esteem thanks to a rough childhood) would be crushed. My husband viewed this as a matter of public health and thought I should have spoken up to prevent future episodes. What say you?

Irene, Stamford, Conn.

Again, the advice is spot-on (ewww), and even gets to the central weirdness of the question:

When your friend opens a food truck, trolling the streets of Stamford to hawk her extra-rare chicken cordon bleu, that is the moment for speaking up. But the morning after a modest dinner for four, where 25 percent of the guests have already complained of food-related illness, I would probably keep it to myself [...] But you have conjured a heroine almost as fragile as Laura Wingfield in “The Glass Menagerie.” Why smash her unicorn (again)?

Honestly, only here on Wonkette would we ever say, “Oh, yeah, that gave me the squirts, too!”

Which seems like the obvious transition to the Sunday Review section, and the note that Ross Douthat and Tom Friedman are off today, does it not? Instead, Roger Cohen has a column about Barack Obama’s “hesitant foreign policy,” and why mister we could use a man like Richard Holbrooke again.

Frank Bruni has a book-blurb as a column, about Sam Harris’s upcoming Waking Up, which asks what it means to be “spiritual but not religious.” It’s every bit as fascinating and exciting as a Frank Bruni column should be, although Bruni does have this worthwhile question:

We hear the highest-ranking politicians mention God at every turn and with little or no fear of negative repercussion. When’s the last time you heard one of them wrestle publicly with agnosticism?

Hahaha, this is a hilarious question, seeing as how it is written about elected politicians in the United States of America Under God.

Maureen Dowd manages a third straight week without any mention of Bill or Hillary Clinton, largely because she’s hanging out with a celebrity, Matthew Michael Sheen [one of those "M" names, whatevs -- Dok Z], star of Masters of Sex. Skip it, unless you like Matthew Michael Sheen a whole lot.

Nicholas Kristoff has the groundbreaking insight that white people, very often, simply Don’t Get It, and he is eager to “push back at what I see as smug white delusion,” which will probably win him some friends among the Bill O’Reillys of the world. After a litany of statistics that should be shocking, he says,

All these constitute not a black problem or a white problem, but an American problem. When so much talent is underemployed and overincarcerated, the entire country suffers.

Kristoff hopes that if more whites actually had black friends, they might become a little more aware of what reality is like for black Americans:

I was shaken after a well-known black woman told me about looking out her front window and seeing that police officers had her teenage son down on the ground after he had stepped out of their upscale house because they thought he was a prowler. “Thank God he didn’t run,” she said.

One black friend tells me that he freaked out when his white fiancée purchased an item in a store and promptly threw the receipt away. “What are you doing?” he protested to her. He is a highly successful and well-educated professional but would never dream of tossing a receipt for fear of being accused of shoplifting.

And he also says that a “starting point is for those of us in white America to wipe away any self-satisfaction about racial progress.” Yes, we got rid of Jim Crow, in a legal sense, but maybe it also would be helpful “to acknowledge that the central race challenge in America today is not the suffering of whites.”

It will be fascinating to see how Fox News addresses Nicholas Kristoff’s shockingly racist anti-white column.

2016 Campaign

Clinton must be breathing easier, but Benghazi hearing proves unlikely to change people's minds: "...So deep is the partisan divide over the attack that the exhaustive hearing is unlikely to have changed many minds. Republicans are sure to still view Clinton as resistant to scrutiny and to blame her for security lapses in Benghazi. Democrats are sure to continue to see the hearing as a witch hunt designed to wound the Democratic front-runner's 2016 campaign." Stephen Collinson, CNN [More]

Jeb Bush cuts spending and pay due to struggling campaign: "Bush's struggling presidential campaign is cutting salaries across the board and reducing staff in a money-saving effort intended to concentrate resources on early voting states, an internal memo said on Friday. The memo said payroll costs were being slashed by 40 percent and staff at the Miami headquarters drastically cut back with some workers offered positions at reduced pay in early voting states…" Steve Holland, Reuters [More]

Ted Cruz, the fundraising front-runner: "If you believe in the predictive validity of fundraising numbers, Ted Cruz is actually the front-runner in this race, with Donald Trump his only serious competition. Cruz is the only candidate who has shown that he can extensively raise hard dollars from both large and small donors, ranking second in hard dollars to Carson and second in total dollars (including from Super PACs) to Jeb Bush. Cruz's fundraising is almost evenly balanced between small and large donors. Furthermore, toxic as his relations are with some parts of the party establishment and Congress, it is notable that he has endorsements from the largest number of elected officials of any candidate except Bush." Lawrence Brinton, National Review [More]

Ryan testing GOP direction: "Ryan is essentially asking conservatives within the GOP: What is your actual goal? Is it to govern in the public interest according to a conservative vision while building a political coalition capable of supporting needed reforms? Or is it the expression of outrage, rooted in a right-wing populism that is in fundamental (and continual) revolt against the political establishment? This has been the main question posed to Republicans since the wave election of 2010: governing or rage?" Michael Gerson, Washington Post [More]

Why Biden didn't run: "Biden made the rarest of choices in Presidential politics today: dignity over ambition...Biden would have had to begin with no money (and no love for raising it), no staff, and no organization in the states." Evan Osnos (TCG Speaker), Op-Ed, The New Yorker [More]

Chafee and Webb drop out of Dem primary race: "Lincoln Chafee's announcement, coming just days after Jim Webb also withdrew, leaves Clinton with only two opponents for the Democratic nomination: Bernie Sanders and Martin O'Malley." David Jackson, USA TODAY [More]

Explaining the unpredictability of the 2016 race: "An anemic economy that has Americans questioning incumbents, doubting experts and worrying about their own prospects...The discontented hail from both ends of the political spectrum, and their numbers are getting larger. If we combine the voters supporting Mr. Sanders, Mr. Trump, Dr. Carson and Ted Cruz, we might not reach a majority of the country, but we would get awfully close. This motley assortment of critics hardly agrees on anything, beyond what isn't working." Jay Cost, Wall Street Journal [More]

The Economy

Deficits shrink, but deficit hawks still worried: "The U.S. budget deficit is lower than before the 2008 financial crisis. But the good news is tempered by concerns on two fronts, one about the nation's debt load and the other about the economy. Deficit hawks are concerned that the improvement will lead both parties to overlook the red ink set to rise later this decade from a surge in spending on health care and retirement benefits for the baby-boom generation." Nick Timiraos, Wall Street Journal [More]

Without bailouts and stimulus, U.S. economy would be far worse off: "TARP, fiscal stimulus, quantitative easing and auto bailout remain dirty words to many people who increasingly blame them for prolonging the Great Recession and the slow pace of recovery...We found the reverse to be true: These extraordinary policies ended the crisis and jump-started an economic recovery that is stronger in the U.S. than in most countries. The U.S. economy has outperformed the plodding European and Japanese economies is the timely, massive and unprecedented responses of U.S. policy makers in 2008-09. So let's get the history right." Alan S. Blinder (TCG Speaker) and Mark Zandi, Op-Ed, Wall Street Journal [More]

Orszag on wage inequality: In the US, growing wage disparities may be the result of differences between highly successful companies and sectors, not differences in employee talents. A recent report by Jason Furman, Chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisors, and Peter Orszag, suggests just that. "Some companies in, say, the technology or financial sectors could generate consistently supernormal returns. Their employees would share the wealth by earning higher wages. Consistent with this possibility, other research suggests that the rise in wage inequality is driven more by a widening gap in the average earnings of workers in different companies…" Peter R. Orszag, Op-Ed, Bloomberg [More]

China easing: cutting interest rates and removing caps on bank deposit rates: "Just days after reporting its worst economic performance since the global financial crisis, China has unveiled a one-two punch to prop up growth, while also sweeping away a major control on how banks set deposit rates. The country's central bank combined a quarter-point cut in benchmark interest rates with a half-percentage reduction in banks' reserve-requirement ratios, moves aimed at lowering corporate financing costs and pumping liquidity into the economy...Simultaneously with the moves easing rates, China also took a crucial step toward reforming its creaky banking system by removing caps on deposit rates, illustrating a persistent dilemma for the country's economic stewards." Lingling Wei, Wall Street Journal [More]

ECB prepares to extend its quantitative-easing program in December: "The European Central Bank (ECB) did not act to further ease its already extraordinarily loose monetary stance...[but] gave a broad hint that it was preparing to do so when the council convenes for its final monetary-policy meeting of the year, on December 3rd. Mario Draghi, the head of the ECB, highlighted "the strength and persistence" of the factors that were currently preventing inflation from returning to the central bank's goal of nearly 2%." The Economist [More]

El-Erian on the Fed: "The fragility of the global economy, weakening conditions in the U.S. and recent statements from some Federal Reserve officials have led to a growing acceptance that the central bank won't raise interest rates this year. But those who now predict the Fed will put off its first increase in almost 10 years until March 2016 may be misreading the broader domestic and international context." Mohamed A. What did we learn from Benghazi hearing?: "The hearing revealed two new pieces of information: that in the aftermath of the attack Clinton told an Egyptian official that the violence was planned rather than the result of a spontaneous demonstration in response to an anti-Islam video and that she sent her family an email attributing the violence to a known terrorist group...Clinton chalked up the differences... to shifting intelligence assessments during a chaotic period." Jeremy Diamond and Elise Labott, CNN [More]

Kissinger: the US needs a new Middle East strategy: "American policy runs the risk of feeding suspicion rather than abating it. Its challenge is that two rigid and apocalyptic blocs are confronting each other: a Sunni bloc consisting of Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and the Gulf States; and the Shiite bloc comprising Iran, the Shiite sector of Iraq with Baghdad as its capital, the Shiite south of Lebanon under Hezbollah control facing Israel, and the Houthi portion of Yemen, completing the encirclement of the Sunni world. In these circumstances, the traditional adage that the enemy of your enemy can be treated as your friend no longer applies. For in the contemporary Middle East, it is likely that the enemy of your enemy remains your enemy." Secretary Henry Kissinger (TCG Speaker), Op-Ed, Wall Street Journal [More]

The myth of Putin's strength: "Five years ago, Russia was in a much stronger position, both at home and in the world...Mr. Putin is adept at short-term tactical responses to setbacks, but less talented at long-term strategy. Even with no response from the West, Mr. Putin's foreign adventures will finally fail, especially as domestic economic problems continue to fester. But the United States and its allies should seek to shorten that time by pushing back against Russia on multiple fronts. As Mr. Putin goes all in to prop up his ally in Syria, we should do the same with our partners and allies — not only in Syria, but in Europe and around the world." Michael McFaul, Op-Ed, New York Times [More]

Putin on the march: "President Obama says Russia is doomed to fail in the Syrian quagmire. But Russia is not trying to reconquer the country for Assad. It is consolidating a rump Syrian state in the roughly 20% of the country he now controls...It's a partition. It will leave the Islamic State in control in the interior north and east. Why is this doomed to failure? Putin's larger strategy is also obvious. He is not reconstructing the old Soviet empire. That's too large a task. But he is rebuilding and reasserting Russia's ability to project power beyond its borders." Charles Krauthammer, Op-Ed, Washington Post, [More]

Trudeau wins with "sunny" message and center-left change in Canada's policies: Trudeau will use major infrastructure investment to fuel jobs and growth. "The first major shift came when Trudeau announced he had spoken with President Barack Obama and told him he will remove Canada's six fighter jets from the U.S.-led bombing campaign against the Islamic State group in Iraq and Syria. Among the other areas in which Trudeau differs from Conservative Stephen Harper: climate change, immigration and whether relations with the U.S. should hinge on the future of the Keystone XL oil pipeline." Rob Gillies, ABC News [More]

Domestic Affairs

The unprecedented insurgency of the Freedom Caucus: "Congress has never seen anything quite like the House Freedom Caucus. There's always someone unhappy on Capitol Hill and it's not unusual for malcontents to band together. A rebellion made up of members who refuse to work with either party, however, is something that hasn't happened in living memory...The Freedom Caucus, rather than breaking from Republican ranks, has forced Republican leaders to break from them. It's a perverse sort of political jujitsu." Alan Greenblatt, Op-Ed, POLITICO [More]

Dems in denial, their Party is in trouble down the ballot: "The GOP might be in chaos ...But Democrats have nothing at all in the works to redress their crippling weakness down the ballot. Democrats aren't even talking about how to improve on their weak points, because by and large they don't even admit that they exist." Matthew Yglesias, Op-Ed, Vox [More]

With support from the Freedom Caucus and other GOP groups, Paul Ryan will run for speaker: "The latest to support him was the Republican Study Committee and the so-called Tuesday Group. The former represents mainstream House conservatives and claims over 170 members.....The Tuesday Group, which also backed Ryan, represents GOP moderates. Their support comes after the House Freedom Caucus, which earlier had endorsed another candidate, put out a statement Wednesday saying that the overwhelming majority of its members now support Ryan – though it wasn't technically an endorsement." Fox News [More]

Obama vetoes defense authorization bill: "[He] exercised his veto power for just the fifth time in his presidency, rejecting a defense authorization bill because of the way it would sidestep budget limitations for the military and because it would restrict the transfer of detainees being held at Guantanamo Bay. The White House said that the National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) would tap an overseas contingency operations account designed for emergencies and war costs and use it as a "slush fund" to avoid budget restrictions. Those restrictions — known as sequestration — would impose offsetting across-the-board cuts if spending passed certain levels." Steven Mufson, Washington Post [More]

Books

Review of Dennis Ross' "Doomed to Succeed: The U.S.-Israel Relationship From Truman to Obama": "Ross, who served most notably as President Clinton's special envoy to the Middle East, has produced a work that is simultaneously comprehensive, quite fair-minded and somewhat ponderous. As the subtitle suggests, this is not a history of Arab-Israeli peace efforts per se, but rather of the evolution of Israeli-American diplomatic relations — except these two matters are so inextricably linked as to pose an almost semantic difference. Because of that linkage, and because of American fears of repercussions from Arab nations should they appear too cozy with Israel, those relations have not always been as close as one might assume." Scott Anderson, Review, New York Times [More]

Tracker Program Update 12/4

Staffing

We will be eight strong starting on Monday, Dec. 10 when our second DC tracker starts full-time. Given the current demands on our DC team, this is a much welcomed addition.

One spot is still open on the team.

Equipment/Technology

No issues to report. All systems go!

Tracking System

Our team is fully acclimated to the equipment and video transmission process. Our conference calls are no longer dominated by tech. support questions. We've moved to a place where event details and campaign nuances are the primary focus of our calls.

The largest problem facing the tracking system at the moment is the backlog of video that needs uploaded to a user-friendly viewing site like YouTube. The addition of another DC based tracker will help alleviate this strain.

Media Monitoring

Both a national and local media monitoring system is up and running. Every morning the DC based trackers send out news clips. Every Tuesday and Friday local news clips from our target states (IA, NH, SC) are sent out.

Event Details:

- Campaigned in NH and FL this past week.
- His events in NH are not as well attended as the other candidates' events. Further, he does not receive as warm of a reception. Media is always present in force.
- In FL, he received a standing ovation at his campaign event, which is an anomaly compared to his reception in NH.
- One of our campaigners got a question about Iran asked at a town hall event in NH (question and answer below).

Key Quotes:

Q: "I know one of the issues that is facing our country right now is Iran and they pose a clear threat to us and I would like to know what precautions you are going to take to protect our nation from a terrorist attack. How would you prevent us from becoming susceptible to that happening again?"

A: "It's gotta be very clear to Iran that we are not going to allow them to become a nuclear power. It is against the policy of the American government in my view, it should be, to allow Iran to become a nuclear power. Why? Because Iran is irresponsible. And the worst nightmare of the Cold War, for those of us who lived through the Cold War, the biggest nightmare of the Cold War was nuclear weapons in the hands of an irresponsible person or regime. And they fit both of those categories. Ahmadinejad is an irresponsible person, the regime, has been an irresponsible regime at least since the late 1970's, taking hostages, promoting terrorism, engaged in terrorism, considered the be the biggest state sponsor of terrorism today. What does it mean to be a state sponsor of terrorism? It means giving money and armaments to terrorists. We're not, you want these people to have nuclear weapons? If they're supplying them with conventional weapons, isn't there a risk they are going to supply them with nuclear weapons? Do you want them to have that kind of power? Do you want them, if they become a nuclear power to create a nuclear proliferation in the Middle East, which is what would happen if they became nuclear, well then who knows what Saudi Arabia would do, who knows what Jordan would do, or Kuwait, or maybe some combination of those countries that tend to be Sunni Arab countries, rather than Shiite Arab countries, which have its own set of problems. So, there has to be a major commitment of the United States government, we are not going to allow them to become nuclear and we will take whatever steps we believe in are necessary to stop it. And we should try to get the rest of the world to cooperate with us with the kind of sanctions that really work and that, uh, stop them from going there, but they have to know that we are going to back that up, that we are not going to walk away from our responsibility at the end or that they can talk us out of it, otherwise I don't think the sanctions work."

On Iraq: "In an effort to try to achieve a successful result in Iraq, which, thank God, it seems like they [U.S. military] got a better chance of doing it now, can't say absolutely they will."

Event Details:

- Visited NH and IA this past week.
- Events are well-attended but voters are not responding with the same enthusiasm as in previous weeks. He is NOT the inspiration candidate.
- Has the "Kerry Syndrome" – i.e. gives answers to questions that situate him on both sides of the issue.
- In IA, Romney emphasizes his opposition to marriage equality and a women's right to choose. In NH, he focuses on immigration and taxes. His mail pieces in each state reflect this message discipline: 1) in IA, he's sent out a mailer about a constitutional amendment to keep marriage between a man and a woman and 2) in NH, he's sent out a couple of attack pieces on Giuliani about immigration.
- One of our campaigners got a question about endless war asked at a town hall in Iowa (question and answer below).

Key Quote:

Q: "Right Now Bush is in negotiations with Iraqi leaders regarding a long-term military commitment to secure both Iraq and the United States. My question is: do you support George Bush and his efforts to establish a long-term military presence in Iraq to keep us safe, even if it takes years?"

A: "Let me tell you what I do believe about Iraq. I do not believe we should have a permanent military presence in Iraq. I don't think we should announce to the world we want to have a permanent military presence in Iraq. We have permanent military bases very close and in the region. And we have such a base in Kuwait, Cutter, and there are other places from which we can defend our interests in the region but I do not believe we should precipitously withdraw from Iraq. And let me tell you why, for me the key in Iraq right now is making sure that Al Qaeda and people like Hezbollah and other groups like that do not establish a safe-haven or a base from which they recruit and finance and launch attacks against us… and our friends.

And the surge is working to prevent Al Qaeda from establishing such a safe, safe-haven. As a matter of fact, as you are now reading and more & more people are learning, the Sunnis, a large portion of the population of Iraq, has been working with our military to help get rid of Al Qaeda amongst them. Al Qaeda over-played their hand, was too aggressive, too domineering, too demanding, and the Sunnis are rejecting them and working with us. This is a very positive development for their country and our success there, because we do not want to have, we don't want to have Al Qaeda in charge in a major region of the world. If they had a major piece of Iraq or all of Iraq, let me tell you, Iraq would make Afghanistan, and the launch of terror from that country look like child's play.

And so it's important to me that we get the job done. And I will not walk out of Iraq until the job is done."

The Real Secret to Huckabee's Rise in the Polls (ABC News 12/03/07)

Last Wednesday, speaking at Jerry Falwell's Liberty University, former Arkansas Gov. and Baptist preacher Mike Huckabee said that "Divine providence was responsible for his recent surge in the polls in Iowa," as he noted that he "is the candidate with much less capital firepower than his rivals."

On Immigration: "And by the way, no disrespect, but let's not forget it was a, uh, Republican Senate and Ronald Reagan who actually signed the amnesty bill twenty years ago that helped create this mess. So we gotta get it fixed."

"The Republican party is far from dead."

Event Details:

- Thompson fundraised in California this week and appeared on Larry King Live.
- We attempted to track Thompson at an event in New Hampshire this past weekend but he did not show. This is likely the fault of the organizers of the event.

know the facts on the ground. And I'm here to tell you there are some democrats who have declared this war lost a long time ago. And if we would have done what they wanted to do seven or eight months ago, Al-Qaeda would be tellin' the world they beat the United States of America."

On Petraeus: "This is the right strategy, the right general."

On the youtube debate: "There's a lot of things that need to be done in Washington today, my friends. And, in case you saw the debate the other night, we didn't address many of them. I'm sorry to tell you. I mean, getting questions from cartoon characters is all very interesting experience, but I'm not sure how illuminating [it is] to the people who are watching."

On contractors and Rumsfeld: "I think it's unfortunate that we have to use these contractors and it's directly related to Rumsfeld's failure in not expanding the Marine Corps and the Army into a much larger organization so they could handle these requirements and responsibilities. And it's not a good thing that we didn't have enough members of the Army and Marine Corps. And one of the many mistakes secretary Rumsfeld made was not expanding the Army and Marine Corps to a point where they could take over those responsibilities. And I'd remind you that the Army and the Marine Corps are one-third smaller than they were at the time of the first Gulf War. They're the best military we've ever had there just aren't enough of them. And we're gonna have to recruit and enlist a lot more members of the military today."

U.S. News: Clinton Tests Two Themes: Working Together, Inequality (The Wall Street Journal)
By Laura Meckler
March 24, 2015
The Wall Street Journal

WASHINGTON -- Hillary Clinton road-tested two themes likely to shape her pitch to voters in a 2016 presidential campaign -- the value of working together and the need to combat economic inequality -- during a panel discussion with Democratic groups on Monday.

Her appearance at the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank, represented another building block for her expected campaign. Already, some people who have agreed to take on key roles with a future campaign have begun working on a volunteer basis, in addition to the small staff that Mrs. Clinton pays with her own money.

Mrs. Clinton appears set for an April launch of her presidential campaign.

In the discussion that focused on American cities, co-sponsored by a labor union, Mrs. Clinton emphasized the value of leaders' working together in what advisers say is certain to be one of her core themes as a full-fledged presidential candidate. Mrs. Clinton didn't place the blame on either party, but her words could be read as a critique of both President Barack Obama and congressional Republicans.

People should "get out of the kind of very unproductive discussion that we've had for too long, where people are just in their ideological bunkers, having arguments instead of trying to reach across those divides and have some solutions," Mrs. Clinton said.

She added with a smile, "Maybe we'll start not too far from here in a beautiful domed building," an apparent reference to the Capitol.

Mrs. Clinton thus far has faced minimal opposition in her bid for the Democratic nomination, though one potential opponent, former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, appeared to be sharpening his message on his first trip to Iowa over the weekend.

In a populist critique of Wall Street -- and perhaps by implication of Mrs. Clinton and her husband, former President Bill Clinton, who retain strong ties to New York's financial sector -- Mr. O'Malley critiqued the size of banker bonuses and called for reinstating the Glass-Steagall law. The repeal of that Depression-era legislation, which separated commercial and investment banking, was signed by Mr. Clinton.

"We must not allow another Wall Street meltdown to bring down the hardworking families of our country," he said. "We have a responsibility to put that sort of repeat performance beyond the realm of the possible."

Urban America is a welcome topic for many Democrats, as the party relies heavily on metropolitan voters to win elections. Monday's panel, which was co-sponsored by the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, featured speakers representing teachers, civil-rights groups, business and academia. The panel offered Mrs. Clinton the chance to revel in policy, citing details of a Harvard University professor's research and studiously taking notes.

Mrs. Clinton pointed to income inequality as a persistent problem. "A lot of our cities truly are divided," she said. "They have some of the most dynamic, well-educated, affluent people in the world, and people who are trapped in generational poverty."

The issue is a top concern for many progressives in the party and an emerging theme among some Republicans as well.

The Republican National Committee, in a written statement, called Mrs. Clinton's panel discussion "a scripted press event at the far-left Center for American Progress."

The panel discussion was a break from a recent rough spot for Mrs. Clinton, including revelations about her use of a personal email server as secretary of state and questions concerning foreign donations to the Clinton Foundation, her family's charitable organization.

On Monday, she defended the foundation, twice mentioning programs it supported. She pointed to a partnership with unions to encourage energy retrofits helped by the Clinton Global Initiative, an allied group. "That's the kind of creative work we can do together, and I'm obviously proud that CGI was the convener to make that happen," she said.

Clinton: Problems aren't fixed in 'ideological bunkers' (The Washington Post)
By Anne Gearan
March 24, 2015
The Washington Post

Hillary Rodham Clinton warned Monday that tough policy problems don't get fixed from inside "ideological bunkers" but made no direct attack on the large and noisy field of Republican candidates vying to oppose her.

As the soon-to-be-official Democratic presidential candidate spoke at a liberal forum on urban problems, tea party favorite Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Tex.) was announcing his presidential bid.

Clinton is expected to announce her own presidential campaign next month but kept coy about her plans Monday.

Policymakers need to "look at what works and get out of the very unproductive discussions that we've had for too long where people are just in their ideological bunkers having arguments instead of trying to reach across those divides and come up with some solutions," Clinton said at the forum, which was organized by the liberal Center for American Progress and the American Federation of State County and Municipal Employees.

The reference seemed at least partly aimed at Clinton's differences with many in the progressive-leaning crowd over issues such as free-trade agreements, which labor groups generally view with skepticism.

But that's as far as the disagreement went, at least in public. Instead, Clinton dove happily into the weeds of urban revitalization, job creation and social mobility - making what may be some of her last policy-related remarks before she enters the 2016 presidential race.

"We know a lot about social mobility," Clinton said during the discussion. "One of the biggest issues we face is income inequality combined with wage stagnation. They really go hand in hand. We don't have enough good jobs, we don't have people being placed into those jobs. We don't have enough social mobility."

In between the buzzwords were planks of Clinton's forthcoming economic platform, which will focus on expanding middle-class opportunity in "a way that lifts everybody up," as she said Monday.

Clinton seemed to take extra care to stress her ability to work across party lines, even as she came back repeatedly to the issue of income inequality that is a touchstone for her own party's left flank.

She closed with a playful suggestion that she might have reason in the future to enlist Compton, Calif., Mayor Aja Brown, an event participant, for ideas on dealing with urban gangs.

"Don't be surprised if you get a call," Clinton said as the crowd began to laugh knowingly. "Maybe we'll start not too far from here," Clinton said, as the laughter grew.

The White House is about three blocks from where she spoke. But Clinton kept going, appearing to turn the reference toward the Capitol, home of the Republican-led Congress.

"In a beautiful domed building, get everybody in the same room," Clinton said. "Start that conversation that can lead to that collaboration and better results for our cities and our country."

Clinton later met with President Obama for about an hour, the White House said Monday. As with at least one earlier such meeting, the White House did not disclose the topics.

At an evening speech named for the late New York Times political correspondent Robin Toner, Clinton gave a spirited defense of the Affordable Care Act. She also joked about her reputation for secrecy and distrust of reporters, and the recent controversy over her use of a private e-mail server and address while serving as secretary of state.

"I am all about new beginnings," Clinton said.

The fresh starts, she said, include "a new e-mail account," and "a new relationship with the press."

Hillary being Hillary: Clinton flaunts wonky side at Washington panel (The Guardian)
By Dan Roberts
March 23, 2015
The Guardian

The presumptive presidential candidate quotes research on social immobility and drops policy buzz phrases during discussion about urban development. Who said it: Clinton or Cruz?

“Amen,” sighed Hillary Clinton, as she debated urban development at a Washington thinktank that was 180 miles – and 180 degrees – away from the fiery campaign launch of Republican rival Ted Cruz at the same time in Virginia.

“I love sessions like this because it’s really nice to get back into an evidenced-based discussion,” she added, in oblique reference to the email scandal that has so far overshadowed her own attempt to begin a more earnest, policy-focused campaign.

None of the panel at the Center for American Progress – a centre-left thinktank set up by Clinton during her last tilt at the White House – were rude enough to bring it up again during what proved a more tightly controlled appearance than her disastrous press conference on the affair two weeks ago.

But the former secretary of state’s relief at being back on ideological home turf could not have been more palpable.

Three times during her brief remarks, she also paid tribute to the Clinton Global Initiative and Clinton Foundation, family-run institutions whose reliance on corporate and overseas donors has also attracted more negative public attention of late.

A starker contrast still for Clinton was to the more colourful, if less cautious, political message being unveiled further south by Cruz.

White the Texas senator was reaching out to evangelicals and conservatives with a full-throated assault on the Washington consensus, Clinton was here to preach to its policy wonks, and hopefully show her concern for Democratic causes in danger of becoming captured by leftwing rival Elizabeth Warren.

“A lot of our cities truly are divided,” said Clinton. “They have a lot a of inequality that has only gotten worse... They have people that are trapped in generational poverty and whose skills are not keeping up with what the jobs or today and tomorrow demand.”

This was no policy speech, more a mood music hymn, replete with the requisite buzz phrases such as “abolishing silos” and “creating the conditions for coordination and collaboration”.

But this was also a putative presidential candidate willing to quote research by Harvard professors on the causes of social immobility and draw uncomfortable comparisons between parts of the country that had got it right and those that had not.

“Two cities with similar affluence – Seattle and Atlanta – have markedly different rates of economic mobility,” said Clinton. “It’s not about race... It turns out that places where the fabric of community is strong, with a vibrant middle class, places that are more integrated across class, places with good skills, places with unions, places with religious and civil organisations, help people feel rooted in being part of a community and be able to pull together all of the aspects that play into upward mobility.”

While Cruz railed against big government, the queen of Washington’s political class was also unafraid to sing its praises and hint at a more European-style economic intervention.

“We have 5.6 million people in America between 16 and 24 who are neither in school nor at work, and if we don’t consciously try to reach out to these people and train them, [then] they don’t have the hard skills but they also don’t have the soft skills,” she added.

“The other thing that Germany has is instead of an unemployment system they have a wage subsidy system, so you don’t let people go in the first place, and I think there are lots of creative ideas both in our own country and elsewhere in comparable economies.”

There may be many more speeches and events like this before Clinton even formally declares she is in the race for the White House. But if the first public appearance since the first wave of scandals began to die down is anything to go by, Hillary is planning to carry on being Hillary.

At liberal venue, Clinton urges better deal for urban poor, youth (Reuters)
By Amanda Becker
March 23, 2015
Reuters

WASHINGTON, March 23 (Reuters) - Likely presidential candidate Hillary Clinton called for better access to jobs and improved opportunities for the urban poor and the young on Monday at an event hosted by a left-leaning think tank.

In remarks that will likely appeal to her Democratic base, the former secretary of state said middle-class Americans risk being squeezed out of U.S. cities and called for cheaper housing, improved infrastructure and expanded jobs training.

She praised the work of the Clinton Foundation in urban centers. The foundation has faced criticism for receiving money from foreign donors while she was America's top diplomat and for failing to adhere to an agreement to disclose such money.

"One of the biggest issues we face is income inequality combined with wage stagnation," Clinton said. "They really go hand-in-hand. We don't have enough good jobs, we don't have people being placed into those jobs, we don't have enough social mobility."

While she has not announced her candidacy, Clinton is the presumed frontrunner for the 2016 Democratic nomination.

Some Democrats have called for a challenger for Clinton from the party's liberal wing. The Boston Globe on Sunday urged Massachusetts Senator Elizabeth Warren, a liberal critic of Wall Street and big banks, to jump into the race.

Warren, who spearheaded the creation of the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau after the 2008 financial crisis, has repeatedly said she does not plan to run. Former Maryland Governor Martin O'Malley, who also is weighing a campaign, attacked Wall Street last week in a speech in the early voting state of Iowa.

The former first lady took no questions from the media at the panel at the Center for American Progress, founded by John Podesta, a former chief of staff to President Bill Clinton and the likely chairman of Clinton's anticipated campaign.

Nor did Clinton address the controversy over her use of a private email account and server for State Department emails while she was secretary of state.

Clinton said the foundation had coordinated with unions to pool pension funds to train workers on energy retrofitting, generating "tens of thousands of jobs." She also highlighted the foundation's "Job One" program, which helps place young workers in their first job through partnerships with nonprofits and businesses.

She said policymakers and business leaders should "consciously try to set up better systems to reach out, find these young people and train them."

Hillary Clinton Wades Back Into Policy Waters (Bloomberg)
By Jennifer Epstein
March 23, 2015
Bloomberg

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton on Monday reveled in the wonkiness of a discussion of ways to combat income inequality in American cities and hinted that more conversations like it would be on the way.

“I love sessions like this because it's really nice to get back into an evidence-based discussion about what works, what doesn’t work,” she said at the Center for American Progress in Washington, D.C., where she spoke about urban challenges alongside union leaders, local officials, and Housing and Urban Development Secretary Julian Castro.

Clinton hasn’t spent much time in recent months diving into policy in public forums. Her recent appearances have largely been paid speeches, and any discussion of policy leads to inevitable questions about her likely presidential candidacy. But with a campaign launch believed to be approaching, Clinton took a chance to hint at how she hopes to handle policy debates as she re-enters the political arena.

“Look at what works and get out of the very unproductive discussions that we’ve had for too long where people are just in their ideological bunkers having arguments, instead of trying to reach across those divides and come up with some solutions,” said Clinton, speaking the same morning as Republican Senator Ted Cruz took to a stage in Virginia to say he would seek the White House.

Turning to Compton, Calif., Mayor Aja Brown, who had discussed the city’s efforts to fight gangs, Clinton added in an apparent reference to the Capitol or to the building she hopes to occupy, the White House: “Don’t be surprised if you get a call to come. Maybe we'll start not too far from here in a beautiful domed building, get everybody in the same room.”

Clinton’s policy comments were focused on inequality and jobs, and not on areas where she has some disagreements with the left wing of her party, including trade.

“One of the biggest issues we face is income inequality combined with wage stagnation,” she said. “A lot of our cities truly are divided. They have a lot of inequality that has only gotten worse.”

In cities, Clinton said, some of the most “dynamic, well-educated, affluent people in the world” live alongside “people who are trapped in generational poverty and whose skills aren’t keeping up with what the jobs of today and tomorrow demand.”

One area of emphasis, she suggested, should be the 5 million Americans age 16-24 who are not in school and do not have jobs. “We have to focus on that first job and get that person into that system so that they can get better educated and better opportunities will come,” she said.

Hillary Clinton talks urban policy (USA Today)
By David Jackson
March 23, 2015
USA Today

While observers assess Ted Cruz's impact on the Republican presidential race, prospective Democratic candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton spent Monday discussing urban policy — and meeting with President Obama.

The president and his former Secretary of State " enjoy catching up in person when their schedules permit," said White House spokesman Josh Earnest. "This afternoon they met privately for about an hour at the White House and discussed a range of topics."

Neither the White House nor Clinton provided further information.

Earlier in the day, Clinton told a forum in Washington that modern cities are "driving economic prosperity" and that government and the private sector should help them do more to generate jobs, improve infrastructure and address the challenges of inequality.

"How do we promote success?" said Clinton, a former senator from New York state who noted that her constituency included New York City, Buffalo, Albany, Syracuse and Rochester.

The forum, sponsored by the liberal-leaning Center for American Progress, also included business people, labor leaders and government officials from the federal and local levels.

There was a very little political talk, though Clinton at one point said people should address urban challenges by getting out of their "ideological bunkers" and reaching across political divides.

"Look at what works," she said.

Clinton also said that good urban policy can help battle income inequality, a comment that drew catcalls from Republicans about the former first lady's lifestyle.

"It's always interesting to hear Hillary Clinton chime in on income inequality given that her speaking fee alone is more than the average American makes in four years," said Michael Short, a Republican Party spokesman. "What voter out there struggling to make ends meet can relate to someone who spends millions flying around on private jets and thinks leaving the White House with a multimillion dollar book deal counts as being 'dead broke? '"

It's the first of two public events on Clinton's schedule. Later in the day , she addresses a ceremony for the Toner Prize for Excellence in Political Reporting.

The events take place amid reports that Clinton may announce her decision on a presidential bid as early as next month.

Hillary Clinton takes on inequality in remarks to liberal group (Los Angeles Times)
By Michael A. Memoli
March 23, 2015
Los Angeles Times

Hillary Clinton addressed the promise of urban renewal as an engine for economic expansion Monday but stressed the need for fostering growth "in a way that lifts everybody up."

As she closes in on the launch of a presidential campaign in which she will immediately be the Democratic Party front-runner, Clinton used her remarks at a liberal think tank in Washington to show her commitment to an issue important to the party's base: the equality gap.

"One of the biggest issues we face is income inequality, combined with wage stagnation," she said during a panel discussion at the Center for American Progress, an organization founded by her likely campaign chairman, John Podesta. "We need to think hard about what we're going to do, now that people are moving back into and staying in cities, to make sure that our cities are not just places of economic prosperity and job creation on average, but do it in a way that lifts everybody up."

She described herself as very supportive of an effort by New York Mayor Bill de Blasio to launch universal prekindergarten, calling it an example of ways to keep middle-class families from being priced out of increasingly expensive cities.

While her remarks touched on issues that have become top priorities for her party, she avoided a laundry list of policy proposals of the type a candidate might offer and instead sought to associate herself with what she described as a more pragmatic approach to governance in big cities.

"We have cities that are working well because they have been reinventing themselves, and they have done so in a collaborative, inclusive manner," she said, while other cities are struggling in a "political battlefield" where people are "in their ideological bunkers."

Clinton's participation in the panel, which also included Compton Mayor Aja Brown and Dixon Slingerland, the executive director of Los Angeles' Youth Policy Institute, was limited to brief opening and closing remarks. After the discussion, she singled out Brown's work combating gang violence, at which point she offered the morning's only hint of what might be in store for her in the near future.

"Don't be surprised if you get a call to come, and maybe we'll start not too far from here," she said, before clarifying she had a "beautiful domed building" in Washington in mind for Brown -- the Capitol, not the White House.

After the event, Brown praised Clinton's depth of understanding on the challenges urban communities face and said she looks forward to "seeing her back on the national stage."

"If we can really focus on the things that unify us and the issues that really matter, then we can come to some real conclusions," she said.

Clinton is also scheduled to speak at a journalism awards dinner in Washington on Monday. The former secretary of state is expected to formally launch a presidential bid as soon as next month.

Hillary Clinton is getting serious about social mobility (The Washington Post)
By Emily Badger
March 23, 2015
The Washington Post

Hillary Clinton raised the right question, which is a start.

"Why," she asked Monday morning, "do some communities have, frankly, more ladders for opportunity than other communities?"

The likely 2016 Democratic frontrunner was headlining a roundtable discussion at the Center for American Progress on expanding opportunity in urban America. This question is actually a sophisticated and hugely important one, and the fact that Clinton is thinking about it hints at what could be an important theme in the coming election.

By definition, the American Dream sounds like an American phenomenon, something equally accessible to hard workers whether they live in a big city or a rural community, the North or the South, a Rust Belt town or a Sun Belt suburb. But, in fact, an accumulating body of research suggests that children growing up in some parts of the country have much better odds than children elsewhere of climbing up the economic ladder, of rising from poor roots to head middle- and upper-class households of their own.

The American dream, it turns out, is not a universal promise. It's more real for children in Seattle than Atlanta, for poor kids growing up around Salt Lake City than Charlotte.

Clinton cited Monday the research that helped document this, a landmark study led by Raj Chetty and other researchers at Harvard and the University of California at Berkeley released in 2013. They found that a child's prospects for economic mobility vary greatly — and disturbingly — by geography in America. There's something about metropolitan Seattle, in other words, that's more conducive to intergenerational mobility than Atlanta.

So what is that something (or somethings)? A couple of years ago — as recently as the last presidential election — we didn't even know to ask this question. Now that we do, we can have an election-season debate about social mobility that goes far beyond empty platitudes about hard work versus helping hands.

"How do we promote success and upward mobility?" Clinton said on Monday. "It’s not only about average income, as important as that is. You can look at cities that on average have similar affluence, but people are trapped and not able to move up in one city, and are moving up in another."

Metropolitan Seattle and Atlanta have comparable median incomes. But in Seattle, about one in 10 kids raised by families in the bottom fifth of household incomes will rise to the top fifth by age 30. In Atlanta, the same is true for only about one in 25 kids at the bottom.

Chetty, Nathaniel Hendren, Patrick Kline and Emmanuel Saez have offered some initial answers as to what might be going on. Social mobility appears to be higher, they found, in metropolitan areas with less economic and racial segregation, with better schools, more social capital and lower rates of single parenthood. Other researchers at CAP have found higher social mobility among metros with a large middle class.

The importance of good schools isn't surprising. Nor is the role of two-parent families, although part of the finding on this front is fascinating: Even children with married parents have higher mobility when they live in communities with fewer single parents. Perhaps this happens because overwhelmed single mothers are able to contribute less time to not only their own children, but to the communities around them — to the PTA or even the parenting of a neighbor's kids.

The findings about segregation reinforce the idea that social mobility and geographic mobility are intimately linked. If poor communities live segregated far from jobs, as is often the case in a sprawling metro like Atlanta, employment and opportunity are harder to access for poor residents. When poor people are segregated, they're also less likely to benefit from the connections to middle- or upper-income neighbors who might know about a better job opportunity or a good after-school program.

Chetty and his co-authors can't explain all of these relationships; they're just starting the work of highlighting them. But their data raises crucial questions about who we're leaving behind in America and what might be important to help them ahead. And that's precisely the kind of policy debate we might want to have in the upcoming election if we really want to ensure more equality of opportunity.

Clinton's comments Monday suggest that she's already thinking about these problems. Few voters in either party are likely comfortable with the idea that a child's future is significantly determined in the U.S. today by where he or she lives. Talking about the difference between Seattle and Atlanta — as she did Monday — is powerful both because it tugs at the American sense of fairness, and because it turns abstract fears about inequality into something terribly real.

If Clinton talks more about it, the topic gives her a chance to unite many policy goals — investing in better schools, greater job access for the poor, stronger civic institutions like unions and larger middle-class communities — under the much larger theme of social mobility at a time when many Americans worry their children will grow up to be worse off than them.

Hillary Clinton tries to soothe progressives (Politico)
By Gabriel Debenedetti
March 23, 2015
Politico

As Ted Cruz rallied the GOP's conservative wing with his Monday announcement that he's running for president, all-but-declared Democratic candidate Hillary Clinton quietly tried to calm her party's restive progressive wing, segments of which are actively seeking an alternative in 2016.

The former secretary of state spoke at the Washington headquarters of the liberal Center for American Progress think tank at an urban policy-focused event co-hosted by the American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees union. She stuck largely to policy, praising, for example, a pre-Kindergarten program championed by New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio, a darling of many progressives wary of Clinton.

Clinton in particular zeroed in on the growing gap between the rich and the poor. "One of the biggest issues we face is income inequality, combined with wage stagnation," the former senator said.

Cruz's announcement at Liberty University in Lynchburg, Virginia, sucked up much of the day's political oxygen. Still, Clinton's appearance 200 miles away was a chance for her to calm some of the jitters among progressives, many of whom fear Clinton is too close to Wall Street and won't follow through on their priorities.

On Sunday, for instance, The Boston Globe editorial board urged Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren, another favorite of progressives, to run in 2016. Warren insists she won't run, but many liberal groups are still agitating for her to do so.

Clinton is currently polling far ahead of any potential challengers for the Democratic nomination, but she does have potential competition aside from Warren.

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley has recently been traveling through the influential early-voting states and ratcheting up his own rhetoric against major financial institutions. O'Malley's political action committee sent out a fundraising email focused on Wall Street reform just as Clinton was speaking on Monday morning.

Clinton, who avoided any mention of her 2016 ambitions on Monday, at one point said it was important to break "out of the very unproductive discussion that we've had for too long where people are just in their ideological bunkers having arguments."

She was joined on the panel by Housing and Urban Development Secretary Julian Castro, often mentioned as a possible vice presidential choice, and the think tank's president, Neera Tanden, who served as policy director on Clinton's unsuccessful 2008 White House campaign.

Some progressives argue that Clinton is too chummy with Wall Street and link her to her husband Bill Clinton's policies of deregulation during his stint in the White House.

But by appearing with union leaders Monday, Clinton seemed to be trying to show her commitment to the middle class. She was seated next to AFSCME's Lee Saunders and four seats down from the American Federation of Teachers' Randi Weingarten, with expected campaign chairman John Podesta looking on from the front row. Podesta helped found the Center for American Progress, which has strong ties to Clinton and the Obama administration.

The presumed Democratic frontrunner has spent recent weeks fending off questions about her use of a private email account at the State Department and foreign fundraising conducted by her family's foundation. On Monday, she specifically pointed to the foundation's work on urban job-training programs, but did not refer to the dual imbroglios.

Clinton also did not explicitly mention the importance of collective bargaining rights as she did in a Washington speech in early March — a line that was seen, at the time, as a jab at likely Republican presidential contender and union foe Scott Walker.

Clinton, whose schedule of public appearances drops off after this week ahead of an expected campaign launch in April, also avoided the topic of trade. She is eventually expected to weigh in on an effort to pass a "fast track" trade promotion authority supported by President Barack Obama but vilified by union and environmental

Hillary Clinton tackles economic inequality, in her own way (MSNBC)
By Alex Seitz-Wald
March 23, 2015
MSNBC

Hillary Clinton used one of her final events before an imminent presidential campaign launch to tackle economic inequality in American cities, but preached a message more inclusive than antagonistic.

“A lot of our cities really are divided,” Clinton said during an urban policy panel at the Center for American Progress in Washington, D.C., which was also sponsored by the labor union AFSCME. “They have a lot of inequality that has only gotten worse. They have some of the most dynamic, well-educated, most affluent people in the world. And people who are trapped in generational poverty and whose skills are not keeping up with what the jobs of today and tomorrow demand.”

Inequality has become a rallying cry for progressives, including those who want Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren to challenge Clinton for the nomination. Others have called on Hillary to adopt Warren’s populist message, including her blistering rhetorical attacks on big banks and the richest 1%. But the former secretary of state and all-but-declared presidential candidate’s solution to inequality was decidedly more Clintonian than Warren-esque.

Clinton sat dead center on a ten-member panel that included labor union bosses, local and federal government leaders, financial investors, and think tank experts. The assembly represented Clinton’s vision for an “evidence-based” policy conversation that steers clear of politics and relies on close collaboration between the public and private sectors.
It’s a model pioneered by Clinton’s husband at his Clinton Foundation and Clinton Global Initiative, and one which Clinton hinted she would bring to government if she became president.

“I’m looking not just at what can be done working across governmental lines,” Clinton said, “but what we can do in partnership with the public and private sector.” One example she pointed to was youth unemployment, saying it can be helped by giving companies government help train young people and give them their first jobs.

Without using the word “gentrification,” Clinton also spoke to one of the thorniest issues in urban policy, saying cities need to find a way to remain affordable for middle and working class Americans, even as they become more popular destinations for the affluent.

Don’t focus on “mobility and job creation on average,” she said, “but do it in a way that lifts everybody up.”
Clinton cast race aside as a major factor in the divisions, citing the work of Harvard professor Raj Chetty, instead saying the solution is strengthening the social and economic fabric of cities with institutions like unions and faith groups.

Government resources, which for decades facilitated flight to the suburbs, need to be refocused on rebuilding city infrastructure, Clinton added.

Cities are often praised in Washington as places beyond partisanship, where elected officials are forced to tackle tangible problems regardless of ideology, a message Clinton has adopted of late.
“[We need to] get out of the very unproductive discussion we’ve had too long where people are just in their ideological bunkers having arguments instead of trying to reach across those divides and come up with some solutions,” Clinton said, echoing her recent emphasis on bipartisan problem solving.

Republicans, not surprisingly, were not impressed with Clinton’s talk of social mobility. “It’s always interesting to hear Hillary Clinton chime in on income inequality given that her speaking fee alone is more than the average American makes in four years. What voter out there struggling to make ends meet can relate to someone who spends millions flying around on private jets and thinks leaving the White House with a multi-million dollar book deal counts as being ‘dead broke?’” said Republican National Committee spokesperson Michael Short.

Also on the panel was Housing and Urban Development Secretary Julian Castro, who has been discussed as a potential vice presidential pick, and Aja Brown, the mayor of Compton, California who talked about convening a meeting with gang members to try to find a path to peace.

Clinton liked the idea.

“What you did with gangs and gang members is exactly what needs to be done in so many parts of our country,” Cinton said.

“So don’t be too surprised if you get a call,” the soon-to-declare presidential candidate continued. “Maybe we’ll start not too far from here, in a beautiful domed building, where we’ll get everybody in the same room and start that conversation that could lead to collaboration and better results for our cities and our countries.”

The White House is about three blocks from where Clinton spoke.

Watching Hillary Clinton Nod Vigorously (Bloomberg)
By Melinda Henneberger
March 23, 2015
Bloomberg

Mostly, what Hillary Clinton did on Monday morning, as part of a panel discussion on urban issues held at the liberal think tank the Center for American Progress, was nod vigorously and take copious notes. She did this with great enthusiasm, as if the ideas being presented were all thrilling and new. And in a way, the message her body language sent was perfect: I'm here. I'm listening more than I'm talking. And I am even willing to go to school.

For the many progressives who wonder where exactly Clinton stands on a number of issues, including trade, Wall Street reform and how she'd address income inequality, inspiring the feeling that they are being heard as she's still sketching out the policy particulars of her expected presidential run is no small thing.

Also in her favor, she looked far more rested and at ease than when most of us last saw her, at the news conference on her decision to do all State Department business on a personal email address.

When she did speak on Monday, she talked about investing in infrastructure, including human infrastructure. Among the most pressing questions, she said, are, "What do we do to better equip our people to be able to take the jobs? And how do we keep middle-class families in cities where they want to stay? They don't want to leave, but they're being priced out."

She applauded the work of unions pooling their public pension money to create green jobs by training people to do "energy retrofits, energy efficiency," and praised progressive New York City Mayor Bill DeBlasio for "trying to create pre-K access for every young child in New York, regardless of who that child is and who its parents are."

And she cited new work out out of Harvard on how a lack of social mobility and income equality go hand and hand. "It turns out that places where the fabric of community is strong, with a vibrant middle class, places that are more integrated across class, places with good schools, places with unions, places with religious organizations and civic organizations help people feel rooted, part of a community and then being able to pull together all of the aspects that play into upward mobility."

She touted the work of her family's foundation in preparing young people for their first jobs -- through a program called "Job One." And she spoke favorably about Germany's wage-subsidy system, based on the idea that it's better to pay out to keep people employed than to pay unemployment benefits.

In closing, she told advocates for criminal justice reform, job and skills training and Latino entrepreneurship, "Amen! I love discussions like this," and loved, too, she said, getting back to "an evidence-based discussion," presumably as opposed to the one about her exclusive use of a private email as secretary of state.

She also paid those present the compliment of hinting broadly that she'll need to hear more from them as she puts a campaign together: "Don't be surprised if you get a call."

Hillary Clinton, Julian Castro Shared Ideas on Urban Progress (NBC News)
By Suzanne Gamboa
March 23, 2015
NBC News

They were at separate tables and divided by a moderator, but potential 2016 presidential candidate Hillary Clinton and Housing Secretary Julían Castro were on the same page about creating more opportunity in America's urban centers.

Castro used what became the operative idea of Monday's event organized by the Center for American Progress: collaboration across government agencies _ or as another speaker described it, using a phrase invoked by Clinton and made the title of her 1996 book, "it takes a village."

An announcement is pending from Clinton, the former first lady, a former U.S. senator and Obama's former secretary of state, on her plan for 2016. Castro is considered a potential runningmate.

But the two seemed to be in sync during the policy discussion on urban areas, described by Lee Saunders, president of the American Federation of State County and Municipal Employees union, as experiencing revitalization, but only in limited areas.

Clinton said the country needs to make sure cities are not just "places of economic prosperity and job creation on average," but are renewed in a way "that lifts everybody up to deal with the overriding issues of inequality and lack of mobility" economically.

"How do we make what we already have more of an attraction? . . . How do we repair and update a lot of our infrastructure?" Clinton asked. She said she is looking at not only what can be done by working across governmental lines, but also through public-private partnerships.

Later in the discussion, Castro gave something of a response to her questions.

"If I have one piece of advice for local leaders around the country, it would be to break through the silos that often exist at the local level," Castro said, drawing on his experience as San Antonio's mayor from 2009-14.

He told of serving on San Antonio's city council and trying to find a place for limited street maintenance and repair resources. A woman complained of the long wait for sidewalks in her neighborhood and how her diabetic mother had been told by her doctor to do more walking.

"For me as a policymaker, it drove home this idea that all of these things that we do are connected … It's infrastructure. It's health. It's economic development, the housing," Castro said.

Clinton also expressed her support for pre-kindergarten. Castro managed to expand pre-K in San Antonio with help from a sales tax increase approved by the city's voters in 2012.

Janet Murguia, the head of the National Council of La Raza who served in the administration of former President Bill Clinton, also participated in the panel. She promoted the role of Latino-owned small businesses in communities and pointed out that Latinas are the fastest growing segment of the small business owner community.

"Many times they are doing that out of sheer grit and will and yet there's still not enough support and services to keep these small businesses sustainable," she said.

Clinton: US needs solutions to income inequality (Associated Press)
By Ken Thomas
March 23, 2015
Associated Press

Approaching a likely presidential campaign announcement next month, Hillary Rodham Clinton said Monday that income inequality and wage stagnation are problems that go hand-in-hand and the nation needs creative solutions to bolster job opportunities and living conditions in the cities.

Clinton, at a discussion about urban areas, cited the benefits of partnerships between the private and public sectors and updated policies to improve social mobility. The policy event offered a preview of economic themes she is likely to address in a campaign.

"We need to think hard about what we're going to do now that people are moving back into and staying in cities to make sure that our cities are not just places of economic prosperity and job creation on average," Clinton said. "But do it in a way that lifts everybody up to deal with the overriding issues of inequality and lack of mobility."

Her appearance at the Center for American Progress, a Democratic think tank founded by allies of her husband, former President Bill Clinton, offered no new clues on the timing of her announcement, but plenty of presidential atmospherics. Clinton was joined by Housing Secretary Julian Castro, considered a potential running mate for Clinton by some Democrats, and the heads of a public workers union and teachers union, two of Clinton's most ardent labor allies.

Neera Tanden, a former Hillary Clinton policy adviser, is president of the center and moderated the discussion while the think tank's founder, John Podesta, sat in the front row. Podesta, a former Bill Clinton chief of staff, is expected to take a senior position in Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign. Clinton later met with President Barack Obama at the White House, where the two discussed "a range of topics," the White House said.

Many Democrats support boosting wages and household income and argue that many families have yet to benefit from an improving job market. Liberals, led most visibly by Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren, say the party has become too intertwined with Wall Street and needs bold strategies to address inequality.

Republicans say Clinton's message will ring hollow after she spent months earning six-figure fees for speaking engagements and stumbled during last year's book tour, when she said her family was "dead broke" when it left the White House.

"What voter out there struggling to make ends meet can relate to someone who spends millions flying around on private jets and thinks leaving the White House with a multi-million dollar book deal counts as being 'dead broke?'" said Michael Short, a spokesman for the Republican National Committee.

Clinton said economic problems have been acutely felt by young people, with more than 5 million people between the ages of 16 and 24 not in school or employed and in need of job skills and training. She urged leaders to get out of their "ideological bunkers" and said they could learn from the work of one panelist, Mayor Aja Brown of Compton, Calif., on curbing gang violence.

"Don't be surprised if you get a call to come and maybe we'll start not too far from here in a beautiful domed building," Clinton said to laughter, referring to the U.S. Capitol. "Get everybody in the same room and start that conversation that could lead to collaboration and better results for our cities and our country."

Joined at the event by Lee Saunders of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees and Randi Weingarten of the American Federation of Teachers, Clinton made no mention of a trade proposal backed by Obama called the Trans-Pacific Partnership. Some labor unions worry she might support the initiative, which they see as undermining jobs, environmental standards and worker rights. They call it "NAFTA on steroids" in a reference to the North American trade pact Clinton's husband piloted with Canada and Mexico in the 1990s.

Clinton ended the day at an awards ceremony honoring the legacy of Robin Toner, the first woman to serve as national political correspondent for The New York Times. Toner, who died in December 2008, covered Bill Clinton's 1992 presidential campaign and the Clinton White House.

Hillary Clinton joked that her relationship with the press "has been at times, shall we say, complicated." She quipped that she was all about "new beginnings," including a new grandchild, "another new hairstyle" and a "new email account." She did not take questions from reporters at the event.

It was the final event on her public schedule for the rest of March.

Hillary Clinton offers reporters and a yardstick (MSNBC)
By Alex Seitz-Wald
March 23, 2015
MSNBC

In her last scheduled public appearance before embarking on a presidential campaign, Hillary Clinton offered the press corps that will cover her for the next two years an olive branch in one hand and a proverbial yardstick she will judge them with in the other.

The former secretary of state has a famously “complicated” relationship with the media, as she put it, but appeared Monday night at a ceremony in Washington, D.C. to present the Robin Toner prize for journalism. “I am well aware that some of you may be a little surprised to see me here,” Clinton cracked a the room full of Washington political reporters – the first in a series of jokes at her own expense.

With her self-effacing humor and awareness of her own foibles in dealing with the press, Clinton offered an olive branch. “I am all about new beginnings. A new granddaughter, another new hairstyle, a new email account. So why not a new relationship with the press?” Clinton asked. “So here goes: no more secrecy. No more zone of privacy. After all, what good did that do me?”

She even offered a pitch-perfect industry joke about college newspapers transitioning to new digital content platforms, including the buzzy new live streaming app Meerkat.

But at the same time, Clinton presented the journalists who are about cover her campaign with a yardstick against which she will measure them in the legacy of Robin Toner.

Toner was the first woman to be named national political correspondent for the New York Times, and covered Clinton in the White House and beyond. Toner died in 2009 and a prestigious award has been presented in her honor since 2010, thanks to the work of her husband, Peter Gosselin, another reporter whom she met covering Clinton’s failed health care reform effort.
